TO THE MOST HIGH AND MIGHTY PRINCESSE ELIZABETH

BY THE GRACE OF GOD, OF ENGLAND,

Fraunce, and Ireland Queene, defender of the faith: &c.

UNDER hope of your highnes gracious and accustomed fauor, I haue presumed to present here vnto your Maiestie, Plutarkes lyues translated, as a booke fit to be protected by your highnes, and meete to be set forth in English. For vvhich is fitter to giue countenance to so many great states, than such an highe and mightie Princeesse? vvhich is fitter to reuiue the dead memorie of their fame, than she that beareth the liuely image of their vertues? vvhich is fitter to authorize a vvork of so great learning and vvisedome, than she vvhome all do honor as the Muse of the vvorld? Therefore I humbly beseech your Maiestie, to suffer the simplenes of my translation, to be couered vnder the amplexes of your highnes protection. For, most gracious Souereigne, though this booke be no booke for your Maiesties selfe, vvho are meeter to be the chiefe storie, than a student therein, and can better vnderstand it in Greeke, than any man can make it English: yet I hope the common sorte of your subiects, shall not onely profit them selues hereby, but also be animated to the better seruice of your Maiestie. For amonge all the profane bookes, that are in reputation at this day, there is none (your highnes best knowes) that teacheth so much honor, loue, obedience, reuerence, zeale, and deuotion to Princes, as these liues of Plutarke doe. Hovve many examples shall your subiects reade here, of severall persons, and vvhole armyes, of noble and base, of younge and olde, that both by sea & lande, at home and abroad, haue strayned their vvits, not regarded their states, ventured their persons, cast avvay their liues, not onely for the honor and safetie, but also for the pleasure of their Princes?

Then vvell may the Readers thinke, if they haue done this for heathen Kings, vvhath should vve doe for Christian Princes? If they haue done this for glorye, vvhath shoulde vve doe for religion? If they haue done this vwithout hope of heauen, vvhath should vve doe that looke for immortalitie? And so adding the encouragement of these exsamples, to the forvvardnes of their ovvne dispositions: vvhath seruice is there in vvarre, vvhath honor in peace, vvhich they vvill not be ready to doe, for their vvorthy Queene?

The Epistle Dedicatorie.

And therefore that your highnes may giue grace to the booke, and the booke may doe his seruice to your Maiestie: I haue translated it out of French, and doe here most humbly present the same vnto your highnes, beseeching your Maiestie vwith all humilitie, not to reiect the good meaning, but to pardon the errors of your most humble and obedient subiect and seruaunt, vvho prayeth God long to multiplye all graces and blessings vpon your Maiestie. VVritten the sixteene day of Ianuary. 1579.

Your Maiesties most humble and obedient seruaunt,

TO

To the Reader.

HE profit of stories, and the prayse of the Author, are sufficiently declared by Amiot, in his Epistle to the Reader: So that I shall not neede to make many wordes thereof. And in deede if you will supply the defects of this translation, with your owne diligence and good vnderstanding: you shall not neede to trust him, you may proue your selues, that there is no prophane studye better then Plutarke. All other learning is priuate, suttier for Vniuersities then cities, fuller of contemplation than experience, more commedable in the students them selues, than profitable vnto others. VVheras stories are fit for every place, reache to all persons, serue for all tymes, teache the liuing, reuiue the dead, so farre excellling all other bookes, as it is better to see learning in noble mens liues, than to reade it in Philosophers writings. Nowe for the Author, I will not denye but loue may deceiue me, for I must needs loue him with whome I haue taken so much payne: but I beleue I might be bold to affirme, that he hath written the profitablest story of all Authors. For all other were fayne to take their matter, as the fortune of the contries whereof they wrote fell out: But this man being excellent in wit, learning, and experience, hath chosen the speciall actes of the best persons, of the famoslest nations of the world. But I will leaue the iudgement to your selues. My onely purpose is to desire you to excuse the faults of my translation, with your owne gentlenes, and with the opinion of my diligence and good entent. And so I wische you all the profit of the booke. Fare ye well. The foure and twenty day of Ianuary. 1579.

Amiot to the Readers.

He reading of bookes which bring but a vaine and unprofitable pleasure to the Reader is iustly misliked of wise and graue men. Again the reading of such as doe but onely bring profit, and make the Reader to be in loue therewith, and doe not ease the payne of the reading by some pleasures in the same: doe seeme somewhat harsh to diuers delicate wits, that can not tarry long upon them. But such bookes as yeeld pleasure and profit, and doe both delight and teache, haue all that a man can desire: why they should be vniuersally liked and allowed of all sortes of men, according to the common saying of the Poet Horace:

That he which matcheth profit with delight, Doth winne the price in euery poynt aright.

Either of these yeeld his effect the better, by reason the one runneth with the other, profiting the more because of the delight, and deliting the more because of the profit. This commendation (in my opinion) is most proper to the reading of stories, to haue pleasure and profit matched together, which kind of delights and teaching meeting in this wise arme in arme, hath more allowance then any other kind of writing or inuention of man. In respect whereof it may be reasonably answered, that men are more beholding to such good wits, as by their graue and wise writing haue deserved the name of Historiographers, then they are to any other kind of writers: because an historie is an orderly register of notable things said, done, or happened in time past, to mainteyne the continuall remembrance of them, and to serue for the instruction of them to come.

And like as memorie is as a storehouse of mens conceits and deuises, without the which the actions of the other two parts should be imperfect, and vneleare unprofitable: So may it also be said, that an historie is the very treasury of mans life, whereby the notable doings and sayings of men, and the wonderfull adventures & strange cases (which the long continuance of time bringeth forth) are preserved from the death of forgetfulness. Hereupon it riseth, that Plato the wise sayth, that the name of historie was given to this recording of matters, to stay the fleeing of our memorie, which etherwise would be soone lost, and retaine life. And we may well perceiue how greatly we be beholding unto it, if we doe no more but consider in how horrible darkenes, and in how beastly and pestilent a quagmyre of ignorance we should be plunged: if the remembrance of all the things that haue bene done, and haue happened before we were borne, were utterly drowned and forgotten. Now therefore I will ouerpasse the excellencie and worthines of the thing it selfe, forasmuch as it is not onely of more antiquitie then any other kind of writing that ever was in the world, but also was used among men, before there was any use of letters at all: because that men in those daies deliuered in their lifetimes the remembrance of things past to their successors, in songs, which they caused their children to learne by hart, from hand to hand, as it is to be seene yet in our dayes, by the example of the barbarous people that inhabit the new found landes in the West, who without any records of writings, haue had the knowledge of things past, vneleare eight hundred yeares afore. Likewise I leaue to discourse, that it is the surest, safest, and durablest monument that men can leaue of their doings in this world, so to consecrate their names to immortality. For there is neither picture, nor image of marble, nor arch of triumph, nor pillar, nor sumptuous sepulchre, that can match the durableness of an eloquent history, furnished with the properties which it ought to haue. Again, I mind not to stand much upon this, that it hath a certaine troth in it, in that it alwayes professeth to speake truth, & for that the proper ground thereof is to treat of the greatest & highest things that are done in the world: inasmuch that to my seeming the great profit thereof is as Horace sayth, that it is commonly called the mother of trothe & uprightnes, which commendeth it so greatly, as it needeth not else where to seeke any authority, or ornament of dignitie, but of her very selfe. For it is a certaine rule and instruction, which by examples past, teacheth vs to iudge of things present, & to foresee things to come: as we may knowe what to take of, & what to follow, what to mislike, and what to eschew. It is a picture, which (as it were in a table) setteth before our eyes the things worthy of remembrance that

haue bene done in olde time by mighty nations, noble kings & Princes, wise governors, valiant Captaines, & persons renowned for some notable quality, representing vnto vs the manners of strange nations, the lawes & customes of old time, the particular affaires of men, their consultations & enterprises, the manner that they haue used to compass the world, all their demeaning of them selves when they were comen to the highest, or throwen downe to the lowest degree of state. So as it is not possible for any case to rise either in peace or warre, in publicke or private affaires, but that the person which shall haue diligently read, well conceived, & thoroughly remembered histories, shall find matter in them wherewith to take light, & counsel, wherby to resolute himselfe to take a part, or to geue aduice vnto others, how to choose in doubtful & dangerous cases that which may be for their most profit, and in time to find out to what poynt the matter will come if it be well handled, and how to moderate himselfe in prosperitie, and how to cheere up and beare him selfe in aduersitie. These things it doth with much greater grace, efficacy, and speede, than the bookes of morall Philosophie doe: forasmuch as examples are of more force to moue and instruct, than are the arguments and proofes of reason, or their precise precepts, because examples be the very formes of our deedes, & accompanied with all circumstances. Where as reasons and demonstrations are general, and tend to the proofe of things, and to the beating of them into understanding: and examples tend to the shewing of them in practice and execution, because they doe not only declare what is to be done, but also worke a desire to do it, as well in respect of a certaine naturall inclination which all men haue to follow examples, as also for the beautie of vertue, which is of such power, that wheresoeuer she is seene, she maketh her selfe to be loued and liked. Again, it doth things with greater weight and grauitie, than the inuentions & deuises of the Poets: because it helpeth not it selfe with any other thing than with the plaine truth, whereas Poetry doth commonly enrich things by commending them above the starrs and their deserving, because the chiefe intent thereof is to delight. Moreover, it doth things with more grace and modestie than the euill lawes and ordinances doe: because it is more grace for a man to teach and instruct, than to chastise or punish. And yet for all this, an historie also hath his manner of punishing the wicked, by the reproch of euill lasting infamie, wherewith it defaceth their remembrance, which is a great meane to withdraue them from vice, who otherwise would be lewdly and wickedly disposed. Likewise on the contrarie parte, she immortall praise and glorie wherewith it rewardeth well doers, is a very lively & sharpe spur for men of noble courage and gentlemanlike meane, to cause them to adventure vpon all manner of noble and great things. For bookes are full of examples of men of high courage and wisdom, who for desire to continue the remembrance of their name, by the sure and certaine recorde of histories, haue willingly yeelded their liues to the seruice of the common weale, spent their goods, sustained infinite paines both of bodie and minde in defence of the oppressed, in making common buildings, in stablishing of lawes and gouernments, and in the finding out of artes and sciences necessarie for the maintenance and ornaments of mans life: for the faithfull registering whereof, the thanke is due to histories. And although true vertue seeke no reward of her commendable doings like a hireling, but contenteth her selfe with the conscience of her well doing: yet notwithstanding I am of opinion, that it is good and meete to draw men by all meanes to good doing, and good men ought not to be forbidden to hope for the honor of their vertuous deedes, seeing that honor doth naturally accompanie vertue, as the shadow doth the bodie. For we commonly see, not to seele the sparkes of desire of honor, is an infallible signe of a base, vile, and vniuersal nature: and that such as account it an vnnesseary, needelesse, or vnseemely thing to be praised, are likewise no doers of any things worthy of praise, but are commonly men of faint courage, whose thoughtes extend no further than to their liues, wherewith also they haue no further remembrance, than is before their eyes. But if the counsel of olde men be to be gratefully esteemed, because they must needs haue seene much by reason of their long life: and if they that haue travelled long in strange countries, and haue had the managing of many affaires, and haue gotten great experience of the doings of this world, are reputed for sage, and worthy to be the eyes of great gouernments put into their handes: how greatly is the reading of histories to be esteemed, which is able to furnish vs with more examples in one day, than the whole course of the longest life of any man is able to doe? Inasmuch that they which exercise them selves in reading as they ought to doe, although they be but young, become such in respect of understanding of the affaires of this world, as if they were old and grayheaded, and of long experience. Yet though they neuer haue removed out of their houses, yet are they aduersified, informed, and satisfied of all things in the world, as well as they that haue shortened their liues by innumerable travels and infinite dangers, in running ouer the whole earth that is inhabited: whereupon the contrary part, they that are ignorant of the things that were done & come to passe before they were borne, continue still as children, though they be neuer so aged, and are but as strangers in their owne native countries. To be short, it may be truly sayd, that the reading of histories is the schole of wisdom, so far as men vnderstanding, by considering aduisely the state of the world that is past, and by marking diligently by what lawes, manners, and discipline, Empires, kingdoms, and dominions, haue in old time bene established, and after ward maintained, and increased, or contrarywise changed, diminished, and ouerthrowen. Also we reade, that whensoeuer the right sage and vertuous Emperour of Rome, Alexander Seuerus, was to consult of any matter of great importance, whether it concerned warres or government: he alwayes called such to counsell, as were reported to be well sene in histories. Notwithstanding, I know there are that will stand against me in this point, and uphold that the reading of histories can serue to small purpose, or none at all, towards the getting of skill: because skill consisteth in action, & is ingendred by the very experience & practise of things, where a man doth wel marke & thoroughly beare away the things that he hath sene with his eyes, & found true by proofe, according to the saying of the auncient Poet Afranius.

My name is skill, my Syre Experience hyght,
And memorie bred and brought me forth to lyght.

Which thing was ment like wise by the Philosopher that sayd, that the hand is the instrument of skill. By reason whereof it comes to passe (say they) that such as speake of matters of government and state, but specially of matters of warre by the booke, speake but as booke knights, as the Frenche prouerbe termeth them, after the manner of the Grecians, who call him a booke Pilot, which hath not the sure and certaine knowledge of the things that he speakes of: meaning thereby, that it is not for a man to trust to the vnderstanding which he hath gotten by reading, in things that consist in the deede doing, where the hand is to be set to the worke: no more then the often hearing of men talke and reason of paynting, or the disputing vpon colors, without taking of the pensill in hand, can stand a man in any stead at all to make him a good paynter. But on the contrary part, many haue proued wise men and good Captaines, which could neither write nor reade. Besides this, they alleage further, that in matters of warre, all things alter from yeare to yeare: by means whereof the slights and policies that are to be learned out of booke, will serue the turne no more than mynes that are blowen up. According whereunto Cambyse telleth his sonne Cyrus in Xenophon, that like as in Musicke the newest songs are commonly best liked of for once, because they were neuer heard afore: So in the warres, those policies that neuer were practised afore, are those that take best successe, & commonly haue the best effect, because the enemies doe least doubt of them. Neuerthelesse I am not he that will mainteine that a wise governor of a common weale, or a great Captaine can be made of such a person, as hath neuer travelled out of his study, and from his booke: howbeit that which Cicero writeth of Lucius Lucullus, is true, that when he departed out of Rome as Captaine generall and Lieutenant of the Romanes, to make warre against kinge Mithridates, he had no experience at all of the warres, and yet after ward he bestowed to great diligence in the reading of histories, and in conferring vpon every point with the olde Captaines and men of long experience, whome he caried with him, that by the tyme of his coming into Asia, where he was in deede to put his masters in execution, he was found to be a very sufficient Captaine, as appeared by his deedes: in so much that by those wayes, cleane contrary to the common order of warre, he discomfited two of the most puissant, and greatest Princes that were at that time in the East. For his vnderstanding was so quick, his care so vigilant, and his courage so great, that he needed no longe traying, nor gresse instruction by experience. And although I graunt there haue bene diuerse Generours and Captaynes, which by the onely force of nature (furthered by longe continued experience) haue done goodly and great exploit: yet can it not be denyed me, but that if they had matched the giftes of nature with the knowledge of learning, and the reading of histories, they might haue done much greater things, and they might haue become much more perfect. For like as in every other cunning & skill, wherein a man intendeth to excell, so also to become a perfect & sufficient person to gouerne in peace and warre, there are three things of necessitie required, namely, nature, art, and practise. Nature (in the case that we treat of) must furnishe vs with a good moother wit, with a bodie well disposed to indure all manner of trauell, and with a good wit to aduance our selues. Art must geue vs iudgement and knowledge, gotten by the examples and wise discourse that we haue read and double read in good histories: and practise will geue vs readinesse, assurednesse, and the ease how to put things in execution. For though skill be the ruler of doing the deede, yet it is a waste of the minde which teacheth a man the meane point, betwene the two faultie extremities of too much and too little, wherein the commendation of all doings consisteth. And who soeuer he is that goeth about to attaine to it by the onely triall of experience, and had leuer to learne it at his owne cost, than at another mans: he may well be of the number of fooles that are touched by this auncient proverbe, which sayth, Experience is the scholemistresse of fooles: because mans life is so short, and experience is hard and dangerous, specially in matters of warre, wherein (according to the saying of Tamar-chus the Athenian Captaine) a man can not fault twice, because the faultes are so great, that most commonly they bring with them the ouerthrow of the state, or the losse of the liues of those that do them. Therefore we must not tary for this wit that is won by experience, which costeth so deere, and is so long a coming, that a man is oft times dead in the seeking of it before he haue attained it, so as he had neede of a seconde life to employ it in, because of the ouerlate coming by it. But we must make speede by our diligent and continuall reading of histories both old and new, that we may enioy this happinesse which the Poet speaketh of:

A happie wight is he that by mishappes Of others, doth beware of afterclappes.

By the way, as concerning those that say that paper will beare all things: if there be any that unworthily take vpon them the name of historiographers, and deface the dignity of the story for hatred or fauor, by mingling any vntruth with it: that is not the fault of the historie, but of the men that are partiall, who abuse that name unworthily, to couer and cloke their owne passions withall, which thing shall neuer come to passe, if the writer of the storie haue the properties that are necessarily required in a storie writer, as these: That he set aside all affection, be voyde of enuy, hatred, and flattery: that he be a man experienced in the affaires of the world of good utterance, and a good iudgement to discern what is to be sayd, and what is to be left vn sayd: what would do more harme to haue it declared, than do good to haue it reprobued or condemned: forasmuch as his chiefe drift ought to be to serue the common weale, and that he is but as a register to set downe the iudgements and definitive sentences of Gods Court, whereof some are given according to the ordinarie course and capacite of our weake naturall reason, and other some goe according to Gods infinite pouer and incomprehensible wisdom, aboue and against all discourse of mans vnderstanding, who being vnable to reach to the bottom of his iudgements, and to finde out the first motions and groundes thereof, do impute the cause of them to a certaine fortune, which is nought else but a fained deuice of mans wit, dazzled at the beholding of such brightnesse, and confounded at the gaging of so bottomlesse a deepe, howbeit nothing cometh to passe nor is done without the leaue of him that is the verie right and truth it self, with whom nothing is past or to come, and who knoweth and vnderstandeth the very originall causes of all necessitie. The consideration whereof teacheth men to humble them selues vnder his mightie hande by acknowledging that there is one first cause which ouer ruleth nature, whereof it cometh, that neither hardnesse is alwayes happie, nor wisdom alwayes sure of good successe. These so notable commodites are every where accompanied with singular delights, which proceedeth chiefly of diuersitie and novelty, wherein our nature delighteth and is greatly desirous of: because we haue an earnest inclination towards our best prosperitie and aduancement, it goeth on still, seeking it in euery thing which it taketh to be goodly, or good in this world. But forasmuch as it fineth not where with to content it selfe vnder the cope of heauen, it is soone weary of the things that it had earnestly desired afore, & so goeth on vnder the cope of heauen, in the vnkindnes of her likings, whereof she neuer ceaseth to make a continuall changing, until she haue fully satisfied her desires, by attaining to the last end, which is to be knit to her chiefe felicity, where is the full perfection of all goodlines and goodnes. This liking of varietie can not be better releued, than by that which is the finder out and the preseruer of time, the father of all neweltes, and messenger of antiquitie. For if we finde

a certaine singular pleasure, in hearkening to such as be returned from some long voyage, and doe report things which they haue seene in fraunge contries, as the maners of people, the natures of places, and the fashions of liues, differing from ours: And if we be sometime so raiued with delight and pleasure at the hearing of the talke of some wise, discrete, and well spoken old man, from whose mouth there floweth a streame of speech so sweete than bonnie, in rehearsing the adventures which he hath had in his greene and youthful yeares, the paines that he hath indured, and the perills that he hath overpassed, so as we perceiue not how the time goeth away: how much more ought we be raiued with delight and wondering, to behold the state of mankind, and the true successe of things, which antiquitie hath and doth bring forth from the beginning of the world, as the setting up of Empires, the ouerthrow of Monarchies, the rising and falling of Kingdoms, and all things else worthy admiration, and the same lively set forth in the faire, rich, and true table of eloquence? And that so lively, as in the very reading of them we feele our mindes to be so touched by them, not as though the things were already done and past, but as though they were even then presently in doing, and we finde our selues caried away with gladnesse and griefe through feare or hope, weell neere as though we were then at the doing of them: where as notwithstanding we be not in any paine or danger, we only conceiue in our mindes the aduersities that other folkes haue indured, our selues sitting safe with our contentation and ease, according to these verses of the Poet Lucretius:

It is a pleasure for to sit at ease
Vpon the land, and safely thence to see How other folkes are tossed on the seas,
That with the blustering windes turmoyled be.
Not that the sight of others miseries
Doth any way the honest hart delight,
But for because it liketh well our eyes,
To see harmes free that on our selues might light.

Also it is seene that the reading of histories doth so bolde and allure good wits, that diuers times it not only maketh them to forget all other pleasures, but also serueth very fitly to turne away their griefes, and sometimes also to remedie their diseases. As for example, we finde it written of Alphonsus King of Naples, that Prince so greatly renoumed in Chronicles for his wisdom and goodnesse, that being sore sick in the citie of Capua, when his Physicians had spent all the cunning that they had to recover him his health, and he saw that nothing preuailed: he determined with him selfe to take no more medicines, but for his recreation caused the storie of Quintus Curtius, concerning the deedes of Alexander the great, to be read before him: at the hearing whereof he tooke so wonderful pleasure, that nature gathered strength by it, and ouercame the waywardnes of his disease. Whereupon having soone recovered his helth, he discharged his Physicians with such words as these: Feast me no more with your Hippocrates and Galene, for they can no skill to helpe me to recover my belth: but weell fare Quintus Curtius that could so good skill to helpe me to recover my belth. Now if the reading and knowledge of histories be delightfull and profitable to all other kind of folke, say it is much more for great Princes and Kings, because they haue to do with charges of greatest weight and difficultie, to be best stored with giftes and knowledge for the discharge of their duties: seeing the ground of stories is to treat of all manner of high matters of state, as warres, battells, cities, contries, treaties of peace and alliances, and therefore it seemeth more fit for them, than for any other kinde of degrees of men: because they being bred and brought up tenderly, and at their ease, by reason of the great regard and care that is had of their persons, (as meete is for so great states to haue) they take not so great paines in their youth for the learning of things as behoueth those to take which will learne the noble ancient languages, and the painfull doctrine comprehended in Philosophie. Again, when they come to mans state, their charge calleth them to deale in great affaires, so as there remaineth no exercise of wit more comenient for the, than the reading of histories in their owne tongue, which without paine is able to teache them euery great pleasure and ease, whatsoeuer the painfull workes of the Philosophers concerning the government of common weales can shew them, to make them skilful in the well ruling and gouerning of the people and contries that God hath put vnder their subiection. But the worst is, that they euer (or for the most part) haue such manner of persons

about them as seeke nothing els but to please them by all the wayes they can, and there are very few that dare tell them the truth freely in all things: whereas on the contrary part, an history flattereth them not, but layeth open before their eyes the faults and vices of such as were like them in greatness of degree. And therefore Demetrius Phalerus (a man renoumed for well for his skill in the good government of a common weale, as for his excellent knowledge of other wise) counsell'd Ptolemy, first king of Aegypt after the death of Alexander the great, that he should often and diligently reade the bookes that treated of the government of kingdoms, because (sayd he) thou shalt finde many things there, which thy seruants and familiar friends are not tell thee. Moreover, this is another thing, that such great personages can not easily trauell out of the bounds of their dominions, to see other fraunge contries as private persons doe: because the ielousie of their estate, and the regarde of their dignitie, requires that they should neuer be in place where another man might commaund them. And often times for want of hauing seene the contries, and knowen the people and Princes that are their neighbours, they haue aduentured vpon attempts without good ground: to auoide the which, the instruction they may haue by the reading of histories, is one of the easiest and fittest remedies that can be found. And though there were none other cause than only this last, surely it ought to induce Princes to the often and diligent reading of histories, wherein are written the heroicall deedes of wise and valiant men, specially of kings that haue bene before them, the considering whereof may cause them to be desirous to become like them, specially which were of stately and noble courage: because the feedes of princely vertues that are bred with them selues, doe then quicken them with an emulation towards those that haue bene or are equal in degree with them, as well in respect of noblenes of bloud, as of greatnes of state, so as they be loth to giue place to any person, and much lesse can find in their hearts to be outgone in glory of vertuous doings. Whereof innumerable examples might be alleaged, if the thing were not so well known of it self, that it were much more against the discretion of the matter that it treateth of, for the order and manner of writing that it useth, it hath sondry names giuen vnto it: But yet among the rest there are two chiefe kinds. The one which setteth downe mens doings and adventures at length, is called by the common name of an historie: the other which declareth their natures, sayings, and maners, is properly named their liues. And although the ground of them both doe close very neare in one, yet doth the one respect more the things, and the other the persons: the one is more common, and the other more private: the one concerneth more the things that are without the man, and the other the things that proceede from within: the one is the events, the other the consultations: betwene the which there is oftentimes great odds, according to this answer of the Persian Siramnes, to such as marvelled how it came to passe, that he denieth being so politike had so unhappy successe: It is (quod he) because my denieth is wholly from my own invention, but the effects of them are in the disposition of fortune and the king: And surely amongst all those that euer haue taken vpon them to write the liues of famous men, the chiefe prerogative, by the indgement of such as are clearest sighted, is iustly giuen to the Greeke Philosopher Plutarke, borne in the citie of Chaeronea in the contry of Boeotia, a noble man, perfect in all rare knowledge, as his workes may well put men out of doubt, if they list to read them through, with all his life long he to his old age, had to deale in assayes of the common weale, as he him selfe witnesseth in diuers places, specially in the treatise which he intitled, Whether an olde man ought to meddle with the government of a common weale or not: and who had the hap & honor to be scholemaster to the Emperour Traian, as is commonly beleued, and as is expressly pretended by a certaine Epistle set before the Latin translation of his matters of state, which (to say the truth) seemeth in my iudgement to be somewhat suspitious, because I find it not among his workes in Greeke, besides that it speaketh as though the booke were dedicated to Traian, which thing is manifestly disproved by the beginning of the booke, and by diuers other reasons. Yet notwithstanding, because he shewes it to be truly & greatly written, and well befitting him: I haue set it downe here in this place. Plutarke vnto Traian sendeth greeting, I knowe well that the mode of your nature was not desirous of someritie, though you haue alwayes indured to desirue it by your honorable comersation: by reason

a certaine singular pleasure, in hearkening to such as be returned from some long voyage, and doe report things which they haue seen in strange contries, as the maners of people, the natures of places, and the fashions of liues, differing from ours: and if we be sometime so raiued with delight and pleasure as the hearing of the talke of some wise, discrete, and well spoken old man, from whose mouth there floweth a streame of speech sweeter than honnie, in rehearsing the adventures which he hath had in his greene and youthfull yeares, the paines that he hath indured, and the perills that he hath overpassed, so as we perceiue not how the time goeth away: how much more ought we be raiued with delight and wondering to behold the state of mankind, and the true successe of things, which antiquitie hath and doth bring forth from the beginning of the world, as the setting up of Empires, the ouerthrow of Monarchies, the rising and falling of Kingdoms, and all things else worthy admiration, and the same lively set forth in the faire, rich, and true table of eloquence? And that so lively, as in the very reading of them we feele our mindes to be so touched by them, not as though the things were already done and past, but as though they were euen then presently in doing, and we finde our selues caried away with gladnesse and griefe through feare or hope, well neere as though we were then at the doing of them: where as notwithstanding we be not in any paine or danger, but only conceiue in our mindes the aduersities that other folkes haue indured, our felues sitting safe with our contentation and ease, according to these verses of the Poet Lucretius:

Vpon the land, and safely thence to see
How other folkes are tossed on the seas,
That with the blustering windes turmoyled be.
Doth any way the honest hart delight,
But for because it liketh well our eyes,
To see harmes free that on our selues might light.

Also it is seeme that the reading of histories doth so holde and allure good wits, that diuers times it not only maketh them to forget all other pleasures, but also serueth very fitly to turne away their griefes, and sometimes also to remedie their diseases. As for example, we finde it written of Alphonsus King of Naples, that Prince so greatly renowned in Chronicles for his wisdom and goodnesse, that being for sicke in the citie of Capua, when his Physicians had spent all the cunning that they had to recouer him his health, and he saw that nothing presuaild: he determined with him selfe to take no more medicines, but for his recreation caused the storie of Quintus Curtius, concerning the deedes of Alexander the great, to be read before him: at the hearing whereof he tooke so wonderfull pleasure, that nature gathered strength by it, and ouercame the waywardnes of his disease. Whereupon hauing soone recouered his helth, he discharged his Physicians with such words as these: Feast me no more with your Hippocrates and Galene, for they can no skill to helpe me to recouer my helth: but well fare Quintus Curtius that could so good skill to helpe me to recouer my helth. Now if the reading and knowledge of histories be delightfull and profitable to all other kind of folke: I say it is much more for great Princes and Kings, because they haue to do with charges of great weight and difficultie, to be best stored with gifts and knowledge for the discharge of their duties: seeing the ground of stories is, to treat of all manner of high matters of state, as warres, battells, cities, contries, treaties of peace and alliances, and therefore it seemeth more fit for them, than for any other kinde of degrees of men: because they being bred and brought up tenderly, and at their ease, by reason of the great regard and care that is had of their persons, (as meete is for so great states to haue) they take not so great paines in their youth for the learning of things as behoueth those to take which will learne the noble ancient languages, and the painfull doctrine comprehended in Philosophie. Again, when they come to mans state, their charge calleth them to deale in great affaires, so as there remaineth no exercise of wit more conuenient for the, than the reading of histories in their owne tongue, which without paine is able to teache them euen with great pleasure and ease, whatsoeuer the painfull workes of the Philosophers concerning the government of common weales can shew them, to make them skilful in the well ruling and gouerning of the people and contries that God hath put vnder their subiection. But the worst is, that they euer (or for the most part) haue such manner of persons

about them as seeke nothing els but to please them by all the wayes they can, and there are very few which dare tell them the truth freely in all things: where as on the contrary part, an history flattereth them not, but layeth open before their eyes the faults and vices of such as were like them in greatness of degree. And therefore Demetrius Phalerus (a man renowned for well for his skill in the good government of a common weale, as for his excellent knowledge of other wise) counsell'd Ptolemy, first king of Aegypt after the death of Alexander the great, that he should often and diligently read the bookes that treated of the government of kingdoms, because (sayd he) thou shalt finde many things there, which thy seruants and familiar friends dare not tell thee. Moreover, this is another thing, that such great personages can not easily trauell out of the bounds of their dominions, to see other strange contries as private persons doe: because the ielousie of their estate, and the regard of their dignitie, requires that they should neuer be in place where another man might commaund them. And often times for want of hauing seene the contries, and knowen the people and Princes that are their neighbours, they haue adventured vpon attempts without good ground: to auoide the which, the instruction they may haue by the reading of histories, is one of the easiest and surest remedies that can be found. And though there were none other cause then only this last, surely it ought to induce Princes to the often and diligent reading of histories, wherein are written the heroicall deedes of wise and valiant men, specially of kings that haue bene before them, the considering whereof may cause them to be desirous to become like them, specially which were of stately and noble courage: because the seedes of Princely vertues that are bred with them selues, doe then quicken them up with an emulation towards those that haue bene or are equal in degree with them, as well in respect of noblenes of blood, as of greatnes of state, so as they be loth to giue place to any person, and much lesse can find in their hearts to be outgone in glory of vertuous doings. Whereof innumerable examples might be alleaged, if the thing were not so well known of it self, that it were much more against reason to doubt of it, than needfull to proue it. Therefore a man may truly conclude, that an historie is the scholemestre of Princes, at whose hand they may without payne, in way of pastyme, and with singular pleasure learne the most part of the things that belonge to their office. Now, according to the diuersitie of the matter that it treateth of, for the order and manner of writing that it useth, it hath sondry names giuen vnto it: But yet among the rest there are two chiefe kinds: The one which setteth downe mens doings and adventures at length, is called by the common name of an historie: the other which declareth their natures, sayings, and maners, is properly named their liues. And although the ground of them both doe cloze very neare in one, yet doth the one respect more the things, and the other the persons: the one is more common, and the other more private: the one concerneth more the things that are without the man, and the other the things that proceede from within: the one the euents, the other the consultations: betwene the which there is oftentimes great odds, according to this answer of the Persian Sirannes, to such as marvelled how it came to passe, that his desires being so politike had so unhappy successe: It is (quod he) because my desires are wholly from my own inuention, but the effects of them are in the disposition of fortune and the king. And surely amongst all those that euer haue taken vpon them to write the liues of famous men, the chiefe prerogative, by the iudgement of such as are clearest sighted, is iustly giuen to the Greeke Philosopher Plutarch borne in the citie of Cheronea in the contry of Bœotia, a noble man, perfect in all rare knowledge, as his workes may well put men out of doubt if they list to read them through, who all his life long endeued to his old age, had to deale in affaires of the common weale, as he him selfe witnesseth in diuers places, specially in the treatise which he intituled, Whether an olde man ought to meddle with the government of a common weale or not: and who had the hap & honor to be scholemaster to the Emperour Traian, as is commonly beleued, and as is expressly pretended by a certaine Epistle set before the Latin translation of his matters of state, which (to say the truth) seemeth in my iudgement to be somewhat suspitious, because I find it not among his workes in Greeke, besides that it speaketh although the booke were dedicated to Traian, which thing is manifestly disproved by the beginning of the booke, and by diuers other reasons: yet notwithstanding because he thinkes it is wisely & graciously written, and well becomming him: I haue (as it were) here in this place. Plutarch who Traian sendeth greeting, I know well that the modestie of your nature will not desire of some reuerencie, though you haue alwayes indured to desire it by your honorable conuersation: by reason

"whereof you haue bene thought so much the worthier of it, as you haue bene founde the further of
 "from all ambition. And therefore I do now reioice in your vertue & my fortune, if it be so great as to "cause you to administer that thing without iustice, which you haue obtained by desert. For otherwise
 "I am sure you haue put your selfe in hazard of great dangers, and me in perill of slanderous tongues, "because Rome can not away with a wicked Emperour, and the common voice of the people is al-
 "waies vnto to cast the fautes of the schollers in the teeth of their schoolemaisters: as for example:
 "Seneca is railed vpon by slanderous tongues, for the fautes of his scholler Nero: the scapes of Quinti-
 "lians young schollers are imputed to Quintilian him selfe: and Socrates is blamed, for being too myld
 "to his hearers. But as for you, there is hope you shall doe all things well enough, so you keepe you as you "are. If you first set your selfe in order, and then dispose all other things according to vertue, all things "shall fallow according to your desire. I haue set you downe the meanes in writing, which you must "observe for the well governing of your common weale, and haue shew'd you of how great force
 "your behaviour may be in that behalfe. If you thinke good to follow those things, you haue Plutarke
 "for the director and guider of your life: if not, I protest vnto you by this Epistle, that your falling into "danger to the overthrow of the Empire, is not by the doctrine of Plutarke. This Epistle witnesseth
 "plainly that he was as the schoolemaister of Traian, which thing seemeth to be auouched by this writing "of Suidas: Plutarke being borne in the citie of Cheronca in Beotia, was in the time of the Em-"perour Traian, and somewhat affore. But Traian honored him with the dignitie of Consulship, and "commaunded the officers and Magistrates that were throughout all the contrie of Illyria, that they "should not do any thing without his counsell and authoritie. So doth Suidas write of him. And I am "of opinion, that Traian being so wise an Emperour, would neuer haue done him so great honor, if he "had not thought him selfe greatly beholding to him for some speciall cause. But the thing that maketh
 "me most to beleue it true, is, that the same goodnesse and iustice appeared to be naturally imprinted in "most of Traians sayings and doings, wherof the paterne and mould (as a man might terme it) is "cast and set downe in Plutarke's Morals, so as men may perceiue expressly, that the one could well "skill to performe rightly, that which the other had taught wisely. For Dion writeth, that among "other honors which the Senate of Rome gaue by decree vnto Traian, they gaue him the title of the "Good Emperour. And Eutropius reporteth that euen vnto his time, when a new Emperour came to "be receiued of the Senate, among the cries of good hanfell, and the wishes of good lucke that were "made vnto him, one was: happier be thou than Augustus, and better than Traian. Howsoever the "case stood, it is very certaine that Plutarke dedicated the collection of his Apothegmes vnto him. But "when he had liued a long time at Rome, and was come home againe to his owne house, he fell to "writing of this excellent worke of Lines, which he calleth Parallellon, as much to say, as a coupling
 "or matching together, because he matcheth a Grecian with a Romane, setting downe their liues ech
 "after other, and comparing them together, as he founde any likenesse of nature, condicions, or aduon-
 "tures betwext them, and examining what the one of them had better or worse, greater or lesser "than the other: which things he doth with so goodly and graue discourse euery where, taken out of "the deepest & most hidden secrets of morall and naturall Philosophie, with so sage precepts and frute-
 "full instructions, with so effectfull commendation of vertues, and desolation of vice, with so many "goodly allegacions of other authors, with so many fit comparisons, & with so many high inuentions:
 "that the booke may better be called by the name of the Tresorie of all rare and perfect learning, than
 "by any other name. Also it is sayd, that Theodorus Gaza, a Grecian of singular learning, and a wor"thie of the ancient Greece, being asked on a time by his familiar frendes (which saw him so ear"nestly giuen to his studie, that he forgate all other things) what author he had leuest to choofe, if he
 "were at that point that he must needs choofe some one to holde him to alone, did answer that he "would choofe Plutarke: because that if they were all put together, there was no one both so pro"fitable, and so pleasant to read, as he. Sotius Senecio to whom he dedicateth his worke, was a Sena"tor of Rome, as witnesseth Dion, who writeth that the three persons whom Traian most loued "and honored, were Sotius, Parma, and Celsus, inasmuch that he caused images of them to be set vp.
 "True it is that he wrote the liues of many other men, which the busines of time hath bereft vs
 "of, among which he himselfe maketh mention of the liues of Scipio Africanus, & Metellus Numidi-"cus. And I haue red a litle Epistle of a Sonne of his, whose name is not expressed, copied out of an olde copie

copie in the Library of S. Marke in Venice, wherein he writeth to a frende of his, a register of all the booke that his father made: and there among the cupples of lines, he setteth downe the liues of Scipio and Epaminondas, and lastly the liues of Augustus Caesar, of Tiberius, of Caligula, of Claudius, of Nero, of Galba, of Vitellius, and of Otho. But hauing used all the diligence that I could in searching the chiefe Libraries of Venice, and Rome, I could neuer find them out. Onely I drew out certaine diuersities of readings, and many corrections by conferring the old written copies with the printed bookes: which haue stood in great stead to the understanding of many hard places: and therefore a great number of them which I haue restored, cometh by the iudgement & helpe of such men of this age, as are of greatest knowledge in humane learning. Yet for all this, there remaine some places unamended, howbeit very few, because some lines were wanting in the originall copies, wherof (to my seeming) it was better for me to writtess the want by marking it with some starre: than to gesse at it with all aduantage, or to adde anything to it. Now finally, if I haue over-shot my selfe in any thing, as it is verie easie to do in so hard and long a worke, specially to a man of so small abilitie as I am: I beseeche the Readers to vouchsafe for my discharge, to admit the excuse which the Poet Horace giueth me, where he sayth:

A man may well be ouerseen

In workes that long and tedious bene.

Specially sith that of so many good men, & men of skill as haue heretofore set hand to the translating of it, there was neuer yet any one found that went through with it in any language, at least wise that I haue seene or heard of: and that such as haue enterprised to translate it, specially into Latin, haue evidently writtess the hardnesse thereof, as they may easely perceiue which list to conferre their translations with mine. Neuertheless if it so fortune that men find not the speech of this translation so flowing, as they haue found some other of mine, that are abroad in mens hands: I beseech the readers to consider, that the office of a fit translator, consisteth not onely in the faithfull expressing of his authors meaning, but also in a certaine resembling and shadowing out of the forme of his stile and the manner of his speaking: vnto which he will commit the error of some painters, who haue taken vpon them to draw a man liuely, do paint him long where he should be short, and grosse where he should be slender, and yet set out the resemblance of his countenance naturally. For how harsh or rude soener my speech be, yet am I sure that my translation will be much easier to my contriemen, than the Greeke copie is, euen to such as are best practised in the Greeke tongue, by reason of Plutarke's peculiar manner of inditing, which is rather sharpe, learned, and short than plaine, polished, and easie. As the hardest, although I haue not compassed my matters so happily as ye could haue wished and desired: yet do I hope that your Lordships in reading it will hold the parties good will excused, which hath taken such paines in doing of it to profit you. And if my labor be so happie, as to content you: God be praised for it, which hath giuen me the grace to finish it.

THE LIVES OF THE NOBLE GRECIANS AND RO-MANES, COMPARED TOGETHER BY THAT graue learned Philoſopher and Hiſtoriographer, Plutarke of Chæronea.

Theſeus.

A LIKE as hiſtoriographers deſcribing the world (frende Soſius Senecio) doe of purpoſe referre to the vttermoſt partes of their mappes the farre diſtant regions whereof they be ignoraunt, with this note: theſe contries are by meanes of ſandes and drowthes vnauigable, rude, full of venimous beaſtes, SCYTHIAN ſile, and froſen ſeas. Euen ſo may I (which in comparing noble mens liues haue already gone ſo farre into antiquitie, as the true and certaine hiſtorie could lead me) of the reſt, being thinges paſt all prooſe or chalenge, very well ſay: that beyonde this time all is full of ſuſpicion and dout, being deliue- red vs by Poets and Tragedy makers, ſometimes without trueth and likelihoode, and alwayes without certainty. Howbeit, hauing heretofore ſet forth the liues of Lycurgus (which eſta- bliſhed the lawes of the LACEDÆMONIANS) and of king Numa Pompilius: me thought I might go a litle further to the life of Romulus, ſence I was come ſo nere him. But conſidering my ſelte as the Poet Æſchilus did:

*What champion may with ſuch a man compare? or who (thinke I) ſhalbe againſt him ſet?
Who is ſo bold? or who is he that dare deſend his force, in ſuch encounter mee?*

A

In the end I resolued to match him which did fer vp the noble & famous city of ATHENS, A with him which founded the glorious and inuincible city of ROME. Wherein I would wishe that the inuentions of Poets, and the traditions of fabulous antiquite, would suffer them selues to be purged and reduced to the forme of a true and historiall reporte: but when they square too much from likelyhode, and can not be made credible, the readers will of curtesie take in good parte that, which I could with most probability wryte of such antiquities. Now surely me thinkes, that Theſeus in many thinges was much like vnto Romulus. For being both begotten by stealth, and out of lawfull matrimony: both were reputed to be borne of the seede of the goddes.

Theſeus and Romulus very like.

Both valiant were, as all the world doth know.

Both ioynd valiancy with gouernment. The one of them built ROME, and the other, by gathering into one disperſed people, erected the cite of ATHENS: two of the most noble cities of the worlde. The one and the other were rauishers of women: and neither thone nor thother coulde auoyde the mischiefe of quarrell and contention with their frendes, nor the reproch of staining them selues with the blood of their nearest kinsmen. Moreouer, they say that both the one and the other in the end did get the hate and ill will of their citizens: at the least if we will beleue that reporte of Theſeus, which carieth greatest show of truth. Theſeus of his fathers side, was descended of the right lineage of Erichon the great, and of the first inhabitants which occupied the contrie of ATTICA, the which since were called Autochthones, as much to say, as borne of them selues. For there is no memorie, or other mention made, that they came out of any other contrie than that. And of his mothers side he came of Pelops, who was in his time the mightiest king of all the contrie of PELOPONNESVS, not so much for his goodes and richesse, as for the number of children which he had. For his daughters which were many in number, he bestowed on the greatest Lordes of all the contrie: his sonnes also, which likewise were many, he disperſed into diuerſe cities and free townes, findinge meanes to make them gouernors and heades of the same. Pithes, grandfather to Theſeus on the mothers side, was one of his sonnes, and founded the litle city of TROEZEN, and was reputed to be one of the wisest men of his time. But the knowledge and wisdom, which onely caried estimation at that time, consisted altogether in graue sentences, and morall sayings. As those are which wanne the Poet Hesiodus such fame for his booke intituled, The workes and dayes: in the which is read euen at this present, this goodly sentence, which they father D vpon Pithes.

Pelops, king of Peloponnesus.

Pithes the grandfather of Theſeus. The wisdom of Pithes.

Thou shalt performe, thy promise and thy pay: to hyred men, and that without delay.

And this doth Aristotle the Philosopher himselfe testifie: and the Poet Euripides also, calling Hippolytus the scholler of the holy Pithes, doth sufficiently declare of what estimation he was. But Aegens desiring (as they say) to know how he might haue children, went vnto the city of DELPHES to the oracle of Apollo: where by Apollos Nunne that notable prophecy was geuen him for an answer. The which did forbid him to touch or know any woman, untill he was returned againe to ATHENS. And because the words of this prophecy were somewhat darke, & hard: he tooke his way by the city of TROEZEN, to tell it vnto Pithes. The wordes of the prophecy were theſe.

Aegens the father of Theſeus.

O thou which art a gemme of perfect grace, plucke not the tappe, out of thy trusty ioune: Before thou do, returne vnto thy place, in Athens to come from whence thy race doth rooſe.

Pithes vnderstanding the meaning, perswaded him, or rather cunningly by some deuise deceiued him in such sorte, that he made him to lye with his daughter called AEthra. Aegens after he had accompanied with her, knowing that she was Pithes daughter with whom he had lye, and douting that he had gotten her with child: left her a sword and a payer of shoes, the which he hidde vnder a great hollow stone, the hollownes whereof serued iust to receiue those things which he layed vnder it, and made no liuing creature priuy to it but her alone, straightly charging her, that if she happened to haue a sonne, when he were come to mans state, & of strength

A strength to remoue the stone, and to take those things from vnder it which he left there: that she should then sende him vnto him by those tokens, as secretly as she could, that no body els might knowe of it. For he did greatly feare the children of one called Pallas, the which laye in wayte and spyall by all the meanes they could to kill him, only of despight because he had no children, they being fiftie brethren, and all begotten of one father. This done, he departed from her. And AEthra within fewe monethes after was deliuered of a goodly sonne, the which from that time was called Theſeus: and as some say, so called, because of the tokens of knowledge his father had layed vnder the stone. Yet some others write, that it was after wardes at ATHENS when his father knewe him, and auowed him to his sonne. But in the meane time, during his infancie & childehood, he was brought vp in the house of his grandfather Pithes, vnder the gouernment & teaching of one called Comidas, his schoolemaster: in honour of whom the ATHENIANS to this daye doe sacrifice a weather, the daye before the great feast of Theſeus, hauing more reason to honour the memorie of this gouernour, then of a Silanon and of a Parrhasius, to whom they doe honour all, because they paynted and caste mouldes of the images of Theſeus. Now there was a custome at that time in GREECE, that the yong men after their infancie and growth to mans state, went vnto the citie of DELPHES, to offer parte of their heares in the temple of Apollo. Theſeus also went thither as other did: and some saye that the place where the ceremonie of this offering was made, hath euer since kept the olde name, (and yet continueth) Theſeia. Howbeit he dyd not shau his head but before only, as Homer sayeth, like the facion of the ABANTES in olde time: and this manner of shauing of heares, was called for C his sake, Theſeida. And as concerning the ABANTES, in trothe they were the very first that shaued them selues after this facion: neuertheles they learned it not of the ARABIANS as it was thought of some, neither dyd they it after the imitation of the MESSIANS. But because they were warlike and valliant men, which did ioyne neere vnto their enemy in battell, and aboue all men of the worlde were skillfullest in fight hande to hande, and woulde keepe their groundes: as the Poet Archilochus witnesseth in these verses.

They vse no synges in foughten fields to haue, nor bended bowes: but swordes and trenchant blades. For in this wise she braue and warlike bande Doe she vse their force which come from Negrepoint.

The cause why they were thus shauen before, was, for that their enemies should not haue the vantage to take them by the heares of the head while they were fighting. And for this selfe same consideration, Alexander the great commaunded his captaines to cause all the MACEDONIANS to shau their beards: because it is the easiest holde (and readiest for the hande) a man can haue of his enemy in fighting, to holde him fast by the same. But to returne to Theſeus. AEthra his mother had euer vnto that time kept it secret from him, who was his true father. And Pithes also had geuen it out abroade, that he was begotten of Neptune, because the TROEZIENS haue this god in great veneration, and doe worshippe him as patron and protector of their citie, making offerings to him of their first frutes: and they haue for the marke and stampe of their money, the three picked mace, which is the signe of Neptune, called his Trident. But after he was come to the prime and lustines of his youth, and that with the strength of his bodie he shewed a great courage, ioynd with a naturall wisdom, and stayndes of wit: then his mother brought him to the place where this great hollowe stone laye, and telling him truly the order of his birth, and by whom he was begotten, made him to take his fathers tokens of knowledge, which he had hidden there, & gaue him counsell to goe by sea to ATHENS vnto him. Theſeus easily lyft vp the stone, and tooke his fathers tokens from vnder it: Howbeit he answered playnely, that he would not goe by sea, notwithstanding that it was a great deale the safer waye, and that his mother and grandfather both had instantly intreated him, because the waye by lande from TROEZEN to ATHENS was very dangerous, all the wayes A ij.

being beset by robbers and murderers. For the world at that time brought forth men, which A for strongnesse in their armes, for swyftnesse of feete, and for a generall strength of the whole bodye, dyd farre passe the common force of others, and were neuer wearie for any labour or trauell they tooke in hande. But for all this, they neuer employed these giftes of nature to any honest or profitable thing, but rather delighted villanously to hurte and wronge others: as if all the fruite and profit of their extraordinary strength had consisted in crueltye, & violence only, and to be able to keepe others vnder and in subiection, and to force, destroye, and spoyle all that came to their handes. Thinking that the more parte of those which thincke it a shame to doe ill, and commend iustice, equitie, and humanitie, doe it of fainte cowardly heartes, because they dare not wronge others, for feare they should receyue wronge them selues: and therefore, that they which by might could haue vantage ouer others, had nothing to doe with suche quiet qualities. Nowe Hercules, traueillling abroade in the worlde, B draue away many of those wicked theuif murderers, and some of them he slewe and put to death, other as he passed through those places where they kept, dyd hide them selues for feare of him, and gaue place: in so much as Hercules, perceyuing they were well tamed and brought lowe, made no further reckoning to pursue them any more. But after that by fortune he had slayne Iphitus with his owne handes, and that he was passed ouer the seas into the countrie of LYDIA, where he serued Queene Omphale a long time, condemning him selfe vnto that voluntarie payne, for the murder he had committed. All the Realme of LYDIA during his abode there, remained in great peace and securitie from such kynde of people. Howbeit in GRECE, and all thereabouts, these olde mischiefs beganne againe to renue, growing hotter and violenter then before: because there was no man that punished them, nor that durst take vpon him to destroye them. By which occasion, the waye to goe from PELOPON-NESVS to ATHENS by lande was very perillous. And therefore Pitheus declaring vnto The-seus, what manner of theues there were that laye in the waye, and the outrages and villanies they dyd to all trauellers and wayefaring men, sought the rather to perswade him thereby to take his voyage alonge the seas. Howbeit in mine opinion, the fame and glorie of Hercules noble dedes, had long before secretly sett his hearte on fire, so that he made reckoning of none other but of him, and louingly hearkened vnto those which would seeme to describe him what manner of man he was, but chiefly vnto those which had seene him, and bene in his companye, when he had sayed or done any thing worthy of memorye. For then he dyd D manifestly open him selfe, that he felt the like passion in his hearte, which Themistocles long time afterwards endured, when he sayed: that the victorie and triumphe of Miltiades would not lett him sleepe. For euen so, the wonderfull admiration which Theseus had of Hercules corage, made him in the night that he neuer dreamed but of his noble actes and doings, and in the daye time, pricked forwardes with emulation and enuie of his glorie, he determined with him selfe one daye to doe the like, and the rather, because they were neere kynsmen, being cosins remoued by the mothers side. For Alcmena was the daughter of Pitheus, and Alcmena (the mother of Hercules) was the daughter of Lyfides, the which was halfe sister to Pitheus, bothe children of Pelops and of his wife Hippodamia. So he thought he should be utterly shamed and disgraced, that Hercules trauellling through the worlde in that sorte, dyd E seeke out those wicked theues to rydde both sea & lande of them: & that he, farre otherwise, should fynd occasion that might be offered him, to fight with them that he should meete on his waye. Moreouer, he was of opinion he should greatly shame and dishonour him, whom fame and common bruite of people reported to be his father: if in shunning occasion to fight, he should conuey him selfe by sea, and should carie to his true father also a paire of shoes, (to make him knowne of him) and a sword not yet bathed in bloude. Where he should rather seeke cause, by manifest token of his worthe dedes, to make knowne to the worlde, of what noble bloude he came, and from whence he was descended. With this determination, Theseus holdeth on his purposed iorney, with intent to hurte no man, yet to defende him selfe, & to be reuenged of those which would take vpon them to assault him. F The first therefore whom he slewe within the territories of the citie of EPIDAVRYM, was a robber called Periphetes. This robber vied for his ordinarie weapon to carie a clubbe, and for

A for that cause he was commonly furnamed Corymbes, that is to saye, a clubbe caryer. So he first strake at Theseus to make him stande: but Theseus fought so lustely with him, that he killed him. Whereof he was so glad, and chiefly for that he had wonne his clubbe, that euer after he caryed it him selfe about with him, as Hercules dyd the lyons skynne. And like as this spoyle of the lyon dyd witness the greatnesse of the beast which Hercules had slayne: euen lo Theseus went all about, shewing that this clubbe which he had gotten out of anothers handes, was in his owne handes inuincible. And lo going on further, in the streights of PELOPON-NESVS he killed another, called Sinus furnamed Pityocamtes, that is to saye, a wreather, or bower of pyne apple trees: whom he put to death in that selfe cruell manner that Sinus had slayne many other trauellers before. Not that he had experience thereof, by any former B practise or exercise: but only to shewe, that cleane strength could doe more, then either arte or exercise. This Sinus had a goodly fayer daughter called Perigouna, which fled awaye, when he sawe her father slayne: whom he followed and fought all about. But she had hyde-den her selfe in a groue full of certen kyndes of wilde pricking rushes called Stabe, and wilde sparage, which the simplye like a childe intreated to hyde her, as if they had heard and had sense to vnderstand her: promising them with an othe, that if they faued her from being founde, she would neuer cutt them downe, nor burne them. But Theseus fynding her, called her, and sware by his faith he would vse her gently, and doe her no hurte, nor displeasure at all. Vpon which promise she came out of the bush, and laye with him, by whom she was conceyued of a goodly boye, which was called Menalippus. Afterwards Theseus married C her vnto one Deionus, the sonne of Eurisus the Oechalian. Of this Menalippus, the sonne of Theseus, came Ioxus: the which with Ornyus brought men into the countrie of CARIA, where he buylte the citie of IOXIDES. And hereof cometh that olde auncient ceremonie, observed yet vnto this daye by those of IOXIDES, neuer to burne the bryars of wilde spa-rage, nor the Stabe, but they haue them in some honour and reuerence. Touching the wilde sauage fowe of Crommyon, otherwise furnamed Phas, that is to saye, ouergrowen with agge, the was not a beast to be made light account of, but was very fierce, and terrible to kylle.
Theseus notwithstanding taryed for her, and kylled her in his iorney, to the ende it shoulde not appeare to the worlde, that all the valliant dedes he dyd, were done by compulsion, and of necessity: adding thereto his opinion also, that a valliant man should not onely fight D with men, to defend him selfe from the wicked: but that he should be the first, to assaulte and slaye wilde hurtefull beastes. Neuertheles others haue written, that this Phas was a woman robber, a murderer, and naught of her bodye, which spoyled those that passed by the place called CROMMYONIA, where she dwelt: and that she was furnamed a fowe, for her beastly brutish behauiour, and wicked life, for the which in the ende she was also slayne by Theseus. After her he kylled Sciron, entering into the territories of MEGARA, because he robbed all trauellers by the waye, as the common report goeth: or as others saye, for that of a cruell, wicked, and sauage pleasure, he put forth his feete to those that passed by the sea side, and compelled them to washe them. And then when they thought to stowe to doe it, he still spurned them with his feete, till he thrust them hedlong into the sea: so Theseus threw him E hedlong downe the rockes. Howbeit the writers of MEGARA impugning this common reporte, and desirous (as Simonides sayeth) to ouerthrowe it that had continued by prescription of time: dyd mainteine that this Sciron was neuer any robber, nor wicked personne, but rather a pursuer and punisher of the wicked, and a friend and a kynsmen of the most honest, and iustest men of GRECE. For there is no man but will confesse, that Aeacus was the most vertuous man among the GRECIANS in his time, and that Cythereus the SALA-MINIAN is honoured and reuerenced as a god at ATHENS: and there is no man also but knoweth, that Peleus and Telamon were men of singular vertue. Nowe it is certaine, that this Sciron was the sonne in lawe of Cythereus, father in lawe of Aeacus, and grandfather of Peleus and of Telamon, the which two were the children of Endeida, the daughter of the fayed F Sciron, and of his wife Chariclo. Also it is not very likely, that so many good men would haue had affinitie with so naughty and wicked a man: in taking of him, and geuing him that, which men loue best of all things in the worlde. And therefore the Historiographers

The Laberintus a prison in Creta.

Of the Bottians. Plin. lib. 4. cap. 2.

King Minos defeated by the Poets in the theatres at Athens.

Radamanthus.

The third time of payment of the tribute.

The Athenians are griev'd to depart with their children.

Theseus offers to go with the children into Creta.

Letts drawn for the children should goe.

But Philochorus writeth, that the CRETANS doe not confesse that, but saye that this Laberintus was a gayle or prison, in the which they had no other hurte, saving that they which were kept there vnder locke and keye, coule not flye nor starre awaye: and that Minos had, in the memorye of his sonne Androgeus, instituted games and playes of prife, where he gaue vnto them that wanne the victorie, those younge children of ATHENS, the which in the meane time notwithstanding were carefully kept and looked vnto in the prison of the Laberintus: and that at the first games that were kept, one of the Kings captaines called Taurus, who was in best credit with his master, wanne the prife. This Taurus was a churlish, and naughtie natured man of condition, and very harden'd cruell to these children of ATHENS. And to verifie the same, the philosopher Aristotle him selfe, speaking of the common wealth of the BOTTIANS, declareth very well, that he neuer thought that Minos dyd at any time cause the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but sayeth, that they poorly toyld in Creta euen to crooked age, earning their liuing by true and painefull seruice. For it is written, that the CRETANS (to satisfie an olde vowe of theirs which they had made of auncient time) sent sometimes the first borne of their children, vnto Apollo in the citie of DELPHES: and that amongst them they also mingled those, which were descended of the auncient prisoners of ATHENS, and they went with them. But because they coule not lue there, they directed their iorney first into ITALIE, where for a time they remained in the realme of PYGLIA, and afterwards from thence went into the confines of THRACIA, where they had this name of BOTTIANS. In memory whereof, the daughters of the BOTTIANS in a solemne sacrifice they make, doe vie to singe the foote of this songe: Let vs to ATHENS goe. But thereby we maye see howe perillous a thing it is, to fall in displeasure and enmitie with a citie, which can speake well, and where learning and eloquence dothe florithe. For euer fince that time, Minos was alwayes blased and disgraced through out all the Theaters of ATHENS. The testimonie of Hesiodus, who calleth him the most worthe King, dothe nothing helpe him at all, nor the prayse of Homer, who nameth him Iupiters famillier friende: because the tragical Poets gott the vpper hand in disgracing him, notwithstanding all these. And vpon their stages where all the tragedies were played, they still gaue forth many ill fauored wordes, and fowle speeches of him: as against a man that had bene most cruell and vnaturall. Yet most men thincke, that Minos was the King which established the lawes: and Radamanthus the iudge and preferuer of them, who caused the same also to be kept and obserued. The time now being comen about for payment of the thirde tribute, when they came to compell the fathers which had children not yet married, to geue them to be put forth to take their chaunce and lotte: the citizens of ATHENS beganne to murmure against Aegesus, alledging for their grieues, that he who onely was the cause of all this euill, was onely alone exempted from this grieue. And that to bring the government of the Realme, to fall into the handes of a stranger his bastard: he cared not though they were bereft of all their naturall children, and were vnaturally compelled to leaue and forsake them. These iust forrowes and complaints of the fathers, whose children were taken from them, dyd pearce the harte of Theseus, who willing to yelde to reason, and to ronne the selfe same fortune as the citizens dyd: willingly offered him selfe to be sent thither, without regarde taking to his happe or aduenture. For which, the citizens greatly esteemed of his corage and honorable disposition, and dearely loued him for the good affection, he seemed to beare vnto the comunalitie. But Aegesus hauing vied many reasons and perswasions, to cause him to turne, and staye from his purpose, and perceyuing in the ende there was no remedie but he would goe: he then drew lottes for the children which should goe with him. Hellanicus notwithstanding dothe write, that they were not those of the citie which drew lottes for the children they should sende, but that Minos him selfe went thither in person and dyd chuse them, as he chose Theseus the first, vpon conditions agreed betwene them: that is to wit, that the ATHENIANS should furnishe them with a shippe, and that the children should hippe and imbarke with him, carying no weapons of warre: and that after the death of the Minotaur, this tribute should cease. Nowe before that time, there was neuer any hope of returne, nor of safetie of their children: therefore the ATHENIANS all-ways wayes sent a shippe to conuey their children with a blacke fayle, in token of assured losse. Neuertheles Theseus putting his father in good hope of him, being of a good corage, and promising boldly that he would sett vpon this Minotaur: Aegesus gaue vnto the master of the shippe a white fayle, commaunding him that at his returne he should put out the white fayle if his sonne had elcaped, if not, that then he should sett vp the blacke fayle, to shew him a farre of his vnclucky and vnfortunate chaunce. Simonides notwithstanding doeth saye, that this fayle which Aegesus gaue to the master, was not white, but redde, dyed in graine, and of the culler of scarlett: and that he gaue it him to signifie a farre, of their deliguerie and safetie. This master was called Phereclus Amasias, as Simonides sayeth. But Philochorus writeth, that Scirus the SALAMINIAN gaue to Theseus a master called Nausithemus, and another marriner to tackle the fayles, who was called Phaas: because the ATHENIANS at that time were not greatly practised to the sea. And this did Scirus, for that one of the children on whom the lott fell was his nephewe: and thus muche the chappells doe of the children who the lott fell was in honour of Nausithemus, and of Phaas, in the village of Phalerus: ioyning to the temple of Scirus. And it is sayed moreover, that the feast which they call Cybernesia, that is to saye, the feast of Patrons of the (hippes), is celebrated in honour of them. Nowe after the lotts were drawn, Theseus taking with him the children allotted for the tribute, went from the pallace to the temple called Delphinion, to offer vp to Apollo for him and for them, an offering of supplication which they call Hiceteria: which was an olyue bough hallowed, wreathed about with white wolles. After he had made his prayer, he went downe to the sea side to imbarke, the fixt daye of the moneth of Marche: on which daye at this present time they doe sende their younge girles to the same temple of Delphinion, there to make their prayers and petitions to the goddesses. But some saye, that the oracle of Apollo in the citie of DELPHES had answered him, that he should take Venus for his gyde, and that he should call vpon her to conduct him in his voyage: for which cause he dyd sacrifice a goate vnto her vpon the sea side, which was founde sodainly turned into a ramme, and that herefore they furnishe this goddess Epitragia, as one would saye, the goddess of the ramme. Furthermore, after he was arriued in Creta, he slew there the Minotaur (as the most parte of auncient authors doe write) by the meanes and helpe of Ariadne: who being fallen in fauour with him, dyd geue him a clue of threede, by the helpe whereof he taught him, howe he might easely winde out of the turnings and crankes of the Labyrinth. And they saye, that hauing killed this Minotaur, he returned backe againe the same waye he went, bringing with him those other younge children of ATHENS, whom with Ariadne also he caried afterwards awaye. Phereclus sayeth moreover, that he brake the keeles or bottomes of all the shippes of Creta, because they should not sodainly sett out after them. And Demon writeth, that Taurus (the captaine of Minos) was killed in a fight by Theseus, euen in the very hauen mowthe as they were readye to shippe awaye, and hoyle vp fayle. Yet Philochorus reporteth, that king Minos hauing sett vp the games, as he was wont to doe yerely in the honour and memorye of his sonne, euery one beganne to enuy captaine Taurus, because they euer looked that he should carie awaye the game and victorie, as he had done other yeres before: ouer and that, his authoritie got him much ill will and enuy, because he was proude and stately, and had in suphorition that he was great with Queene Pasiphae. Wherefore when Theseus required he might encounter with Taurus, Minos easely graunted it. And being a solemne cutoime in Creta that the women should be present, to see these open sportes and fights: Ariadne being at these games amongst the rest, fell further in loue with Theseus, seeing him so goodly a person, so stronge, and inuincible in wrestling, that he farre exceeded all that wrestled there that daye. King Minos was so glad that he had taken awaye the honour from captaine Taurus, that he sent him home francke and free into his countrye, rendering to him all the other prisoners of ATHENS: and for his sake, clearly releafed and forgave the citie of ATHENS the tribute, which they should haue payed him yerely. Howbeit Clidemus searcing out the beginning of these things to thutmost, reciteth them very particularly, and after another sorte. For he sayeth, about that time there was a generall restraint through out all

GRECE, refrayning all manner of people to beare sayle in any vessell or bottome, wherein there were aboute fiew perſones, except only Iafon, who was chofen captaine of the great ſhippe Argus, and had commiſſion to ſayle euery where, to chafe and driue awaye rōuers and pyrates, and to ſcoure the ſeas through out. About this time, Dadalus being fled from CRETA to ATHENS in a litle bark: Minos contrarie to this refraint, woulde needes followe him with a fleet of diuers ſhalp with owers, who being by force of weather driuen with the coafte of SICILE, forturned to dye there. Afterwardes his ſonne Deucalion, being marci-louſly offended with the ATHENIANS, ſent to ſummon them to deliuer Dadalus vnto him, or els he woulde put the children to death, which were deliuered to his father for hoſtages.
But Theſeus excuſed him ſelfe, and ſayed he coulde not forſake Dadalus, conſidering he was his neere kynſleman, being his cofin germaine, for he was the ſonne of Merope, the daughter of Erichonides. Howbeit by and by he cauſed many veſſels ſecretly to be made, parte of them rygged out, he tooke ſea before the CRETANS had any knowledge of it: in ſo much as when they ſawe them a ſarre, of they dyd take them for the barkes of their friends. Theſeus landed without reſiſtance, and tooke the hauen. Then hauing Dadalus, and other baniſhed CRE-TANS for guydes, he entred the citie ſelfe of GNOSVS, where he ſlewe Deucalion in a fight before the gates of the Labyrinth, with all his garde and officers about him. By this meanes the kingdom of CRETA fell by inheritance into the hands of his ſiſter Ariadne. Theſeus made league with her, and carryed away the yong children of ATHENS, which were kept as hoſtages, and concluded peace and amytie betwene the ATHENIANS and the CRETANS: who promiſed, and ſware, they woulde neuer make warres againſt them. They reporte many other things alſo touching this matter, and ſpecially of Ariadne: but there is no trothe nor certeinie in it. For ſome ſaye, that Ariadne hongre her ſelfe for ſorowe, when the ſawe that Theſeus had caſte her of. Other write, that ſhe was tranſported by mariners into the Ile of NAXOS, where ſhe was married vnto Oenarbus, the prieſt of Bacchus: and they thincke that The- ſeus leſte her, becauſe he was in loue with another, as by theſe verſes ſhoulde appeare.

Aegles the Nymphe, vv as loued of Theseus, vvhich vv as the daughter of Panopew.

Hereas the Megarian sayeth, that these two verses in olde time were among the verses of the Poet Hesiodus, howbeit Pisistratus tooke them awaye: as he dyd in like manner as these other here in the description of the helles in Homer, to gratifie the ATHENIANS.

Bolde Theseus, and Pirithous stovvte, descended both from godds immortall race, Triumphing still, this vvearie vvorlde aboute in feats of armes, and many a comly grace.

Other holde opinion, that Ariadne had two children by Theſeus: the one of them was named OEnopion, and the other Staphylus. Thus amongst others the Poet Ion writeth it, who was borne in the Ile of CHEOS, and ſpeaking of his citty, he ſayeth thus:

OEnopion which was the sonne, of worthy Theseus did cause men buylde, this stately towne which now we triumpheth thus.

Nowe what things are founde feemly in Poets fables, there is none but dothe in manner fynge them. But one Paenon borne in the citie of A MATHYNIA, reciteth this cleane after another forte, and contrarie to all other: faying, that Thesus by tempest was driuen with the lle of CYPRVS, hauing with him Ariadne, which was great with childe, and so fore fate fycke, that she was not able to abide it. In so muche as he was forced to put her a lande, and him selfe afterwards returning abourde hoping to faue his shippe againt the storme, was forthwith compelled to loofe into the sea. The women of the cuntry dyd courteously receyue and intreate Ariadne: and to comforte her againe, (for she was maruiculously oute of hart, to

A see the was thus forsaken) they counterfeited letters, as if Theseus had written them to her. And when her groning time was come, and she to be layed, they did their best by all possible meanes to faue her: but she dyed notwithstanding in labour, and could neuer be deliuered. So she was honorably buried by the Ladies of CYPRVS. Theseus not long after returned thither againe, who tooke her death maruelous heauily, and left money with the inhabitants of the countrie, to sacrifice vnto her yearly: and for memorie of her, he caused two litle images to be molten, the one of copper, and the other of siluer, which he dedicated vnto her. This sacrifice is done the seconde day of September, on which they doe yet obserue this ceremonie: they doe lay a young childe vpon a bed, which pitiefully cryeth and lamenteth, as women trauellinge with childe. They saye also, that the AMATHYIANS doe yet call the

B where of her tombe is sette vp, the wodde of Venus Adriadne. And yet there are of the NAXIANS, that reporte this otherwise: saying, there were two Amores, and two Adriadnes, whereof the one was married to Bacchus in the Ile of NAXOS, of whome Staphylus was borne: and the other the youngelt, was rauished and caried away by Theseus, who afterwards forsooke her, and she came into the Ile of NAXOS with her nyce, called Corycna, whose graue honour doth to her after her death, as to the first was geuen. For they celebrate the feast of the first with all ioye and mirth: where the sacrifices done in memorie of the seconde, be mingled with mourning and sorowe. Theseus then departing from the Ile of CRETA, arriued in the Ile of DELOS, where he did sacrifice in the temple of Apollo, and gaue there a litle image of Venus, which he had gotten of Adriadne. Then with the other young boyes that he had deliuered, he daunced a kinde of daunce, which the DELIANS keepe to this day, as they say: in which there are many turnes and returns, much after the turnings of the Labyrinth. And the DELIANS call this manner of daunce, the crane, as Dicaeareus sayeth. And Theseus daunced it first about the altar, which is called Ceraton, that is to saye, hornestaffe: because it is made and builded of hornes onely, all on the left hand well and curiously sette together without any other bindinge. It is sayed also that he made a game in this Ile of DELOS, in which at the first was geuen to him that ouercame, a branche of palme for reward of victorie. But when they drew neere the coast of ATTICA, they were loyfull, he and his master, that they forgoate to set vp their white sayle, by which they shoulde haue

D iuen knowledge of their healtie and safetie vnto AEGEUS. Who seeinge the blacke sayle a farre off, being out of all hope euenmore to see his sonne againe, tooke such a grieue at his harte, that he threw him selfe headlong from the top of a clyffe, and killed him selfe. So soone as Theseus was arriued at the porte named Phalerus, he performed the sacrifices which he had vowed to the goddess at his departure: and sent an Herald of his before vnto the city, to carie newes of his late arriuall. The Herald founde many of the cite mourning the death of king AEGEUS. Many other receiued him with great ioy, as may be supposed. They would haue crowned him also with a garlande of flowers, for that he had brought fo good tidings, that the children of the cite were returned in safetie. The Herald was content to take the garlande, yet would he not in any wise put it on his head, but did winde it about his Heraults

E rodde he bare in his hande, and so returneth forthwith to the sea, where Theseus made his sacrifices. Who perceiuing they were not yett done, did refuse to enter into the temple, and stayed without for troubling of the sacrifices. Afterwards all ceremonies finished, he went in and told him the newes of his fathers death. Then he and his company mourning for sorowe, halted with the speedes towards the cite. And this is the cause, why to this day, at the feast called Oscophoria (as who would say at the feast of boughes) the Herald hath not his heade but his rod onely crowned with flowers, and why the assistants also after the sacrifice done, doe make such cryes and exclamations: Ele, leuf, ion, ion: whereof the first is the crye and voyce they commonly vse one to an other to make haste, or else it is the soote of some songe of triumphe: and the other is the crye and voyce of men as it were in feare and trouble. After he had ended the obsequies and funeralls for his father, he performed also his sacrifices vnto Apollo, which he had vowed the seventh day of the moneth of OCTOBER, on which they argued at their returne into the cite of ATHENS. The galles

Howbeit there are some which will say, that these veries were made for the Heraclides, that is to say, those that descended from Hercules: which flying for their safety and succour vnto the Athenians, were entertained & much made of by them for a time. But the most parte holde returned, was a galliot of thirtie owes, which the Athenians kept vntill the time of Demetrius the Phalerian, alwayes taking away the olde peeces of wodde that were rotten, and euer renewing them with new in their places. So that euer since, in the disputations of the Philosophers, touching things that increase, to wit, whether they remaine alwayes one, or else they be made others: this galliot was alwayes brought in for an example of doubt. For some maintained, that it was still one vessell: others to the contrary defended it was not so. And they holde opinion also, that the feast of boughes which is celebrated at Athenes at this time, was then first of all instituted by Theseus. It is sayed moreover, that he did not carie all the wenchies vpon whom the lots did fall, but chose two fayre young boyes, whose faces were swete and delicate as maydens be, that otherwise were hardie, and quicke sighted. But he made them so oft bathe them selues in whote bathes, and kepe them in from the heate of the sunne, and so many times to washe, anointe, and rubbe them selues with oyles which serue to supple and smoothe their skinned, to keepe freshe and fayer their colour, to make yellowe and bright their heates: and withall did teache them so to counterfeate their speache, countenance and facion of young maydes, that they seemed to be like them, rather then young boyes. For there was no manner of difference to be perceived outwardly, and he mingled them with the girles, in which both he and the other young boyes, were apparelled then as they be now, which carie boughes on the day of the feast in their hands. They carie them in the honor of Bacchus and Ariadne, following the fable that is tolde of them: or rather bicause they returned home iust at the time and season, when they gather the fruite of those trees. There are women which they call Deipnophores, that is to say, supper cariers, which are assistants to the sacrifice done that day, in representing the mothers of those, vpon whom the lottes did fall, bicause they in like sorte brought them both meate and drinke. There they tell tales, for so did their mothers tattle to their children, to comforte and encourage them. All these particularities were written by Demon the historiographer. There was moreover a place chosen out to build him a temple in, and he him self ordained, that those houses which had payed tribute before vnto the king of Creta, should now yearly thenceforth become contributories towards the charges of a solemne sacrifice, which should be done in the honor of him: and he did assigne the order and administration of the same, vnto the house of the Phyalides, in recompence of the curtesie which they showed him when he arriued. Furthermore, after the death of his father AEgeus, prouince of Attica, to be within the citie of Athenes, and made them all one corporation, which were before disperled into diuerse villages, and by reason thereof were very hard to be assembled together, when occasion was offered to establish any order concerning the common state. Many times also they were at variance together, & by the eares, making warres one vpon another. But Theseus tooke the paines to goe from village to village, and from family, to familie, to let them vnderstand the reasons why they should consent vnto it. So he found the poore people

A people and priuate men, ready to obey and followe his will: but the riche, and such as had authority in euery village, all against it. Neuertheles he wanne them, promising that it should be a common wealth, and not subiect to the power of any sole prince, but rather a populer state. In which he woulde only referue to him selfe the charge of the warres, and the preteration of the lawes: for the rest, he was content that euery citizen in all and for all should beare a like sway and authority. So there were some that willingly graunted thereto. Other who had no liking thereof, yielded notwithstanding for feare of his displeasure and power which then was very great. So they thought it better to consent with good will, vnto that he required: then to tary his forcible compulsion. Then he caused all the places where iustice was ministred, and all their halles of assembly to be ouerthrowen and pulled downe. He remoued straight allindges and officers, and built a towne house, and a counsaill hall, in the place where the citie now standeth, which the Athenians call Asty, but he called the whole corporation of them, Athenes. Afterwardes he instituted the greatesse feast and common sacrifice for all of the countrey of Attica, which they call Panathenea. Then he ordained another feast also vpon the sixteenth day of the moneth of Iune, for all strangers which should come to dwell in Athenes, which was called Metacia, & is kept euen to this day. That done, he gaue ouer his regall power according to his promise, and beganne to sett vpon an estate, or policie of a common wealth, beginning first with the seruice of the goddes. To knowe the good successe of his enterprife, he sent at the very beginning to the oracle of Apollo in *Dalphe*s, to enquire of the fortune of this citie: from whence this aunswer was brought vnto him.

It is founde written also that Sibylla afterwardes gaue out suche a like oracle ouer the citie of Athenes.

The bladder blowen maye flete vpon the fludde, but cannot synke, nor sicke in filthy mudde.

Moreover, bicause he woulde further yet augment his people, and enlarge his citie, he entiled many to come and dwell there, by offering them the selfe same freedome and priuiledges, which the naturall borne citizens had. So that many iudge, that these wordes which are in vse at this daye in Athenes, when any open proclamation is made, All people, Come ye hither be the selfe same which Theseus then caused to be proclaimed, when he in that sorte dyd gather a people together of all nations. Yet for all that, he suffered not the great multitude that came thither tagge and ragge, to be without distinction of degrees & orders. For he first diuided the noble men, from husbandmen and artificers, appointing the noble men as iudges & magistrates to iudge vpon matters of Religiō, & touching the seruice of the godds: & of them also he dyd chuse rulers, to beare ciuill office in the common weale, to determine the lawe, and to tell all holy and diuine things. By this meanes he made the noble men and the two other estates equal in voyce. And as the noblemen dyd passe the other in honour: euen so the artificers exceeded them in number, & the husbandmen them in profit. Nowe that Theseus was the first who of all others yielded to haue a common weale or populer estate (as Aristotle sayeth) and dyd geue ouer his regall power: Homer selfe semeth to testifie it, in numbering the shippes which were in the Gracians armie before the citie of Troia. For amongst all the Gracians, he only calleth the Athenians people. Moreover Theseus coyned money, which he marked with the stampe of an oxe, in memory of the bulle of Marathon, or of Taurus the captaine of Minos, or els to prouoke his citizens to geue them selues to labour. They saye also that of this money they were since called Hecatombæon, & Decabæon, which signifieth worth a hundred oxen, and worth tenne oxen. It was he also which made the games called Isthmia, after the imitation of Hercules, to the end that as the Grecians dyd celebrate the feast of games called Olympia, in the honour of Imptyr, by Hercules ordinance: so, that they should also celebrate the games called Isthmia, by his order and institution, in the honour of Neptune. For those that were done in the Isthraits in the honour of Melicerta, were done in the night, & had rather game of faincice or of a mysterie, then of games & open feast. Yet some will saye, that these games of Isthmia were instituted in the honour & memorie of Sciron, & that Theſeus ordained them in satisfaction of his death: because he was his coſin germaine, being the sonne of Canethus, and of Heniocha the daughter of Pitheus. Other saye that it was Sinnis and not Sciron, and that for him Theſeus made these games, and not for the memorie of the other. Howsoever it was, he specially willed the CORIN-THIANs, that they should geue vnto those that came from Athenes to see their games of Isthmia, so much place to sit downe before them (in the most honorable parte of the feast place) as the aile of their shippes should couer, in the which they came from Athenes: thus doe Hellnicus & Andron Halicarnassens write hereof. Touching the voyage he made by the sea Mell-philochorus, & some other holde opinion, that he went thither with Hercules against the AMA-ZONES: and that to honour his valianties, Hercules gaue him Antiopea the AMAZONE. But the more parte of the other Historiographers, namely Hellanicus, Pherecides, & Herodotus, doe write, that Theſeus went thither alone, after Hercules voyage, & that he tooke this AMAZONE prisoner, which is likeliest to be true. For we doe not finde that any other who went this iorney with him, had taken any AMAZONE prisoner besides him selfe. Bion also the Historiographer, this notwithstanding sayeth, that he brought her away by deceit and stealth. For the AMAZO-NES (sayeth he) naturally louing men, dyd not die at all when they sawe them lide in their countrey, but sent them presents, & that Theſeus enticed her to come into his shippe, who brought him a present: & so lone as she was aborde, he hoided his sayle, & so caried her away. Another Historiographer Meneceates, who wrote the historie of the citie of Nicea, in the countrye of Bythinia, sayeth: that Theſeus hauing this AMAZONE Antiope with him, remained a certaine time vpon those coasts, & that amongst other he had in his companie three yonge brethern of Athenes, Enneus, Thois, & Solois. This last, Solois, was maruellously in loue with Ant-iopea, and neuer bewrayed it to any of his other companions, fauing vnto one with whom he was most familiar, and whom he trusted best: so that he reported this matter vnto Ant-iopea. But the vterly reiected his sute, though otherwise he handled it wifely and curteously, and dyd not complaine to Theſeus of him. Howbeit the younge man despairing to enioye his loue, tooke it so inwardly, that desperately he leapt into the riuier, and drowned him selfe. Whiche when Theſeus vnderstoode, and the cause also that brought him to this desperation and ende: he was very forye, and angrie also. Whereupon he remembered a certein ordle of Pythia, by whom he was commaunded to buyld a citie in that place in a straunge countrey, where he should be most forye, and that he should leaue some that were about him at that time, to gouerne the same. For this cause therefore he built a citie in that place, which he named Pythopolis, because he had built it only by the commaundement of the Nunne Pythia. He called the riuier in the which the younge man was drowned, Solois, in memorie of him: and left his two brethren for his deputies and as gouernours of this newe citie, with another gentleman of Athenes, called Hermus. Hereof it cometh, that at this daye the Py-thopolitans call a certain place of their citie, Hermus houle. But they sayle in the accent, F by putting it vpon the last syllable: for in pronouncing it so, Hermus signifieth Mercurie. By this meanes they doe transferre the honour due to the memorie of Hermus, vnto the god Mercurie.

Nowe

A Now heare what was the occasion of the warres of the AMAZONS, which me thinckes was not a matter of small moment, nor an enterprife of a woman. For they had not place their campe within the very citie of ATHENS, nor had not fought in the very place it selfe (called Pnyce) adioyning to the temple of the Muses, if they had not first conquered or lubbud all the countrye thereabouts: neither had they all comen at the first, so valiantly to assaile the citie of ATHENS. Now, whether they came by lande from so farrea countrye, or that they passed ouer an arme of the sea, which is called Bosphorus Cimmericus, being frolen as Hellenicus sayeth: it is hardly to be credited. But that they campt within the precinct of the very citie it selfe, the names of the places which cōtinue yet to this present daye doe witness it, & the graues also of the women which dyed there. But fo is it, that both armies laye a great time one in the face of the other, ere they came to battell. Howbeit at the length Theseus hauing first made sacrifice vnto Fear the goddesse, according to the counsaill of a prophetic he had receyued, he gaue them battell in the moneth of August, on the same daye, in the which the ATHENIANS doe euen at this present Iolemnise the feast, which they call Boedromia. But Clidemus the Historiographer, desirous particularly to write all the circumstances of this encounter, sayeth that the left poynte of their battell bent towards the place which they call AMAZONION: and that the right poynte marched by the side of CHRYSA, euen to the place which is called PNYCE, vpon which, the ATHENIANS cōming towards the temple of the Muses, dyd first geue their charge. And for prooe that this is true, the graues of the women which dyed in this first encounter, are founde yet in the great streete, which goeth towards the gate Piraica, neere vnto the chappell of the litle god Chalcodius. And the ATHENIANS s (sayeth he) were in this place repulged by the AMAZONS, euen to the place where the images of Eumenides are, that is to saye, of the furies. But on thother side also, the ATHENIANS cōming towards the quarters of Palladium, Arcturus, & Lucium, draue backe their right poynte euen to within their campe, & slewe a great number of them. Afterwards, at the ende of foure months, peace was taken betweene them by meane of one of the women called Hippolyta. For this Historiographer calleth the AMAZONS which Theseus married, Hippolyta, and not Antiope. Neuertheles, some saye that he was slayne (fighting on Theseus side) with a dart, by another called Molpadia. In memorie whereof, the piller which is ioyning to the temple of the Olympian ground, was set vp in her honour. We are not to maruell, if the historie of things so auncient, be founde so diuersely written. For there are also that

D write, that Queene Antiope lent those secretly which were hurte then into the citie of CALCIDES, where loone of them recovered, & were healed: and others also dyed, which were buried neere to the place called AMAZONION. Howlouer it was, it is most certain that this warre was ended by agreement. For a cause adioyning to the temple of Theseus, dothe beare recorde of it being called Oromosium: because the peace was there by solemn othe concluded. And the sacrifice also dothe the truly verifie it, which they haue made to the AMAZONS, before the feast of Theseus, long time out of minde. They of Megara also doe shewe a tūmbe of the AMAZONS in their citie, which is as they goe fro the market place, to the place they call Rhus: where they finde an auncient tūmbe, cut in facion & forme of a losenge. They saye that there died other of the AMAZONS also, neere vnto the citie of CHARONEA, which were buried all alongst the

E litle broke passing by the same, which in the olde time, (in mine opinion) was called Thermodia. & is now named Hamon, as we haue in other places written in the life of Demothenes. And semeth also, that they dyd not passe through Thessalia, without fighting: for there are legēdies of yether tribes allabout the citie of Scotysa, hard by the rocks, which be called the dog head. And this is that which is worthy memorie (in mine opinion) touching the warres of the AMAZONS. Howe the Poet telleth that the AMAZONS made warres with Theseus to reuē the iniurie he dyd to their Queene Antiope, refusing her, to marye with Phadra: & as for the murder which he telleth that Hercules dyd, that me thinckes is altogether but deuise of Poets. It is very true, that after the death of Antiope, Theseus married Phadra, hauing had before of Antiope sonne called Hippolytus, or as the Poet Pindarus writeth, Demophon. And for that the Historiographers doe not in any thing speake against the tragical Poets, in that which concerneth it, I will hope that chaunced to him, in the persones of this his wife & of his sonne: we must neede take it to be so, as we finde it written in the tragedies. And yet we finde many other reports touching the mariages of Theſeus, whose beginnings had no great good honest ground, neither fell out their endes very fortunate: & yet for all that they haue made no tragedies of them, neither haue they bene played in the Theaters. For we read that he tooke away Anaxo the Thracian; & that after he had killed Sinnis and Cercyon, he tooke their daughters perforce: & that he dyd also marry Peribaea, the mother of Aias, & afterwards Pherebaa, & Ioppa the daughter of Iphicles. And they blame him much also, for that he so lightly tooke his wife Ariadne, for the loue of Aegles the daughter of Panopaeus, as we haue recited before. Lastly, he tooke away Hellen: which rauishment filled all the Realme of Attica with warres, & finally was the very occasion that forced him to forsake his country, and brought him at the length to his ende, as we will tell you hereafter. Albeit in his time other princes of Greece had done many goodly and notable exploits in the warres, yet Herodotus is of opinion, that Theſeus was neuer B in any one of them: sauing that he was at the battell of the Lapithae against the Centauri. Others saye to the contrarie, that he was at the iorney of Cholchide with Iason, & that he dyd helpe Meleager to kill the wilde bore of Calydonia: from whence (as they saye) this prouerbe came: Not without Theſeus. Meaning that such a thing was not done without great helpe of another. Howbeit it is certaine that Theſeus self dyd many famous actes, without ayde of any man, and that for his valianties this prouerbe came in vs, which is spoken: This is another Theſeus. Also he dyd helpe Adrastus king of the Argiues, to recouer the bodies of those that were slayne in the battell, before the citie of Thebes. Howbeit it was not, as the poet Euripides sayeth, by force of armes, after he had ouercome the Thebans in battell: but it was by composition. And thus the greatest number of the most auncient writers doe declare it. Furthermore, Philochorus C writeth, that this was the first treatie that euer was made to recouer the dead bodies slayne in battell: neuertheless we doe read in the histories and gestes of Hercules, that he was the first that euer suffered his enemies to carye away their dead bodies, after they had bene put to the sword. But whoeouer he was, at this daye in the village of Eleutheres, they doe shewe the place where the people were buried, and where princes tumbe are seene about the citie of Eleusyn, which he made at the request of Adrastus. And for testimonie hereof, the tragedie Aeschilus made of the Eleusynians, where he causeth it to be spoken euen thus to Theſeus him self, dothe clerely ouerthrowe the petitioners in Euripides. Touching the friendshippe betwixt Pirithous and him, it is sayed it beganne thus. The renowne of his valliancy was maru-lously blowne abroad through all Greece, & Pirithous desirous to knowe it by experience, D went euen of purpose to inuade his country, and brought away a certaine boote of oxen of his taken out of the country of Marathon. Theſeus being aduertised thereof, armed straight, and went to the rescue. Pirithous hearing of his comming, fled not at all, but returned backe sodainly to mete him. And so sone as they came to see one another, they both wondered at eche others beawtie and corage, and so had they no desire to fight. But Pirithous reaching out his hande first to Theſeus, sayed vnto him. I make you selfe iudge of the damage you haue susteined by my inuasion, and with all my harte I will make suche satisfaction, as it shall please you to aslesse it at. Theſeus then dyd not only releafe him, of all the damages he had done, but also requested him he would become his friend, and brother in armes. Hereupon they were presently sworne brethren in the fildes: after which othe betwixt them, Pirithous married Deidamia, E sent to praye Theſeus to cometo his marriage, to visite his country, & to make merye with the Lapithae. He had bidden also the Centauri to the feast: who being drunke, committed many lewde parties, euen to the forcing of women. Howbeit the Lapithae chafited them so well, that they slewe some of them presently in the place, & draue the rest afterwards out of all the countrye by the helpe of Theſeus, who armed him selfe, and fought on their side. Yet Herodotus writeth the matter somewhat contrarie, saying that Theſeus went not at all vntill the warre was well begonne: & that it was the first time that he sawe Hercules, & spake with him neere vnto the citie of Trachina, when he was then quiet, hauing ended all his farre voyages, & great-test troubles. They report that this meeting together was full of great cheere, much kindnes, and honorable entertainment betwene them, and howe great curtesie was offred to eache other. Nethertheless he thincks we should geue better credit to those writers that saye they mett many times together, and that Hercules was accepted and receyued into the brotherhood of the

A the mysteries of Eleusyn, by the meanes of the countenance and fauour which Theſeus showed vnto him: and that his purification also was thereby allowed of, who was to be purged of necessitye of all his ill deedes and cruelties, before he could enter into the companie of those holy mysteries. Furthermore, Theſeus was fiftie yeres olde when he tooke away Hellen those holy mysteries. And rauished her, which was very young, and not of age to be married, as Hellenicus sayeth. By reason whereof, some seeking to hyde the rauishment of her as a hainous facte, doe report it was not he, but one Idas and Lyncus that caryed her away, who left her in his custodie and keeping: and that Theſeus would haue kept her from them, and would not haue deliuered her to her brethren Castor and Pollux, which afterwards dyd demaunde her againe of him. Others againe saye it was her owne father Tyndarus, who gaue her him to keepe, for that he was asfrayed of Enxiphorus the sonne of Hippocoon, who would haue had her away by force. But that which cometh nearest to the trothe in this case, and which in deede by many authors is testified, was in this sorte. Theſeus & Pirithous went together to the citie of Lacedaemon, where they tooke away Hellen (being yet very younge) euen as she was dauncing in the temple of Diana surnamed Orthis: & they fled for life. They of Lacedaemon sent after her, but those that followed wet no further then the citie of Tegaea. Now when they were escaped out of the countrye of Peloponnesus, they agreed to drawe lots together, which of them two should haue her, with condition that whose lot it were to haue her, he should take her to his wife, & should be bound also to helpe his companion to get him another. It was Theſeus hadde to light upon her, who caryed her to the citie of Aphidnes, because she was yet to younge to be married.
C Whether he cauled his mother to come to bring her vp, & gaue his friend called Aphidnus the charge of them both, recommending her to his good care, & to keepe it so secretly, that no body should knowe what was become of her. Because he would doe the like for Pirithous (according to th'agrement made betwixt the) he went into Epirus with him to steale the daughter of Adioneus, king of the Molossians, who had surnamed his wife Proserpina, his daughter Proserpina, & his dogge Cerberus: with whom he made them fight which came to aske his daughter in marriage, promising to geue her to him that should ouercome his Cerberus. But the King vnderstand-ing that Pirithous was come, not to request his daughter in marriage, but to steale her away, he tooke him prisoner with Theſeus: & as for Pirithous, he cauled him presently to be torne in peeces with his dogge, & shut Theſeus vp in close prison. In this meane time there was one at Athens D called Meneſtheus, the sonne of Peteus: which Peteus was the sonne of Orneus, & Orneus was the sonne of Erichtheus. This Meneſtheus was the first that beganne to flatter the people, & did seeke to winne the fauour of the commonaltie, by swete enticing words: by which deuise he stirred vp the chieftest of the citie against Theſeus (who in deede long before beganne to be wearie of him) by declaring vnto them howe Theſeus had taken from them their royalties & signiorities, & had shut them vp in suche sorte within the walles of a citie, that he might the better keepe them in subiection & obedience in all things, after his will. The poore inferior sorte of people, he dyd stirre vp also to rebellion, perswading them that it was no other then a dreame of libertie which was promised them: & howe contrariwise they were clearly dispossest & throuen out of their own houses, of their temples, & from their naturall places where they were borne, to thend only, E that in lieu of many good & louing lordes which they were wont to haue before, they should now be compelled to serue one only hedde, & a straunge lorde. Euen as Meneſtheus was very hotte about this practise, the warre of the Tyndarides fell out at that instant, which greatly furthered his pretence. For these Tyndarides (to wit the children of Tyndarus) Castor & Pollux, came downe with a great armie, against the citie of Athens: & some suspecte for that Meneſtheus was cause of their comming thither. Howbeit at the first entrie they dyd no hurte at all in the country, but only demaunded restitution of their sister. To whom the citizens made answer, that they knewe not where she was left: & then the brethren beganne to make spoyle, & offer warre in deede. Howbeit there was one called Academos, who hauing knowledge (I can not tell by what meane) that he was secretly hidden in the citie of Aphidnes, recaled it vnto them.
F By reason whereof the Tyndarides did alwayes honour him very much, so long as he liued, & afterwards the Lacedaemonians, hauing ofte burnt & destroyed the whole countrye of Attica throughout, they would yet neuer touch the Academy of Athens for Academos sake.

Alycus sonne Hellen, at the phidnes.

Yet Dicæarchus sayeth, that in the armie of the Tyndarides there were two Arcadians, Echedemus, & Marathus, and howe of the name of one of them, it was then called the place of Echedemie, which fithence hath bene called Academia: & after the name of the other, there was a village called MARATHON, because he willingly offered him self to be sacrificed before the battell, as obeying the order & comādemēt of a prophēcie. So they went & pitched their campe before the citie of APHIDNES, & hauing wōne the battell, & taken the citie by assault, they raced the place. They saye that Alycus, the sonne of Sciron was slaine at this field, who was in the hoste of the Tyndarides, & that after his name, a certaine quarter of the territorie of MEGARA was called Alycus, in the which his bodye was buried. Howbeit Hecæus writeth that Theſeus self dyd kill him before Aphidnes: In wittnes whereof he alledgeth certain verses which speake of Alycus.

VVhile as he fought vvvith all his might anā mayne (in thy defence, fayer Hellen for to fight)

In Aphidnes, vpon the pleasaunt playne, bold Theſeus to cruell deathe him dight.

Howbeit it is not likely to be true, that Theſeus being there, the citie of Aphidnes, & his mother also were taken. But when it was wonne, they of ATHENS beganne to quake for feare, and Menestheus counsellēd them to receyue the Tyndarides into the citie, and to make them good chere, so they would make no warres but vpon Theſeus, which was the first that had done them the wrōg & iniurie: & that to all others they should shewe fauour & good will. And so it fell out. For when the Tyndarides had all in their power to doe as they listed, they demanded nothing els but that they might be receiued into their corporatiō, & not to be reckoned for straungers, no more then Hercules was: the which was graunted the Tyndarides, & Aphidnes dyd adopt them for his childrē, as Pylius had adopted Hercules. Moreover they dyd honour them as if they had bene gods, calling them Anaces. Either because they ceased the warres, or for that they ordered them selues so well, that their whole armie being lodged within the citie, there was not any hurte or displeasure done to any persone: but as it became those that haue the charge of any thing, they did carefully watche to perserue the good quiet thereof. All which this Greke word Anacos doth signifie, whereof perchance it comes that they call the kings Anactes. There are others also who holde opinion that they were called Anaces, because of their starres which appeared in the ayer. For the Attican tongue sayeth, Anacæ, & Anecæthen: where the comon people saye Ano, & Another, that is to saye, aboue. Neuertheles Æthra, Theſeus mother, was carried prisoner to LACEDÆMON, & from thence to TROIA with Hellen, as some saye: & as Hommer him self doth witnesse in his verses, where he speake of the women that followed Hellen.

Yet there are other who alwell reiect these two verses, & mainteine they are not Homers: as also they reprove all that is reported of Manichus. To wit, that Laodice being priuily coceiued of him by Demophon, he was brought vp secretly by Æthra within TROIA. But Hittor the historien in his thirteenth of his histories of ATTICA, maketh a recital farre cōtrary to other, saying: that some holde opinion, that Paris Alexander was slaine in battell by Achilles, & Patroclus in the countrey of THESSALIE, neere to the riuer of Sperchium, & that his brother Hektor tooke the citie of TROEZEN, from whence he brought away Æthra: in which there is no manner of apparance or likelihood. But Ædonæus king of the MOLOSSIANS, seeing Hercules one daye as he passed through his realme, descended by chaunce into talke of Theſeus & of Pirithous, howe they came to steale away his daughter secretly: & after told how they were also punished. Hercules was maruailous forye to vnderstand that one of them was now dead, & the other in daunger to dye, & thought with him self that to make his mone to Ædonæus, it would not helpe the matter: he besought him only that he would deliuer Theſeus for his sake. And he graunted him. Thus Theſeus being deliuered of this captiuitie, returned to ATHENS, where his friends were not altogether kept vnder by his enemies: & at his returne he dyd dedicate to Hercules all the temples, which the citie had before caused to be built in his owne honour. And where first of all they were called Theſea, he did now surname the all Hercules, excepting foure, as Philochorus writeth. Nowe when he was arrived at ATHENS, he would immediately haue comāded and ordered

A ordered things as he was wont to doe: but he found him self troubled much with feditiō, because those who had hated him of long time, had added also to their old cankered hate, a disdaine & contempt to feare him any more. And the comō people now were become so stubborn, that where before they would haue done all that they were comāded, & haue spoken nothing to the contrary: now they looked to be borne with, & flattered. Whereupon Theſeus thought at the first to haue vfed force, but he was forced by the faction & cōtēdiō of his enemies to let all alone, & in the end, despairing he should euer bring his matters to passe to his desire, he secretly sent away his children into the Ile of EVBOEA, to Elphenor the sonne of Chalcodon. And him self, after he had made many wittnes & curses against the Athenians, in the village of Gargettus, in a place which for that cause to this daye is called Araterion: (that is to saye, the place of cursings) he did take the seas, & wēt into the Ile of SCIRO, where he had goods, & thought also to haue founde friends. Lycomedes reigned at that time, & was king of the Ile, vnto whom he made request for some lande, as intending to dwell there: albeit some saye that he required him to giue him ayde against the Athenians. Lycomedes were it that he douted to entertaine so greata perlonage, or that he dyd it to gratifie Menestheus: caried him vp to the high rocks, faining as though he would from thence haue shewed him all his countrey round about. But when he had him there, he threw him downe hedlong from the toppe of the rocks to the botto, & put him thus vnfortunatly to death. Yet other write, that he fell down of him self by tome, & put him thus vnfortunatly to death. Yet other write, that he fell down of him self by tome, & put him thus vnfortunatly to death. Yet other write, that he fell down of him self by tome, & put him thus vnfortunatly to death.

C ATHENS: and the children of Theſeus, as priuate fouldiers followed Elphenor in the warres of TROIA. But after the death of Menestheus, who died in the iorney to TROIA, Theſeus sonnes returned vnto ATHENS, where they recouered their state. Sithence there were many occasiōs which moued the Athenians to reuerence & honour him as a demy god. For in the battell of Marathon, many thought they sawe his shadow & image in armes, fighting against the barbarous people. And after the warres of the Medes (the yere wherein Phedon was gouernour of ATHENS) the nunne Pithia answered the Athenians, who had sent to the oracle of Apollo: that they should bring backe the bones of Theſeus, & putting them in some honorable place, they should preferue & honour them deuoutely. But it was a harde matter to finde his graue: & if they had founde it, yet had it bene a harder thing to haue brought his bones away, for the malice of those barbarous people which inhabited that Ile, which were so wild & fierce, that none could trade or liue with them. Norvvithstanding Cimon hauing taken the lland (as we haue written in his life) & seeking his graue: perceived by good happe an eagle pecking with her beake, & scrapping with her claws in a place of some prety height. Straight it came into his minde (as by diuine inspiration) to searche & digge the place: where was founde the tūmbe of a great bodye, with the head of a speare which was of brasie, & a sword with it. All which things were brought to ATHENS by Cimon in the admirall gallie. The Athenians receiued them with great ioye, with processions & goodly sacrifices, as if Theſeus him self had bene a liue, & had returned into the citie againe. At this daye all these relics lye yet in the middelt of the citie, neere to the place where the young men doe vse all their exercises of bodye. There is free libertie of access for all slaues & poore men, (that are afflicted & pursued, by any mightier then themselves) to pray & sacrifice in remembrance of Theſeus: who while he liued was protectour of the oppressed, & dyd currently receiue their request & petitiōs that prayed to haue ayde of him. The greatest & most solemne sacrifice they doe vnto him, is on the eight daye of October, in which he returned from CRETA, with the other younge children of ATHENS. Howbeit they doe not leaue to honour him euery eight daye of all other moneths, either because he arrived to TROEZEN at ATHENS the eight daye of Iune, as Diodorus the Cosmographer writeth: or for that they thought that number to be meetest for him, because the brute ranne he was begotten of Neptune. They doe sacrifice also to Neptune, the eight daye of euery moneth, because the nūber of it is the first cube made of euen number, & the double of the first square: which dothe represent a steadfastnes immouable, properly attributed to the might of Neptune, whom for this cause we surname Asphalius, and Gaiochus, which by interpretation dothe signifie the safe keeper, & the staye of the earth.

Diuers opinions about the name of Rome.

Tyberis fl.

The breiuing of lifting their kinfolkes in the mouthes, came from the Troian women.

THE Historiographers doe not agree in their writings, by whom, nor for what cause, the great name of the citie of ROME (the glorie whereof is blown abroad through all the worlde) was first geuen vnto it. For some thincke that the Pelasgians, after they had overcome the greatest parte of the world, and had inhabited and subdued many nations, in the ende dyd slaye them selues in that place where it was newe buylde: and for their great strength and power in armes, they gaue the name of ROME vnto the citie, as signifying power in the Greeke tongue. Other saye, that after the taking and destruction of TROYA, there were certaine TROYANS which sauing them selues from the sworde, tooke suche vessels as they founde at aduenture in the hauen, and were by winds put with the THYSCANE shore, where they anckred neere vnto the riuer of Tyber. There their wiues being so sore sea sicke, that possibly they could not any more endure the boisterous surges of the seas: it happened one of them among the rest (the noblest and wisest of the companie) called ROMA, to counsaill the other women of her copanions to set their hippes afire, which they dyd accordingly. Wherewith their husbonds at the first were maruelously offended. But afterwards, being compelled of necessitie to plant them selues neere vnto the citie of PALLANTIVM, they were appeased when they sawe things prosper better then they hoped for, finding the soyle there fertile, and the people their neighbours ciuill and gentle in entertaining them. Wherefore amongst other honours they dyd to requite this lady Roma, they called their citie after her name, as from whom came the originall cause of the building and foundation thereof. They saye that from thence came this custome continuing yet to this daye at ROME, that the women saluting their kinfolkes and husbonds doe kisse them in the mouthes, for so dyd these TROYAN ladies to please their husbonds, and to winne them againe, after they had lost their fauours, and procured their displeasures with burning of their hippes. Other saye that Roma was the daughter of Italus, and of Lucaria, or els of Telephus the sonne of Hercules, and of the wife of AENEAS: other saye of Ascanius, the sonne of AENEAS, who named the citie after her name. Other holde opinion that it was ROMANUS (the sonne of Vlysses and of Circe) that first founded ROME: other will saye that it was ROMUS the sonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent thither from TROYA. Other write that it was one ROMUS a tyranne of the LATINES, who draue the THYSCANS out of those

A partes: which departing out of THESSALY went first of all into LYDIA; and afterwards from LYDIA into ITALIE. And furthermore, they who thincke that Romulus (as in deede he carieth some of them write, that he was the sonne of AENEAS and of DEXIBEA the daughter of Phorbus, and that he was brought into ITALIE of a litle childe with his brother REMUS: and that at that time the riuer of Tyber being ouerflowen, all other shippes were cast awaye, saving the shippe in which the two litle boyes were, which by great good happe came to a laye vpon a very plaine euen grounde on the bancke, and bicause the children beyond all hope were saued by this meanes, therefore the place was afterwards called ROME. Other saye that Roma was the daughter of the first Troian ladye was maried vnto Latinus the sonne of Telemachus, by whom she had Romulus. Other write, that it was AEMILIA, the daughter of AENEAS and of Lavinia, which was gotten with childe by the god Mars. Other tell a tale of Romulus birth, nothing true nor likely. For it is sayed that there was sometime a king of ALBA named Tarchetius, a very wicked and cruell man, in whose house through the permission of the goddess appeared such a like vision: that there rose vp in the hearthe of his chymney the forme & facion of a mans priuie member, which continued there many dayes. And they saye, that at that time there was in THYSCANE an oracle of Thetis, from whom they brought vnto this wicked king Tarchetius suche an aunswer: that he should cause his daughter yet vnmarried to haue carnall companie with the straunge thing, for the should beare a sonne, that should be famous for his valliance, for strength of bodye, and his happie succeffe wherein he should exceede all men of his time. Tarchetius tolde this oracle vnto one of his daughters, and willed her to entertaine this straunge thing: but she disdaining to doe it, sent one of her waiting women to vndertake the entertainment. But Tarchetius was so mad at this, that he caused them both to be taken to put them to death: howbeit the goddesse Vesta appeared to him in his sleepe in the night, and charged him he should not doe it. Whereupon he dyd commaund them to make him a peece of clothe in the prison, with promise that they should be maried when they had finished it. These poore maydes toyled at it all the lile long daye, but in the night there came other (by Tarchetius commaundement) that dyd vndoe all they had done the daye before. In the meane time, this waiting woman that was gott with childe by this straunge thing, was deliuered of two goodly boyes or twynnes: whom Tarchetius gaue vnto one Teratius, with D expresse commaundement he should cast them awaye. This Teratius caryed them vnto the bancke of the riuer: thither came a shee woulfe and gaue them sucke, and certaine byrdes that brought litle crommes and put them in their mouthes, vntill a swyneheard perceyuing them, and wondering at the sight, dyd boldly goe to the children, andooke them awaye with him. These infants being thus preferred after they were come to mans state, dyd set vpon Tarchetius and slewe him. One Promathion an Italian writer deliuereth this storie thus. But the reporte that carieth best credit of all, and is allowed of by many writers: cometh from Diocles Peparethian, (whome Fabius Pictor followeth in many things) who was the first that put forth this storie among the GRECIANS, and specially the chieftest poynts of it. Though this matter be somewhat diuersely taken, yet in effect the storie is thus. The E right line and bloude of the kings of ALBA descended from AENEAS by succession from the father to the sonne, and the Kingdome fell in the ende betweene two brethern, Numitor and Amulius. They agreed by lotte to make diuision betweene them, whereof the one to haue the Kingdome, and the other all the golde, syluer, readye money, goodes, and iuells brought from TROYA. Numitor by his lotte chose the Realme for his portion: Amulius hauing all the golde and treasure in his handes, dyd finde him selfe thereby the stronger, and so dyd easely take his Realme from him. And fearing least his brothers daughter, and so dyd easely take his Realme from him. And fearing least his brothers daughter might haue children which one day might thrust him out againe, he made her a Nunne of the might haue children which one day might thrust him out againe, he made her a Nunne of the goddesse Vesta, there to passe her dayes in virginitee, & neuer to be maried: (some call her Rhea, other Sylvia, and other Ilia) neuertheles not longe after she was founde with childe, against the rule and profession of the Vestaall Nunnes. So nothing had faued her from present death, but the petition of Antho the daughter of king Amulius, who intreated her father for her life: yet notwithstanding she was straightly locked vp, that no body could see her, nor speake with her, least the should be brought a bedde without Amulius knowledge. In the ende she was deliuered of two fayre boyes and marueilous great twynnes: which made Amulius more affrayed then before. So he commaunded one of his men to take the two children, and to throwe them awaye, and destroye them. Some saye that this seruants name was Fausulus: other thinke it was he that brought them vp. But whosoeuer he was, he that had the charge to throwe them awaye, put them in a trowge, and went towards the riuer with intention to throwe them in. Howbeit he found it risen so highe, and running so swiftly, that he durst not come nere the waters side, & so they being in the trowge, he layed them on the bancke. In the meane time the riuer swelling still, and ouerflowing the bancke, in such sorte that it came vnder the trowge: dyd gently liue vp the trowge, & caried it vnto a great playne, called at this present Cermann, and in the olde time Germanum, (as I take it) because the Romaines called the brothers of father & mother, B Germani. Nowe there was nere vnto this place a wilde figge tree which they called Ruminalis, of the name of Romulus as the most parte thought: or els because the beasts feeding there were wont to come vnder the same in the extreame heate of the daye, and there dyd Ruminare, that is, chewe their cudde in the shadowe: or perhaps because the two children dyd sucke the teate of the woulfe, which the ancient LATINES call Ruma, and they at this day doe yet call the goddesse on whom they crye out to geue their children sucke, Rumilia. And in their sacrifices to her they vse no wine, but offer vp milke and water mingled with honye. To these two children lying there in this sorte, they write, there came a the woulfe & gaue them sucke: and a hitvaw also which dyd helpe to nourish and keepe them. These two beastes are thought to be consecrated to the god Mars, & the LATINES doe singularly honour & reuerence the hitvaw. This dyd much helpe to geue credit to the wordes of the mother, who affirmed the hitvaw to be conceyued of those two children, by the god Mars. Howbeit some thinke she was deceyued in her opinion: for Amulius that had her maidenhead, went to her all armed, and perforce dyd rauish her. Other holde opinion that the name of the nurce which gaue the two children sucke with her breastes, gaue occasion to comon reporte to erre much in this tale, by reason of the double signification thereof. For the LATINES doe call with one selfe name these woulfes Lupas, & women that geue their bodies to all comers: as this nurce the wife of Fausulus (that brought these children home to her house) dyd vse to doe. By her right name she was called Acca Laurentia, vnto whom the ROMAINES doe sacrifice yet vnto this daye: and the priest of Mars doth offer vnto her, in the moneth of Aprill, the sheading of wine and milke accustomed at burials, and the feast it selfe is called Larentia. It is true that they honour also another Larentia, for like occasion. The clerke or sexten of Hercules temple, not knowing one daye howe to driue awaye the time as it should seeme: of a certaine liuelines and boldnes, dyd desire the god Hercules to playe at dyce with him, with condition that if he dyd winne, Hercules should be bounde to send him some good fortune: and if it were his lucke to lose, then he promised Hercules he would prouide him a very good supper, and would besides bring him a fayre gentlewoman to lye with all. The conditions of the playe thus rehearsed, the sexten first cast the dyce for Hercules, and afterwards for him selfe. It fell out that Hercules wanne, and the sexten meaning good fayth, and thincking it very mete to performe the bargain that him selfe had made, prepared a good supper, and hyered this Laurentia the courtesan, which was very fayre, but as yet of no great fame to come to it. Thus hauing feasted her within the temple, and prepared a bedde ready there, after supper he locked her into the temple, as if Hercules should haue comen in dede & layen with her. And it is said for trothe, that Hercules came thither: & commaunded her in the morning the should geue into the market place, & salute the first man the met, & kepe him euer for her friend. Which thing he performed, & the first man the met was called Tarrutius, a man of great yeres, & one that had gathered together marueilous wealth & riches. He had no children at all, neither was he euer married. He fell acquainted with this Laurentia, & loued her so dearly, that shortly after chauncing to dye, he made her heire of all he had: whereof the disposed afterwards by her last will and testament, the best and greatest parte vnto the people of Rome. Moreouer it is reported also, that she now being grown to be famous & of great honour (as thought to be the leman of a god) dyd vanishe away sodainly in the selfe same place, where the first Laurentia was buried. The place at this day is called Velabrum: because

A bicause the riuer being ouerflowen, they were oftentimes compelled to passe by bote to goe to the market place, and they called this manner of ferrying ouer, Velatura. Other saye, that those tomblers & common players, which shewed fundeye games and pastimes to winne the fauour of the people, were wont to couer that passage ouer with canuas clothes and veyles, by which they goe from the market place to the lyfles or shewe place where they ronne their horses, beginning their race euen at the place: and they call a veyle in their tongue, Velum. This is the cause why the seconde Laurentia is honored at Rome. Fausulus, chief neaheard to Amulius, tooke vp the two children and no bodye knewe it, as some saye: or as other reporte, (and likeliest to be true) with the priuite & knowledge of Numitor, Amulius brother, who secretly furnished them with money that brought vp the two young children. It is layed also they were both comeynted vnto the citie of the ABYANS, where they were brought vp at schole, & taught all other honest things, which they vse to teache the sonnes & childre of good & noble me. Further they saye they were named Remus and Romulus, because they were founde sucking on the teates of a woulfe. Nowe the beawtie of their bodies dyd presently shewe, beholding onely but their stature and manner of their countenances, of what nature and linadge they were: and as they grewe in yeres, their manly corage increased maruelously, so as they became stowte and hardy men, in so much as they were neuer troubled or astonied at any daunger that was offered them. Howbeit it appeared plainly that Romulus had more wit & vnderstanding then his brother Remus. For in all things wherein they were to deale with their neighbours, either concerning hunting, or the boundes and limites of their pastures: it was easely discerned in him, that he was borne to commaund, and not to obeie. For this cause they were both exceedingly beloued of their companions, and of those which were their inferiours. As for the kings heardmen, they passed not much for them, saying that they were euen like them selues, and so seemed not to care a Pyne for their anger or displeasure, but wholy gaue them selues to all gentlemanly exercises and trades, thincking to liue idely & at ease without trauell, was neither comly nor conuenient: but to exercise and harden their bodies with hunting, running, pursuing murderers and theues, and to helpe those which were oppressed with wronge and violence, I shoulde be credit and commendation to them. By reason whereof, in very thortime they grewe to great fame and renowne, And it fell out by chaunce there rose some stryfe and variance betwene the heardmen of Amulius, and the heardmen of Numitor: in so muche as those that were Numitors, caryed awaye by force some cattell of the others. Thother side would not beare that, but pursued fast after, and beating them well fauouredly, they made them take their legges, and brought backe againe the greatest parte of the cattell they had caried away with them. Whereat Numitor stormed maruelously, but yet his men seemed to make but little accompt of it, and purposing reuenge, they gathered about them a good companie of vacabonds (that had neither home, nor resting place) and certaine fugitiue bonde men which they intified ill fauoredly, incoring them to steale awaye from their masters. Thus one daye whilst Romulus was busie about some sacrifice, (being a deuoute man and religious, and well geuen to serue the goddes, and to learne to diuine and tell before hande what things should happen and come to passe) it happened the heard men of Numitor to meete Remus very slenderly accompanied: so they fell E vpon him sodainly, blowes were deltrouedly on bothe sides, and men were hurte on either parte. Howbeit Numitors men in the ende proued the stronger parte, and dyd take Remus by force, and caryed him straight before Numitor, alledging many complaints and matters against him. Numitor durst not punish him of his owne authoritie, because he feared his brother, Amulius, who was somewhat terrible: but went vnto him, and earnestly besought him to doe him iustice, and not to suffer him being his owne brother, to receyue such iniurie of his men. There was not a man in the citie of ALBA, but dyd greatly mislike the iniurie done to Numitor: and (pake it openly, that he was no persone to be offered such a wronge. In so muche as Amulius moued herewith, dyd deliuer Remus into his handes, to punish him as he thought good. Whereupon Numitor caried him home with him. But when he had him in his house, he F beganne to consider better of him, with admiration howe goodly a younge man he was, howe in height and strength of bodye he passed all the rest of his people: and perceyuing in his face, an assured constancie, and bolde stedfast corage that yielded not, nor was abashed for any daunger he sawe toward him : and hearing also the reporte of his actes & manhod to be awn-swerable to that he sawe: (being chiefly moued in mine opinion by some secret inspiration of the goddess, which ordaine the depthe of great matters) beganne partly by coniecture , and partly by chance to take a conceit of him. So he asked him what he was, & who was his father and mother : speaking to him in a more gentle wise , and with a friendlier countenance then before, to make him the bolder to answer, & be of better hope. Remus boldly answered him. Truly I will not hide the trothe from thee , for thou seemest to me more worthie to be King, then thy brother Amulius. For thou enquierest, and hearest first before thou condem-nest : and he condemneth before he examine or heare the parties. Vnill now, we thought we had bene the children of two of the Kings seruants, to wit of Faustulus and of Laurentia : I saye we, bicause my brother and I are two twynnes. But seeing we are nowe falsely accused vnto thee, and by malicious furnished tales are wrongfully brought in daunger of our liues : we intend to discouer our selues, and to declare straunge things vnto thee, whereof the present perill we stande nowe in, shall plainly proue the trothe . Men saye that we haue bene begotten miraculously, fostered and geuen sucke more straungely, and in our tender yerres were fedd by birdes and wilde beastes, to whom we were cast out as a praye. For a woulfe gaue vs sucke with her teates, and an hitwaw (they saye) brought vs litle crömes, and put them in our mouthes, as we laye vpon the bancke by the riuier, where we were put in a troughe that at this daye remain-neth whole, bounde about with plates of copper, vpon the which are some letters engrauen halfe worne out, which peraduenture one daye will serue for some tokens of knowledge (vn-profitable for our parents) when it shalbe late, and after weare dead and gone. Numerus then comparing these wordes, with the age the younge man seemed to be of, and considering well his face: dyd not reiect the hope of his imagination that smiled on him, but handled the matter so, that he found meanes to speake secretly with his daughter, notwithstanding at that time she was kept very straightly. Faustulus in the meane time hearing that Remus was prisoner, and that the King had deliuered him already into the hands of his brother Numerus to doe iustice, went to praye Romulus to helpe him, and tolde him then whose children they were: for before he had neuer opened it to them but in darcke speaches, and glawnsingwise, and so muche as sufficed to put them in some hope . So Faustulus taking the troughe with him at that time, went vnto Numerus in great haste, as marueilously affrayed for the present daunger he thought Remus in. The Kings souldiers which warded at the gates of the cittie, beganne to gather some suspition of Faustulus manner of comming: and he made him selfe to be the more suspected, being questioned with about the cause of his repaire thither, that he faltered in his wordes: besides, they espied his troughe which he caried vnder his cloke . Nowe amongst the warders, there was by chance one that was the man to whom the children were committed to be cast awaye, and was present when they were left on the bancke of the riuier to the mercie of fortune. This man knewe the troughe by & by, as well by the facion, as by the letters grauen vpon it: who mistrusted straight that which was true in deede. So he dyd not neglect the thing, but went forthwith to the King to tell him the matter, and led Faustulus with him to haue him con-fesse the trothe. Faustulus being in this perplexitie, could not kepe all close vpon examination, but dyd vtter our somewhat of the matter, and yet he tolde not all. For he plainly iustified the children were alieue: yet he sayed they were farse from the cittie of ALBA, where they kept beastes in the fields. And as for the troughe, he was going to carye it to Ilia, bicause he had di-uers times prayed him to let her see and feele it: to the ende the might be the more assured of her hope, who promised her that one daye she should see her children againe. So it chaunced vnto Amulius at that time, as it commonly dothe vnto those that are troubled, and doe any thing in feare or anger, as a man amazed thereto, to send one presently (who in all other things was a very honest man, but a great friende of his brother Numerus) to aske him if he had heard any thing that his daughters children were alieue. This person being come to Numerus house, founde him ready to embrace Remus, who fell to be wimes thereof, and of the good happe discouered vnto Numerus: whereupon he perswaded him howe to set vpon his brother, and to dispatche the matter with spede. So from that time forwards, he tooke their parte. On thother side also the matter gaue them no leasure to deferre their enterpryse, although they had bene willing:

A willing: for the whole case was somewhat blowne abroad. So Romulus then got straight a power, and drewe very nere the cittie, and many of the citizens of ALBA went out to ioyne with him, who either feared or hated Amulius. Nowe Romulus power which he brought (ouer and besides those citizens) was a good number of fighting men , and they were diuided by hundreds, and euery hundred had his captaine who marched before his bande , carying litle bundells of grasse or of boughes tyed to the ende of their poles. The LATINES call these bundells Manipulos, whereof it cometh that yet at this daye in an armie of the Romaines, the souldiers which are all vnder one ensigne, are called Manipulares. So Remus stirring vp those that were within the cittie, and Romulus bringing in men from without, the tyranne Amulius fell in such feare and agonie, that without providing any thing for his safety, they came vpon him fodayn-ly in his palace , and slewe him . Thus you heare howe nere Fabius Piclor and Dioles Pepare- thian doe agree in reciting the storie, who was the first in mine opinion that wrote the foundation of the cittie of ROME: howbeit there are that thincke they are all but fables & tales deuised of pleasure. But me thincks for all that, they are not altogether to be reiecte or discredited, if we will consider fortunes straunge effects vpon times, and of the greatnes also of the Romaine empire: which had neuer atchieued to her present possessed power & authoritie, if the goddess had not frö the beginning bene workers of the same, & if there had not also bene some straunge cause, and wonderfull foundation. Amulius being nowe slayne as before, & scatter that all things were appeald, and reduced to good order againe: Remus and Romulus would not dwell in the cittie of ALBA, being no lordes thereof, nor also would be lords of it, so long as their grandfather by the mothers side was alieue. Wherefore after they had restored him to his estate , and had done the honour and duety they ought vnto their mother: they purposed to goe & build a cittie in those places where they had bene first brought vp, for this was the honestest culler they could pretend for their departing from ALBA. Peraduenture they were enforced to doe whether they would or not, for the great number of banished men, and fugitive slaues which were gathered together by them for their strength, who had bene vtterly lost and cast away, if they had bene once discharged by them. Therefore it was of necessitye that they should dwell by them selues, separated in some place, to kepe this number together and in some order. For it is true that the inhabitants of the cittie of ALBA would not suffer such banished perones and runnagates to be mingled amongst them , nor would receaue them into their cittie to be free among them. All which appeareth sufficiently: first, bicause they tooke awaye women by force: and so not of inolenecie, but of necessitye, when they founde no man that would bestow any of them. It is manifest also they dyd greatlye honour and make much of the women they had taken away before . Furthermore, when their cittie beganne a litle to be settled, they made a temple of refuge for all fugitives and afflicted perones, which they called the temple of the god Asylenus. Where there was sanctuarie and safetye for all sortes of people that repaiied thither, and could get into the temple, for whom it was alledged they could not deliuiet any bonde man to his master, nor detter to his creditor, nor murderet to the iustice that was fled thither for succor, bicause the oracle of Apollo the Delphian had expresslye enioyned them to graunte sanctuary to all those that would come thither for it . So by this meanes in E thorte space their cittie florished, & was replenisht, where at the first foundation of it, they saye there was not above one thousand houses, as more at large hereafter shalbe declared.
When they came nowe to the building of their cittie, Romulus & Remus the two brethren fell fodainely at a strife together about the place where the cittie should be builded . For Romulus built ROME, which is called foure square, and would needes it should remaine in the place which he had chosen . Remus his brother chose another place very strong of situation, vpon mounte Auentine, which was called after his name Remonium, and nowe is called Rignarium.
Notwithstanding, in the ende they agreed betwene them selues this controuerisie should be decided, by the flying of birds, which doe geue a happy diuination of things to come. So being set in diuers places by them selues to make obseruation, some saye that there appeared vnto F Remus fixe, and to Romulus twelue vultures. Other saye that Remus truly sawe fixe, and Romulus feigned from the beginning that he sawe twife as many : but when Remus came to him, then there appeared twelue in deede vnto Romulus, and this is the cause why the Romaines at this

The Romans observe the flying of vultures. daye in their diuinations and soothsayings of the flying of birds, doe maruelously obserue the A flying of the vultures. It is true which the historiographer Herodotus Ponticus writeth: that Heracles reioyced much when there appeared a vulture to him, & being readie to beginne any enterprise. For it is the foule of the worlde that dothe least hurte, and neuer marreth nor destroyeth any thing that man dothe sowe, plante, or set: considering that the feedeth on carion only, and dothe neuer hurte nor kill any liuing thing. Also the dothe nor praye vpon dead fowle, for the likenes that is betwene them: where the eagles, the dukes and the fakers doe murder, kill, and eate those which are of their owne kynde. And yet as Æschylus sayeth,

Needs must that fowle accompted be most vile, Most rauening, and full of filthie minde, Which doth him self continually defile, By praying still vpon his propre kinde.

Moreover, other birds are allwayes (as a man would saye) before our eyes, and doe daylie shewe them selues vnto vs: where the vulture is a very rare byrde, and hardly to be seene, and men doe not easily finde their aeries. Which hath geuen some occasion to holde a false opinion, that the vultures are passagers, and come into these partes out of straunge countreys. The prognosticators also thincke, that suche things which are not ordinarie, and but feldome seene, be not naturall, but miraculously sent by the goddes to prognosticate something. When Remus knewe howe his brother had mocked him, he was very angry with him. And when Romulus had cast a dytche, as it were for the wall about his citie, Remus dyd not only scorne it, but hindered also his worke, and in the ende for a mockerie leapt ouer his wall. To conclude, he dyd so much, that at the last he was slayne there by Romulus owne handes as some saye: or as other holde opinion, by the handes of one of his men which was called Celer. In this fight they slewe Faustulus, and Plutinus also his brother, who had holpen him to bring vp Romulus. Howsoever the matter fell out, this Celer abated him selfe from Rome, and went into the countrey of Thyscane. And they saye, that men which are quicke, and readye vpon a foa-dine,ooke their names euer after vpon him, and were called Celeres. As amongst other,

Quintus Metellus, after the death of his father, hauing in very fewe dayes made the people of Rome to see a combat of fencers (called Gladiatores) fighting at the sharpe, they fumamed him Celer, for that the Romaines marueiled howe he could prepare his things in so shorte a time. Furthermore, Romulus hauing neuer buried his brother, and his other two bringers vp (called foster fathers) in the place they call Remonia: beganne then to buyld and laye the foundation of his citie, sending for men out of Thyscane, who dyd name and teache him particularly all the ceremonies he had to obserue there, according to their lawes and ordinances as a great holy myserie. And first of all they made a rounde dytche in the place called at this daye Comitium, into which they dyd cast their chiefest and best things, which men vse lawfully for good, and naturally as most necessarie. After that they dyd throwe also into it, a litle of the earth, from whence euery man came, and mingled these all together.

This dytche in their ceremonies is called the worlde, in Latine Mundus, euen the selfe same name the Latines call the Vniuersall. About this dytche they dyd trace the compasse of the citie they would buyld, euen as one would drawe a circle about a center. This done, the founder of the citie taketh a plough, to which he fastened a culter or ploughe share of brass, and so yoked in the ploughe an oxe and a cowe, he him selfe holding the ploughe dyd make rounde about the compasse of the citie a deepe furrowe. Those which followed him, had the charge to throwe the turues of earthe inward into the citie, which the ploughe share raised vp, and not to leaue any of them turned outward. The furrowe thus cast vp was the whole compasse of their wall, which they call in Latine Pomarium, by shortning of the syllables, for post murum: to wit, after wall. But in the place where they determined to make a gate, they dyd take of the ploughe share, and drawe the ploughe, with leauing a certain space of earthe vnbroken vp: whereupon the Romaines thincke all the compasse of their walles holy and sacred, except their gates. For if their gates had bene hallowed and sanctified, they would haue had a conscience through them to haue brought in, or caried out of the citie, any things necessarie for the life of man, that had not bene pure and cleane. Nowe they be-

A leene certainly, that this ceremonie of the foundation of their citie was made the one and twentie of Aprill: because the Romaines doe yet keepe that daye holy daye, and call it the feast of the natiuite of their countrey. On which daye they dyd not in olde time sacrifice any thing that had life, as esteeming that daye (which was the natiuite of their citie) to be most mete to be kept cleane and pure from being polluted or defiled with any bloude. Notwithstanding before Rome was buylded, they had another feast called the sheapeheards or heard-mens holy daye, which they dyd celebrate vpon the same daye, and called it Palilia. Nowe at this daye the beginnings of the moneths with the Romaines is cleane contrarie to the Grecians: yet for all this, they holde opinion for certaintie that the daye on which Romulus founded his citie, was assuredly that which the Grecians call Triacada: that is to saye, the

B thirty daye. On which there was seene an eclipse of the moone, which they suppose was obserued by the Poet Antimachus (borne in the citie of Trois) in the thirteenth yere of the sixt Olympiade. Likewise in the time of Marcus Varro (as a man learned, and one that had redde as much of auncient stories as any Romaine) there was a friend of his called Tarutius, a great philosopher and mathematician. Who being geuen to the calculation of astronomie for the delight of speculation only, wherein he was thought most excellent: it dyd fall out that Varro gaue him this question, to seache out what howe and daye the natiuite of Romulus was, who gathered it out by certaine accidents, as they doe in the resolutions of certaine geometrical questions. For they saye, that by the selfe same science, one maye tell before of things to come, and to happen to a man in his life, knowing certainly the howe of his natiuite: and howe one maye tell also the howe of his natiuite, when by accidents they knowe what hath happened to him all his life. Tarutius dyd the question that Varro gaue him. And hauing thoroughly considered the aduentures, dedes, and gestes of Romulus, howe long he liued, and howe he dyed: all which being gathered and conferred together, he dyd boldly iudge for a certaintie, that he was conceyued in his mothers wombe, in the first yere of the seconde Olympiade, the three and twentie daye of the moneth which the Egyptians call Chaat, and now is called December, about three of the clocke in the morning, in which howe there was a whole eclipse of the sunne: And that he was borne into the worlde, the one and twenteth of the moneth of Thoth, which is the moneth of September, about the rising of the sunne. And that Rome was begonne by him on the ninth daye of the moneth which the Egyptians call Pharmuthi, and aunswereth now to the moneth of Aprill, betwene two and three of the C clocke in the morning. For they will saye that a citie hath his reuolution and his time of continuance appointed, as well as the life of a man: and that they knewe by the situation of the starres, the daye of her beginning and foundation. These things and suche other like, peradventure will please the readers better, for their straungenes and curiositie, then offend or mislike them for their falsehood. Nowe after he had founded his citie, he first and foremost dyd diuide in two copanies, all those that were of age to carie armour. In euery one of these companies there were three thousand footemen, and three hundred horsemen: and they were called Legions, because they were sorted of the chosen men that were pyckt out amongst all the rest for to fight. The remaine after these was called Populus, which significeth the people.

E After this, he made a hundred counsellors of the best and honestest men of the citie, which he called Patricians: and the whole company of them together he called Senatus, as one would saye, the counsell of the auncients. So they were called Patricians, as some will saye, the counsell of the fathers lawfull children, which fewe of the first inhabitants could shewe. It maye be, some will saye this name was geuen them of Patrocinium, as growing of the protection they had by the sanctuarie of their citie, which worde they vse at this daye in the selfe same signification: as one that followed Enander into TALIS, was called Patron, because he was pitiefull, and relieued the poore and litle children, and so got him selfe a name for his pitie and humanity. But methinckes it were more like the trothe to saye, that Romulus dyd call them so, because he thought the chiefest men should haue a fatherly care of the meener forte: considering also it was to teache the meener forte that they should not feare th'authoritie of the greater, nor enuie at their honours they had, but rather in all their causes should vse their fauour and good will, by taking them as their fathers. For euen at this present, straungers call those of the Senate, lordes or capitaines: but the naturall ROMAINES call them, Patres Conscripti, which is a name of fatherhood and dignitie without enuie. It is true that at the beginning they were only called Patres, but sithence, because they were many ioyned vnto the first, they haue bene named Patres Conscripti, as a man should saye, fathers of recorde together: which is the honorablest name he could haue deuised to make a difference betweene the Senators, and the people. Furthermore, he made a difference betweene the chiefe citizens, and the baser people, by calling the better sorte Patroni, as muche to saye, as defenders: and the meaner sorte Clientes, as you would saye, followers, or men protected. This dyd breede a marueilous great loue and good wil among them, making the one much beholding to the other, by many mutual curtesies and pleasures: for the Patrons dyd helpe the clients to their right, defended their causes in iudgement, dyd geue vnto them counsaill, and dyd take all their matters in hande. The clients againe enterchaungeably humbled them selues to their patrons, not onely in outward honour and reuerence towards them, but otherwise dyd helpe them with money to marrie and aduance their daughters, or els to paye their dettes and credit, if they were poore or decayed. There was no lawe nor magistrate that could compell the patron to be a witness against his client: nor yet the client to witness against his patron. So they increased, and continued, all other rights and offices of amitie and friendship together, fauour afterwards they thought it a great shame and reproache for the better, and richer, to take rewarde of the meaner and poorer. And thus of this matter we haue spoken sufficiently. Moreouer, foure moneths after the foundation of the cittie was layed, Fabius writeth, there was a great rauishment of women. There are some which laye it vpon Romulus, who being then of nature warlike, and geuen to prophesies and aunswers of the goddess, foretolde that his cittie should become very great and mightie, so as he rayed it by warres, and increased it by armes: and he sought out this culler to doe mischief, and to make warre vpon the Sabyne. To proue this true, some saye he caused certaine of their maydes by force to be taken awaye, but not past thirtie in number, as one that rather sought cause of warres, then dyd it for neede of mariages: which me thinckes was not likely to be true, but rather I iudge the contrarie. For seeing his cittie was incontinently replenished with people of all sortes, whereof there were very fewe that had wiues, and that they were men gathered out of all countreys, and the most parte of them poore and needye, so as their neighbours disdayned them much, and dyd not looke they would longe dwell together: Romulus hoping by this violent taking of their maydes and rauishing them, to haue an entrie into alliance with the Sabyne, and to entice them further to ioine with them in marriage, if they dyd gently intreate these wiues they had gotten, enterprised this violent taking of their maydes, and rauishing of them in such a sorte. First he made it to be commonly bruited abroad in euery place, that he had founde the altar of a god hidden in the grounde, and he called the name of the god, Confus: either because he was a god of counsaill, whereupon the ROMAINES at this daye in their tongue call Consilium, which we call counsell: and the chiefe magistrates of their cittie Consules, as we saye counsellors. Other saye it was the altar of the god Neptune, surnamed the patron of horses. For this altar is yet at this daye within the great lilles of the cittie, and euer couered and hidden, but when they vse the running games of their horse race. Other saye because counsell euer must be kept close and secret, they had good reason to kepe the altar of this god Confus hidden in the grounde. Nowe other write when it was opened, Romulus made a sacrifice of wonderfull ioye, and afterwards proclaimed it openly in diuers places, that at such a daye there should be common playes in Rome, and a solemne feast kept of the god Confus, where all that were disposed to come should be welcome. Great numbers of people repaired thither from all partes. He him selfe was set in the chiefe seate of the shewe place, apparelled fayer in purple, and accompanied with the chiefe of his cittie about him. And there hauing purposed this rauishment you haue heard of, he had geuen the signe before: that the same should beginne, when he should rise vp and folde a playte of his gowne, and vnfolde the same againe. Hereupon his men stoode attending with their swordes: who so fone as they perceyued the signe was geuen, with their swordes drawn in hande, and with great shoutes and cryes ranne violently on the maydes and daughters of the Sabyne to take them awaye and rauish them, and suffered the men to runne awaye,

A awaye, without doing them any hurte or violence. So some saye, there were but thirtie rauished, after whose names were called the thirtie linages of the people of Rome. Howbeit Plinius writeth, that there were five hundred and seuen and twentie; and Julius, fixe hundred and foure score and three. In the which is singularly to be noted for the commendation of Romulus, that he him selfe dyd take then but only one of the maydes, named Herfilla: that after, Romulus was the only cause & mediation of peace betweene the Sabyne and the ROMAINES. Which argueth plainly, that it was not to doe the Sabyne any hurte, nor to satisfie any disordinate lust, that they had so forcibly vnderaken this rauishment: but to ioine two peoples together, with the straightest bondes that could be betweene men. This Herfilla as some saye, was married vnto one Hostilius, the noblest man at that time amongest the ROMAINES: or as others write, vnto Romulus him selfe, which had two children by her. The first was a daughter, and her name was Prima, because she was the first: the other was a sonne, whom he named Asellus, because of the multitude of people he had assembled together in his cittie, and afterwards he was surnamed Asellinus. Thus Zenodotus the TROEZENIAN writeth, wherein note withstanding there be diuers that doe contrarie him. Among those which rauished then the daughters of the Sabyne, it is sayed there were founde certaine meane men carying awaye, a marueilous passing fayer one. These met by chaunce on the waye, certaine of the chiefe of the cittie, who would haue taken her by force from them, which they had done, but that they beganne to crye they caried her vnto Talasius, who was a yong man marueilously well beloued of euery bodye. Which when the others vnderstoode, they were exceeding glad, and they commended them: in so much as there were some which sodainly turned backe againe, and dyd accompanie them for Talasius sake, crying out a lowde, and often on his name. From whence the custome came, which to this daye the ROMAINES synge at their marriages, Talasius, like as the GRECIANS synge Hymeneus. For it is sayed he was compered very happye that he met with this woman. But Sextius Sylla a CARTHAGINIAN borne, a man very wife, and well learned, tolde me once it was the crye and signe which Romulus gaue to his men to beginne the rauishment: whereupon those which caried them awaye, went crying this worde Talasius, and that from thence the custome hath continued, that they synge it yet at their marriages. Neuertheles the most parte of authors, specially Julius, thinckes it is a warning to remember the newe married women of their worke, which is to spinne, which the GRECIANS call Talasius, the Italian words at that time being not mingled with the Greeke. And if it be true the ROMAINES vsed this terme of Talasius, as we of GRECE doe vse: we might by coniecture yeld another reason for it, which should carie a better likelyhoode and prooffe. For when the Sabyne after the battell had made peace with the ROMAINES, they put in an article in fauour of the women in the treatie, that they should not be bounde to serue their husbands in any other worke, but in spinning of wolle. Euer since this custome hath growen, that those which geue their daughters in marriage, and those who leade the bryde, and such as are present at the wedding, speake in sporte to the newe married wife, laughing, Talasius: in token that they doe not leade the bryde for any other worke or seruice, but to spinne wolle. Thereof this hath bene the vse to this daye, that the bryde dothe not of her selfe come ouer the threshold of her husbands dore, but she is hoied preety into the house: because the Sabyne women at that time were to lift vp, & caried awaye by force. They saye also, that the manner of making the shed of the new wedded wiues heare, with the Iro head of a laueling, came vp then likewise: this storie being a manifest token that these first mariages were made by force of armes, and as it were at the swordes point: as we haue written more at large in the booke, wherein we render and shewe the causes of the ROMAINES factions and customes. This rauishment was put in execution about the eighteenth daye of the moneth then called Septilis, and now named August: on which daye they yet celebrate the feast they call Consilia. Nowe the Sabyne were good men of warre, and had great numbers of people, but they dwelt in villages, and not within inclosed walles: being a thing fit for their noble courages that dyd feare nothing, and as those who were defended from the LACEDÆMONIANS. Neuertheles, they seeing them selues bound & tyed to peace by pledges & hostages, that were very neere allyed vnto them, and fearing their daughters should be ill intreated: sent ambassadours to Romulus, by whom they made reasonable offers and perfutations, that their daughters might be deliuered vnto them againe, without any force or violence, and then afterwarde, that he would cause them to be asked in marriage of their parents, as bothe reason and lawe would require. To tend that with good will and consent of all parties, both peoples might contract amitie and alliance together. Wherevnto Romulus made answer, he could not restore the maydes which his people had taken away and married: but most friendly he prayed the SABINES to be contented with their alliance. This answer being returned, and not liked, whilst the princes and communalitie of the SABINES were occupied in consultation, and about the arming of their felues: Acron king of the CENINENSES (a man exceeding courageous and skilfull in the warres, and one that from the beginning mistrusted the ouer bolde & flowte enterprises that Romulus was likely to attempt, considering the late raiunfment of the SABINES daughters, and howe he was already greatly dreading of his neighbours, and somewhat vntolerable, if he were not chafficed and brought lower) first beganne to invade him with a puissant armie, and to make hotte and violent warres vpon him. Romulus on the other side prepared also, and went forth to meete him. When they were come so neere together that they might see one another, they sent defiance to each other, & prayed that they two might fight man to man amidst their armies, & neither of theirs to stirre a foote. Bothe of them accepted of it, and Romulus making his prayervnto Iupiter, dyd promise, and made a vowe: that if he dyd geue him the victorie to ouercome, he would offer vnto him the armour of his enemy, which he dyd. For first he slew Acron in the field, & afterwards gaue battell to his men, & overthrew them also. Lastly he tooke his citie, where he did no hurte nor yet displeasure to any, sauing that he dyd commaunde them to pull downe their howles, & destroy them, and to goe dwell with him at Rome: where they should haue the selfe same rightes & priuileiges which the first inhabitants did enioye. There was nothing more enlarged the citie of Rome, then this manner of policie, to ioyn all wayes vnto it thole the had ouercome & vanquished. Romulus now to discharge his vowe, & in fuche force that his offering might be acceptable to Iupiter, and pleasaunt to his citizens to beholde: did cut downe a goodly straight growen young oke, which he lighted on by good fortune, in the place where his campe did lye. The same he trimmed & dyd let forth after the manner of victorie, hanging and tying all about in fayer order, the armour and weapons of king Acron. Then he girding his gowne to him, and putting vpon his long bulbe of heare, a garland of lawrell, layed the young oke vpon his right shoulder, and he first marched before towards his citie, & longe a royall fonge of victorie, all his armie following him in armes vnto the citie in order of battell: where his citizens receyued him in all passinge wise & triumphe. This noble & stately entrie euer since hath geuen them minds in such sort, & in staterly wise to make their triumphe. The offering of this triumphe was dedicated to Iupiter surnamed Feretrius: because the Latine worde Ferire, signifieth to hurt & kill: & the prayer Spolia opima: therefore sayeth Varro, that opes signifie riches. Howbeit me thinckes it were more likely to fayde, that they were so named of this worde Opus, which betokeneth a dede, because he must needs be the chief of the armie, that hath layne with his owne hands the generall of his enemies, & that must offer the spoyle called Spolia opima, as you would fayde, his principal spoyle & dedes. This neuer happened yet but to three Romaine captaines onely: of the which Romulus was the first, who slew Acron, king of the CENINENSES. Cornelius Cossus was the second, who killed Tolumnius, the generall of the THYSCANS. Clodius Marcellus was the third, who slew Britomartius, king of the GAULES, with his owne hands. And for the two last, Cossus & Marcellus, they made their entrie into the citie, carying their triumphes vpon charets triumphant: but Romulus dyd not so. Therefore in this poynt Dionysius the historiographer hath erred, writing that Romulus dyd enter into Rome vpon a charet triumphant. For it was Tarquinius Priscus the sonne of Demaratus, who first dyd set out triumphes in so stately and magnificent howe. Other holde opinion it was Valerius Publicola, who was the first that euer entered vpon triumphant charet. Concerning Romulus, his statues are yet to be seene in Rome, carying his triumphe a foote. After this ouerthrowe & taking of the CENINENSES, the inhabitants of the cities of Fidenæ, CRYSTVMERIVM, & ANTEBANA, rose altogether against the ROMAINES, whiles

A whiles the other SABYNES also were a preparing the felues. So they fought a battell, in which they tooke the ouerthrowe: & left their cities to the poyle of Romulus, their lands to be geuen where he thought good, and them selues to be caried to ROME. Romulus then did geue their lands among his citizens, except those lands which did belong to the fathers of the maydens that they had taken away & rauished. For he was contented that the fathers of them should kepe still their lads. By & by the other SABYNES fromaking thereat, did chuse them a generall called Tatius, & so went with a puyfant army toward the citie of ROME, whereunto to appoche at that time it was very harde, the castell or keepe of their citie being leared, where at this daye the Capitoll standeth, within which there was a great garrison, whereof Tarpeius was capitaine, & not his daughter Tarpeia, as some will saye, who let out Romulus as a foole. But Tarpeia the captaines daughter, for the desire he had to haue all the golde bracelets which they did weare about their armes, solde the forte to the SABYNES, and asked for reward of her treason, all they did weare on their left armes. Tatius promised them vnto her: & the opened them a gate in the night, by the which she did let all the SABYNES into the castell. Antigonus then was not alone, who sayed, he loued those which did betraye, & hated thoe that had betrayed: nor yet Cesar Augustus, who told Rymitaldes the THRACIAN, that he loued treason, but he hated traitors. And it is a common affliction which we beare to wicked persons, whilst we stand in neede of them: nor vnlke for all the world to those which haue neede of the gall & poyson of venomous beasts. For when they finde it, they are glad, & take it to serue their turne: but after their turne is serued, & they haue that they sought, they hate the crueltie of such beasts. So played Tatius at that time.

C For when he was gotten into the castell, he comanded the SABYNES (for performance of his promise he had made to Tarpeia) they should not sticke to geue her all they weare on their left armes, & to doe as he did: who taking from his owne arme first, the bracelet which he ware, did cast it to her, and his target after. And so did all the rest in like sorte, in so much as being borne downe to the ground by the weight of bracelets & targets, he dyed as pressed to deathe vnder her burden. Neuertheles Tarpeius self was atteinted, & condemned also of treason, by Romulus order, as Iuba sayeth, it is set forth by Sulpitius Galba. They that write nowe otherwise of Tarpeia, saying the was the daughter of Tatius, generall of the SABYNES, & was forced by Romulus to lie with him, & how she was punished in this sorte by her own father after her said treason committed: those I saye, amongest whom Antigonus is one, are not to be credited. And the poet Similius also dothe dore most, who sayeth Tarpeia solde the Capitoll not to the SABYNES, but to the king of GAYLES, with whom she was in loue: as in their verses dothe appeare.

Tarpeia, that mayde of foolish mynde, which were unto the Capitoll did drvell (In feruent flames, of beaſtly loue bebynde, whereer with the king of Gaules did make her ſeuell) Caſt ſtately Rome ſurprized for to be by enemies, as every man may ſee.
And ſo through the hope of his fidelitie betrayed her ſyre, with all his familie.
Her, in ſpeaking of the manner of her death, he ſayeth alſo: Yet lo: the Gaules, thoſe worthe men of might threw her not downe, into the ruines of Ro, But from their armes, whereer with they vrote to fight they caſt their ſhields vnder her body fo, That ſhe ſurpreſt with ſuch an heauy weight, (Ah vooſfull mayde) to death was ſmoothed ſtraight.

E And a lide after, in speaking of the manner of her death, he sayeth also:
 Tet lo: the Gaules, thofe vortithe men of might thevve her not darvne into the vvaues of Po, But from their ames, vvhether vwith they vvwonte to fight they cast their shields vpon her body fo, That she fuppreft vwith fuch an heauy vvaight, (Ah vvwofull mayde) to death vvas fmootherd ftraight.

This mayden therefore being buried in the same place, the whole hill was called afterwards Tarpēia after her name, which continued vntill Tarquinius the King dyd dedicate all the place to Iupiter: for then they carryed her bones into some other place, and so it lost her name. Onles it be that rocke of the Capitoll, which at this present time they call Rupes Tarpēia, from the topp whereof they were wonte in olde time to throwe downe hedlong all wicked offenders. When the SABYNES now had gotten this holde, Romulus being exceeding wrathe, sent them them dyd first counsell alone with his hundred Senators, and afterwards they dyd all assemble together. Tatius dwelt in the place where now is the temple of Iuno Moneta: Romulus in the place called at this present, the stayers of the fayer bäck, then the descent of mount Palatine, as they goe to the shewe place or great listes, where they faye was sometime the holy cornell tree, whereof they make fo great accompt. Romulus one daye desirous to proue his strength, threwe (as it is layed) a dart from mount Auentine toward mount Palatine. The staffe whereof was of a cornell tree: & the Iron of it entred so deepe into the ground being a lustye fattlefoyle, that no man could pul it out, although many proued it, and did the best they could. The ground being very good and fit to bring forth trees, did so nourish the ende of this staffe, that it tooke roote, and beganne to spread branches: so that in time it became a fayer great cornell tree, which the successours of Romulus did inclose with a walle, & dyd kepe and worshipped it as a very holy thing. If by chance any went to see it, and found it looked not freshe and grene, but like a tree withered and dried awaye for lacke of moysture: he went awaye straight as one affrayed, crying to all he met (& they with him went crying fill) in euery place, water, water, as it had bene to haue quenched a fyre. Then ranne they thither out of all quarters with vessels of water, to water and moyste the tree. In the time of Caesar, who caused the stayers about it to be payed: they faye the labourers raying the place, and digging about this cornell tree, dyd by negligence hurte the rootes of the fame in fuche sorte, as afterwards it dyed vp altogether. Nowe the SABYNES receyued the moneths after the manner of the Romaines, whereof we haue written sufficiently in the life of Numa. Romulus againe vsed the SABYNES sheldes: and both he and his people chaunged the faction of their armour and weapons they vsed. For the ROMAINES before dyd carye lide sheldes after the faction of the ARGIVES. As for either of their holy dayes and sacrifices, they kept them bothe together, and dyd not take awaye any of them, which either the one or the other people obserued before, but they added thereunto some other newe. As that which they call Matronalia, which was instituted in honour of the women, because by their meanes peace was concluded. And that also of Carmentalia, in the honour of Carmenta, whom some suppose to be the goddesse of fate or destine, because the hathe rule & power ouer the natiuities of men, by reason whereof, the mothers call vpon her often, & reuerence her very much. Other faye she was the wife of Euander the Arcadian, who being a propheteffe inspired by the god Phoebus, gaue the oracles in verse, wherupō she was surnamed Carmenta, because that Carmina in Latine signifie verses: for it is of certaintie that her proper name was Nicostrata. Howbeit there are some which geue another manner of deriuation and interpretation of this worde Carmenta, which is the liklier to be true: as if they would faye, Carens mente: which signifieth wanting wit, for the very furie that raketh them when they are inspired with the propheticall spirit. For in Latine Carere, betokeneth to lacke: and Mens, signifieth wit. As for the feast of Palilia, we haue tolde of it before: but the feast of Lupercalia, considering the time of celebrating thereof, it seemeth it is ordeined for a purification. For it is celebrated on the vnfortunate dayes of the month of Februarie, which are called the purging dayes. The dayes in the olde time on which they did celebrate the same, were called Februa. But the proper name of the feast, is as much to faye, as the feast of woulues. Wherefore it seemeth to be a feast of great antiquitie, and instituted by the ARCADIANS which came in with Euander: albeit the name of woulues is as comon to the females, as the males, & so it might perhappes be called, by reason of the woulfe that brought vp Romulus. For we see those which runne vp & down the cittie that daye, & they call Luperci, doe beginne their course in the very place where they faye Romulus was cast out. Howbeit many things are done, whereof the originall cause were hard now to be coniectured. For goates about a certaine time of the yere are killed, then they bring two young boyes, noble mens sonnes, whose foreheades they touch with the knife beclouded with the bloude of the goates that are sacrificed. By & by they drye their foreheads with wolle dipped in milke. The theyong boyes must laughe immediately after they haue dried their foreheads. That done they cut the goates skinned, & make thonges of the, which they take in their hands, & runne with them all about the cittie stark naked (sauiug they haue F a clothe before their secrets) and so they strike with these thonges all they mete in their waye. The yonge wiues doe neuer shonne them at all, but are well contented to be striken with them, beleeuing

A beleeuing it helpeth them to be with childe, and also to be easely deliuered. There is another thing yet in this feast, that these LUPERCIANS which runne about the cittie, doe also sacrifice a dogge. Concerning this feast, the Poet named Ennius dothe write somewhat in his elegies, where shewing the occasion of the fond customes and ceremonies of the Romaines, he dothe faye that Romulus after he had slayne Amulius, did runne straight with great ioye to the very place where the wolve gaue him & his brother sucke, in memory of which running, he fayeth this feast of Lupercalia was celebrated: & that the noble mens younger sonnes doe runne through the cittie, striking & laying on them which they meete in their way with their goate thonges, in token that Remus and Romulus ranne from ALBA vnto that place, with their drawn swordes in their hāds. And that the touching of their forehead with a bloudy knife, is in remembrance of the daunger they stood in at that time to haue bene slaine. Last of all, the drying of their foreheades with wolle dipped in milke, is in memorie of the milke they sucked of the woulfes. But Caius Ascius writeth, that Remus and Romulus before Rome was built, did happen to lose their beasts on a daye, & after they had made certaine prayers vnto Favnus for the finding of them, they ranne here & there starcke naked as they went a seeking of the, for feare they should haue bene troubled with ouermuch heate & sweate. And this is the cause he fayeth, why the LUPERCIANS doe at this daye runne about naked. And if it be true they make this sacrifice for a purging, a man might faye they might offer vp a dogge for that purpose, like as the Gracians in their sacrifices doe solemnise this rite: it is not impartinē they sacrifice a dogge, because he is enemie to the woulues. Onles a man would faye it was to punish the beast, which troubleth and letteth the LUPERCIANS when they runne. Some faye also it was Romulus, who first instituted it a religion to kepe holy fire, & that first ordeined holie virgines, which are called Vestales: other doe ascribe it to Numa Pompilius. Notwithstanding it is most certaine otherwise, that Romulus was a very deuoute man, & greatly skilfull in telling of things to come by the flying of birds: for which cause he did ordinarie carie the augurs crooked staffe, called in Latin Lituus. It is a rodde crooked at the end, wherewith the augurs or soothsayers when they sit down to behold the flying of birds, doe poynthe out & marke the quarters of the heauen. They carefully kept it within the pallace: howbeit it was lost in the time of warres with the GALLS, when the cittie of ROME was taken. Afterwards when these barbarous people were chased and driuen out, it was founde againe (as it is layed) all whole, within a great hill or heape of ashes, hauing no māner of hurte, where all things els about it had bene consumed and marred with the fire. He is sayd to haue made certaine lawes, among which there is one that seemeth somewhat harde, which is: that the manis suffered to put away his wife, and in some case to geue her nothing: and like libertie is not geuen to the wife to put away her husband. As if the maye be proued to haue consented to the poisoning of her children, or to haue counterfaiet her husbands keyes, or to haue committed adulterie. But if he put her awaye for any other cause, then the one halfe of the goodes is adiudged to the wife, and the other moytie to the goddesse Ceres: and she that putteth away his wife after this sorte, is commanded further, to sacrifice to the goddes of the earth. This also was notable in Romulus, who hauing ordeined no payne nor punishment for parricides (that is for those that kill their parents) called yet all murder parricide, to shewe how detestable that murder was, and as for parricides, he thought it vnpossible. And it seemed a great while, he had reason to thincke so, that such wickednes would neuer happen in the worlde. For in fixe hundred yeres together it was not known that any man in ROME committed suche an offence: and the first parricide with them was Lucius Othius, after the warres of Hanniball. But enough touching this matter. Furthermore in the first yere of the reigne of Tatius, some of his kynemen and friendes met by chance on the waye certaine ambassadours, coming from the cittie of LAVRENTVM vnto ROME, whom they set vpon, and ment to haue robbed them. F The ambassadours resisting them, and not willing to deliuer their money, they made no more a doe, but slewe them. This haynous deede being thus committed, Romulus was of opinion they shoulde be executed openly in the high waye for example. But Tatius Roma.

deferred it still from daye to daye, and dyd all wayes excuse the matter vnto him, which was the only cause, they fell out one with the other. For in all things els, they caried them selues as honestly as might be the one to the other, ruling and gouerning together, with a common consent and good accorde. But the parents & kynsfolkes of those who were murdered, when they sawe they could haue no iustice because of Tatius: watched him one daye as he sacrificed with Romulus, in the citie of Launium, and stabbed him one daye as he sacrificed with, but rather prayed him for a good and righteous prince. Romulus cauled the bodye of Tatius to be straight taken vp, and buried him very honorably in mount Auentine, about the place nowe called Arministrium. Further he neuer shewed any countenance to reuenge his death. There are some Historiographers that write, that those of the citie of Laurentum beinge afraid at this murder, dyd deliuer forthwith to Romulus the murderers of the ambassadours. He notwithstanding dyd let them goe againe, saying: one murder was requited by another. This gaue some occasion of speache to thincke, he was glad he was rydde of his companion: yet the Sabynes neither sturred nor rebelled for all this, but some of them were affrayed of him for the great loue they bare him, other for his power he was of, & other for the honour they gaue him as a god, continuing still in due tie & obedience towards him. Diuers strangers also had Romulus valiantie in great honour: as amongst other, those who then were called the auncient Latines, which sent ambassadours to him to make league and amitie with him. He deuised to take the citie of Fidena which was nere neighbour to Rome. Some saye he tooke it vpon a sodaine, hauing sent before certen horse men to breake downe the hookes & hingewes with force, which the gates hang by: & him self came after with the rest of his armie, and stale vpon them, before the citie mistrusted any thing. Other write that the Fidenates first inuaded his coutrye, and foraged vnto the very suburbs of Rome, where they did great harme: and howe Romulus layed an ambush in their waye as they returned home, and slew a great number of them. When he tooke their citie, he did not rase it, but made a colonye of it, (as a place to send the ouerincrease of Rome vnto) whether he sent afterwards two thousand five hundred Romains to inhabit there: & it was on the thirteenth daye of Aprill, which the Romains call the Ides of the same month. Not long after there rose such a great plague in Rome, that men died iudainly, and were not sicke: the earth brought forth no fruite: brute beasts deliuered no increase of their kynde: there rayned also droppes of bloude in Rome, as they saye. In so much as besides the euills men felt in this extremitie, they fell in a maruelous feare of the wraethe of the goddesses. Afterwards perceiving the like happened to the inhabitants of Laurētum, then euery man iudged it was the very vengeance and heauie hand of the goddesses, who plagued and punished these two cities for the murder committed vpon Tatius, and the ambassadours that were killed. Whereupon the murderers of both sides were apprehended, and executed: and these plagues by and by ceased both in the one and in the other citie. Romulus besides, did purifie the cities with certaine sacrifices that he deuised, which they keepe still at this daye, at the gate called Ferentina. But before the plague ceased, the Camerines came to assaulte the Romains, & had ouercomen all the countrie, supposing they should not be able to withstand them, because they had bene so worrumbled with the plague. Yet notwithstanding, Romulus set vp on them with his army, & wanne the field of them, in which conflict there were slaine about fixe thousand men. After the battell done, he tooke their citie, & conueyed to Rome the one half of the inhabitants that remained. After this, he sent twise as many Romains as there were naturall Camerians left at Camerine, to dwell there among them. This was done the first daye of August: so great was the multitude of the inhabitants of Rome that had increased in sixteene yeres from the first foundation of the citie. Among other spoiles he got there, he caried away a charret of brasse with foure horses, which he caused to be set vp in the temple of Vulcan, and his owne statue vpon it, and victorie crowning him with a garland triuphant. His power beinge grown thus great, his weake neighbours did submit themselves vnto him, beinge contented to liue in peace by him. His stronger neighbours were affrayed of him, and eniued much his greames, and dyd take it no good policie to suffer him thus to rise in the face of the world, and thought it meete speedilie to dawnte his glorie, and clippe his wings. The first of the Thuscans that bent their power against him, were the Veians, who had a great countrie, & dwelled in a stronge and mightie citie. To picke a quarrell

A quarrell to him, they sent to haue redeliuered to the citie of Fidena, which they saye belonged vnto them. This was thought not only vnreasonable, but a thing worthy laughing at, considering that all the while the Fidenates were in warre, & daunger, the Thuscans neuer came to their ayde, but had suffered them to be slayne, and then came to demaunde their lands, and tenements, when other had possession of them. Therefore Romulus hauinge geuen them an answer full of mockerie, and derision, they diuided their power into two armies, and sent the one against them of Fidena, and with the other they marched towards Rome. That which went against the citie of Fidena, preyed, and killed there two thousand Romains: the other was ouerthrowen and discomfited by Romulus, in which there dyed eight thousand Veians. Afterwards, they met againe somewhat nere the citie of the Fidenates, where they fought a battell: and all dyd confesse, the chiefe exploit was done by Romulus owne hands that daye, who shewed all the skill and valliantnes that was to be looked for in a worthy capitaine. It seemed that daye, he farre exceeded the comon sorte of men in strength of bodye, & feates of armes. Neuertheles that which some saye, is hardly to be credited: & to be plaine, is out of all compasse of beliefe and possibilitie. For they write, there were foureteen thousand men slayne at that battell, & that more then halfe of them were slayne by Romulus owne hands: & the rather, for that euery man iudgeth it a vaine bragge and ostentation which the Messians reporte of Arifomenes, who offered in sacrifice to the goddes three hundred beastes of victorie, as for so many Lacedemonians him self had slayne in the battell. Their armie beinge thus broken, Romulus suffered them to flye who by swiftnesse could saue them selues, and marched with all his power in good arraye towards their citie. The citizens then considering their late great losse and ouerthrowe, would not hazard the daunger of withstanding him, but went out all together, & made their humble petition & sute for peace. All was graunted them for a hundred yeres, saue they should forgoe their territorie called Septemagium, that was the tenth parte of their countrey: & yeld to the Romains all their salt houles by the riuers side; and deliuer fiftie of their chiefe citizens for their pledges. Romulus made his entrie and triumphe into Rome for them, the daye of the Ides of October, which is the fiftenth daye of the same month, leading in his triumphe many prisoners taken in those warres: & among other, the generall of the Veians, a very auncient man who fondly beuished him self in his charge, and shewed by his doings, that his experience was farre shorter for his yeres in the warres. And from thence it cometh, when they offer to the goddes to geue thanks for this victorie, that euen at this daye, they bring to the capitoll through the market place an old man apparelled in a purple robe, & with a luel called Bulla about his necke, which the gentlemen's young children weare about their neckes: & a heraulde goeth harde by him, crying, who buyeth who, the Sardians, because they holde opinion the Thuscans are come of the Sardians, and the very citie of Veies standeth in the countrie of Thuscane. This was the laste warre that Romulus had offered him: after which he could not beware of that which is wonre to happen almost to all those, who by sodaine prosperitie, and fortunes special fauour, are raised to highe and great estate. For trusting to prosperitie and good successe of his adoe, he beganne to growe more strange and statelie, and to carie a fowerer countenance then he was wont to doe before: leauing to beaue his olde manner, a courteous and gracious prince, and gaue him selfe in facions to be somewhat like a tyrant, both for his apparell, and statelie porte and maiestie that he caried. For he wore euer a coate of purple in graine, and vpon that, a longe robe of purple culler: and gaue audience, sitting in a wyde chayer of estate, hauinge euer about him young men called Celeres, as we would saye, flights for their swiftnesse & speede in executing of his commaundements. Other there were that went before him, who caried as it were rapiers in their hands, to make the people geue roome, and had leather thongs about their middle to binde fast freight, all the prince should commaunde. Nowe in olde time the Latines sayd, Liguri was so binde: but at this present they saye Alligari, from whence it cometh that the others and seagants are called Littores. Howbeit me thinks it were more likely to saye, they had put to a. c. & that before they were called Littores, without a. c. For they be the very same which the Grecians call Liturgos, and be in Englishe, ministers or officers: and at this daye, Leitos, or Loos, in the Grecians tongue signifieth the people. Romulus now after his grandfather Numerus was dead at the cittie of ALBA, and that the Realme by inheritance fell to him: to winne the fauour of A the people there, turned the Kingdome to a Comon weale, and euery ere dyd chuse a newe magistrate to minister iustice to the S A B Y N E S. This president taught the noble men of R O M E, to seeke and desire to haue a free estate, where no subiect should be at the commaundement of a King alone, and where euery man should commaund & obey as should be his course. Those which were called Patricians in R O M E, dyd medle with nothing, but had onely an honorable name and robe, and were called to counsaill rather for a facion, then to haue their aduise or counsaile. For when they were assembled together, they dyd onely heare the Kings pleasure and commaundement, but they might not speake one word, and so departed: hauing no other preheminence ouer the Comon wealte, fauing they were the first that dyd knowe what was done. All other things thereby dyd greue them lesse. But when of his owne mere authoritie, & B as it were of him selfe, he would as pleased him, bestowe the conquered lands of his enemies to his souldiers, and restore againe to the V E I A N S their hostages as he dyd: therein plainly appeared, how great iniurie he dyd to the Senate. Vwhereupon the Senatours were suspected afterwards that they killed him, when with in fewe dayes after it was layed, he vanished away so straungely, that no man euer knewe what became of him. This was on the seuenth daye of the moneth nowe called Iuly, which then was named Quintilis, leauing no manner of certaintie els of his deathe that is knowen, saue only of the daye and the time when he vanished, as we haue fayd before. For on that daye, the R O M A I N E S doe at this present many things, in remembrance of the misfortune which happened to them then. It is no maruell, the certaintie of his deathe was not known: seeing Scipio Africanus was founde after supper dead in his house, and no man could tell, nor yet dyd know how he dyed. For some saye that he fainted, and dyed sodainly being of weak complexion. Other saye he poysoned him selfe: other thincke his enemies dyd get secretly in the night into his house, & smothered him in his bed. Yet they founde his body layed on the ground, that euery body might at leysure consider, if they could finde or coniecture the manner of his death. Howbeit Romulus vanished away sodainly, there was neither seene peece of his garments, nor yet was there found any parte of his body. Therefore some haue thought that the whole Senatours fell vpon him together in the temple of Vulcan, and how after they had cut him in peces, euery one caried away a peece of him, folded close in the skytte of his robe. Other thincke also, this vanishing away was not in the temple of Vulcan, nor in the presence of the Senatours only: but they saye that Romulus was at that time without the D cittie, neere the place called the goates marthe, where he made an oration to the people, and that sodainly the weather changed, and ouercast so terribly, as it is not to be tolde nor credited. For first, the sunne was darckned as if it had bene very night: this darcknes was not in a calme or still, but there fell horrible thunders, boysterous windes, and flashing lightnings on euery side, which made the people runne away, and scatter here and there, but the Senatours kept still close together. Afterwards when the lightning was past and gone, the daye cleared vp, & the element waxed fayer as before. Then the people gathered together againe, & sought for the King: asking what was become of him. But the noble men would not suffer them to enquire any further after him, but counsellled them to honour and reuerence him as one taken vp into heauen: and that thenceforth in steade of a good King, he would be vnto them a mercifull E & gracious god. The meane sorte of people (for the most parte of them) tooke it well, & were very glad to heare thereof: & went their waye worshipping Romulus in their hartes, with good hope they should prosper by him. Howbeit some seeking out the trothe more egerly did cõber fore, and troubled the Patricians: accusing them, that they abused the common people with vaine & sonde persuasions, whilst them selues in the meane time had murdered the King with their owne hands. While things were thus in hurly burly, some saye there was one Julius Præclius, the noblest of all the Patricians, being esteemed for a maruelous honest man, & known to haue bene very familar with Romulus, & came with him from the cittie of A L B A: that stepped forth before all the people, and affirmed (by the greatest and holiest othes a man might sweare) that he had met Romulus on the waye, farre greater and fayer, then he had seene him: & euer before, and armed all in white armour, shynig bright like fire: whereat being affrayed in that sorte to see him, he asked him yet O King, why hast thou thus left and forsaken vs, that are so falsely

A so falsely accused and charged to our vices discredite and shame, by thy vanishing: To whom Romulus gaue this answer. Proculus, it hath pleased the goddess from whom I came, that I should remaine amongst men so long as I dyd: and nowe hauing built a cittie, which in glorie and greatnes of empire shalbe the chiefe of the worlde, that I should returne againe to dwell with them, as before, in heauen. Therefore be of good comforte, & tell the R O M A I N E S, that they exercising prouesse and temperancie, shalbe the mightiest and greatest people of the worlde. As for me, tell them I will henceforth be their god, protectour, and patron, and they shall call me Quirinus. These wordes seemed credible to the R O M A I N E S, all for the honesty of the man that spake them, as for the solemne othes he made before them all. Yet I wrote not how, some celestiall motion, or diuine inspiration helped it much: for no man sayed a word B against it. And so all suspection and accusation layed aside, euery man began to call vpon Quirinus, so praye vnto him, and to worshipping him. Truly this tale is much like the sales that the G R E C I A N S tell of Ariste as the proconnesian, & of Cleomedes the Athypalæian. For they saye, that Ariste dyed in a fullers worke house, & his friends comming to carie away his bodye, it fell out they could not tell what became of it: & at that instant there were some which came out of the fields, and affirmed they met and spake with him, and how he kept his waye towards the cittie of C R O T O N A. It is layed also that Cleomedes was more then a man naturally strong and great, and therewithall madde, and furious hastic. For after many desperate partes behad played, he came at the last on a daye into a schoole house full of litle children, the roofo wherof was borne with one pillar, which he dyd hit with so terrible a blowe of his fiste, that he brake C in the middle, so as the whole roofo fell and dashed the poore children in peces. The people ranne straight after him to take him. But he threwe him selfe forthwith into a chest, and pulled the lyd vpon him. He helde it so fast downe, that many struing together all they could to open it, they were not able once to fyrry it. Vwhereupon they brake the chest all in peces, but they found the man neither quicke nor dead. Whereat they were maruailously amazed, and sent to Apollo Pythias, where the propheteffe answered them in this verse:

Cleomedes the last of the demy goddes.

The reporte goeth also that Alcmenes corse dyd vanishe awaye, as they caried it to buriall, and howe in steade thereof they founde a stone layed in the beere. To conclude, mentt maye other suche wonders, that are farre from any apparance of trothe: only because they would D make men to be as goddes, and equall with them in power. It is true, that as to reprove and denie diuine power, it were a lewde and wicked parte: euen so to compare earthe and heauen together, it were a mere follie. Therefore we must let suche fables goe, being most certaine that as Pindarus sayeth it is true.

Eche liuing corps must yelde at last to deathe, and euery life must leese his vitall breathe: The soule of man, that onely liues on hie, and is an image of eternitie.

For from heauen it came, and thither againe it dothe returne, not with the bodye, but then soonest, when the soule is furthest of and separated from the bodye, and that she is kept holy, E & is no more defiled with the flesh. It is that the philosopher Heraclitus mentt, when he sayed. The drye light, is the best fowle which flyeth out of the bodye, as lightning dothe out of the clowde: but that which is ioynd with the bodye being full of corporall passions, is a grosse vapour, darke and masse, & cannot flame, ryse or shoote out like lightning. We must not beleue therefore, that the bodyes of noble and vertuous men, doe goe vp together with their soules into heauen, against the order of nature. But this we are certainly to beleue, that by the vertues of their soules (according to diuine nature and iustice) they doe of men become saints, and of saints halfe goddes, and of halfe goddes, entier and perfect goddes: after that they are perfectly (as it were by sacrifices of purgation) made cleane and pure, being deliuered from all paine & mortallitie, & not by any ciuill ordinance, but in trothe & reacion, they receaue F a most happie and glorious ende. Now touching Romulus surname, which afterwards was called Quirinus: some saye that it signifieth as much as warlike: other thinke he was so called because the R O M A I N E S them selues were called Quirites. Other write, that men in old time did call the poynte of a speare, on the darte it selfe. Quirix: by reason whereof the image of Iuno surnamed Quiritides, was set vp with an iron speare, and the speare which was consecrated in the Kings pallace, was called Mars. Furthermore it is an vse amongst men, to honour them with a speare or darte, which haue shewed them selues valiant in the warres: and that for this cause Romulus was surnamed Quirinus, as who would laye, god of the speares and warres. There was since buyt a temple vnto him, in the hill called Quirinus, and so named of him. The daye whereon he vanished, is called the flying of the people, or otherwise the Nones of the goates. For on that daye, they goe out of the citie to doe sacrifice in the place called the Fenne, or the goates marthe: and the ROMAINES call a goate, Capra. As they goe thus together, they call with lowde thowtes and cryes vpon diuers Romaines names, as Marcus, Cneus, and Gaius, in token of the flying that was then: and that they called one another backe againe, as they ranne awaye in great feare and disorder. Howbeit other saye, that it is not done to shewe the running awaye, but to shewe their speede and diligence, and referre it to the storie. Nowe after the GAULES that had taken ROME were expelled by Camillus, the citie was so weakened, that they could scante recouer their force and strength againe: wherefore many of the LATINES ioyning together, went with a great mightie armie, vnder the conducte of Lucius Posthumus, to warre against the ROMAINES. This Posthumus brought his campe as neere the citie of ROME as he could, & sent to the ROMAINES by a trumpet to let them vnderstand, how the LATINES were desirous by newe mariages, to restore their olde auncient amitie and kinned that was neere hand decayed betwene them: and therefore if the ROMAINES would send them a conuenient number of their daughters and young widowes to marie with them, they should haue peace, as they had before time with the SABYNES, vpon the like occasion. The ROMAINES herat were fore troubled, thinking that to deliuer their women in such sorte was no better, then to yelde and submit them selues to their enemies. But as they were thus perplexed, a wayting mayde called Philotis (or as other call her, Tutola) gaue them counsell to doe neither the one nor the other, but to vse a pollicy with them, by meanes whereof they should scape the daunger of the warres, and should also not be tyed nor bounde by any pledges. The deuise was, they should send to the LATINES her selfe, and a certaine number of their fayrest bonde maydes, trimmed vp like gentlewomen and the best cittizens daughters, and that in the night shewould lifte them vp a burning torche in the ayer, at which signe they should come armed, and set vpon their enemies as they laye a sleepe. This was brought to passe: and the LATINES thought verely they had bene the ROMAINES daughters. Philotis sayled not in the night to lyft vp her signe, and to shewe them a burning torche in the toppes of a wilde figge tree: and dyd hange certaine couerlets and clothes behinde it, that the enemies might not see the light, and the ROMAINES contrariwise might deerne it the better. Thereupon so sone as the ROMAINES sawe it, they ranne with all speede, calling one another by their names, and issued out of the gates of the citie with great haste: and so rooke their enemies vpon a sodaine, and slewe them. In memorie of which victorie, they doe yet solemnise the feast called the Nones of the goates, bicause of the wilde figge tree called in Latine Caprificus. And they doe feast the women without the citie, vnder shadowes made of the boughes of figge trees. The wayting maydes, they ranne vp and downe, and playe here and there together. Afterwards they seeme to fight, and throwe stones one at another, as then they dyd when they holpe th: ROMAINES in their fight. But fewe writers doe auowe this tale, bicause it is on the daye time that they call so eche other by their names, and that they goe to the place which they call the goates marthe, as vnto a sacrifice. It seemeth this agreeth better with the first historie when they called one another by their names in the night, going against the LATINES: onles peraduenture these two thinges after many yeres happened vpon one daye.

Furthermore, they saye Romulus was taken out of the worlde, when he was foure and fiftie yeres of age, and had reigned eight and thirre yeres by accompt.

THE COMPARISON OF

Theſeus with Romulus.

THVS haue we declared all things of Theſeus and Romulus worthy memorie. But to compare the one with the other, it appeareth first that Theſeus of his owne voluntarie will, without compulsion of any (when he might with safety haue reigned in the citie of TROEZEN, and succeeded his grandfather in no small kingdome) dyd desire of him selfe, and rather sought meanes to aspire to great things: and that Romulus on the other side, to deliuer him self from bondage and seritude that laye fore vpon him, and to escape the threatned punishment which still dyd hange ouer his head, was certainly compelled (as Plato sayeth) to shewe him selfe hardie for feare: who seeing howe extremely he was like to be handled, was of very force constrained to seeke aduenture, and hazarde the enterprise of attaining high and great things. Moreover the chiefest acte that euer he dyd was, when he slewe one onely tyranne of the citie of ALBA called Amulius: where Theſeus in his iorney only, as he trauelled, gaue his minde to greater enterprises, and slewe Sciron, Sinnis, Procrustes, and Corynetes. And by ridding them out of the worlde, he deliuered GABE of all those cruell tyrannes, before any of those knewe him whom he had deliuered from them. Furthermore, he might haue gone to ATHENS by sea, and neuer needed to haue trauelled; or put him selfe in daunger with these robbers, considering he neuer receyued hurte by any of them: where as Romulus could not be in safetie whilest Amulius liued. Hereupon it may be alledged, that Theſeus vnprovoked by any priuate wronge or hurte receyued, dyd set vpon these detestable theues and robbers: Remus and Romulus contrariwise, so long as the tyranne dyd them no harme, dyd suffer him to oppresse and wronge all other. And if they alledge these were noble dedes, and worthy memorie: that Romulus was hurte fighting against the SABYNES, and that he slewe king Acron with his owne handes, and that he had overcome and subdued many of his enemies. Then for Theſeus on thother side may be objected, the battell of the CENTAVRS, the warres of the AMAZONES, the tribute due to the king of CRETA: and howe he ventured to goe him selfe thither with the other young boyes and wenches of ATHENS, as willingly offering him selfe to be deuoured by a cruell beaste, or els to be slayne and sacrificed vpon the tumber of Androgeus, or to become bondslawe & tyed in captiuitie to the vile seruice of cruell men and enemies, if by his courage and manhodde he could not deliuer him self. This was such an acte of magnanimitie, iustice & glorie, & briefly of so great vertue, that it is vnpossible truly to be set out. Surely me thinckes the philosophers dyd not ill define loue, when they sayd she was a seruitor of the goddes, to saue young folkes, whom they thought meete to be preferred. For, the loue of Ariadne was in mine opinion the worke of some god, and a meane purposely prepared for Theſeus safety. Therefore the woman is not to be reproached nor blamed

nister of the goddes.

for the loue she bare Theseus, but rather it is muche to be wondered at, that euery man and woman in like wise dyd not loue him. And if of her selfe she fell in loue with him, I saye (and not without cause) she afterwards deserued to be beloued of a god, as one that of her owne nature loued valiantnes and honour, and entertained men of singuler value. But both Theseus and Romulus being naturally geuen to rule and raigne, neither the one nor the other kept the true forme of a King, but bothe of them dyd degenerate alike: the one chaunging him self into a popular man, the other to a very tyranne. So that by fundrie humours, they both fell into one mischief and error. For a prince aboue all things must keepe his estate: which is no lesse preferred by doing nothing vncomely, as by doing all things honorably. But he that is more seuerer or remisse then he should be, remaineth now no more a King or a prince, but becometh a people pleaser, or a cruell tyrante: and so causeth his subjects to despise or hate him. Yet me thinkes the one is an error of to muche pittie and basenes: and the other of to muche pryde and crueltie. But if we maye not charge fortune with all mischaunces happening vnto men, but that we ought to consider in them the diuerfities of manners and passions, seeing anger is vnreasonable, and wrathe rashe and passionate: then can we not clere the one, nor excuse the other of extreme rage and passion, in the facte committed by the one against his brother, and by the other against his naturall sonne. Howbeit the occasion and beginning of anger doth muche excuse Theseus, who moued with the greatest cause that might be, was put into suche choller and passion. But if Romulus variance with his brother had proceeded of any matter of counsell, or cause of the common weales: there is none so simple to thinke, that his wisdom would so sodainly haue set vpon him. Where as Theseus in contrarie manner killed his sonne, prouoked by those passions that fewe men can auoyde: to wit, loue, ielousie, and false reporte of his wife. Moreouer Romulus anger went to the effect, whereof the issue fell out very lamentable: Theseus anger stretched no further, then to rougher wordes, and olde folkes curses in their heate. For it seemeth, cursed fortune, and nought els, was the cause of his sonnes only mishap, as foretold and witheld for somewhat by his father. These be the speciall things maybe alledged for Theseus. But for Romulus this was anoble thing in him. First his beginning being very lowe and meane, and his brother and he taken for bonde men, and the children of hoggeheards, before they were them selues all free, they set at libertie in manner all the LATINES, winning at one instant many titles of glorie and honour: as destroyers of their enemies, defenders of their parents, Kings of nations, founders of newe cities, and no ouerthrowers of the olde, where as Theseus of many habitations and houses made onely one, and dyd ouerthrowe and plucke downe diuers states, bearing the names of auncient Kings, princes, and halfe goddesses of ATTICA. All these also dyd Romulus afterwards, and compelled his enemies whom he had overcome, to destroye their owne houses, and to come and dwell with their conquerours. And in the beginning, he neuer chaunged nor increased any citie that was buylt before, but buylt him selfe a newe citie out of the grounde, getting all together, land, countrie, kingdome, kindred and mariages, without losing or killing any man: and to the contrarie, rather he dyd good to many poore vacabonds, who had neither countrie, lands, nor houses, and desired nothing els but to make a people amongst them, and to become citizens of some citie. Also Romulus bent not him selfe to followe theues and robbers, but subdued by force of armes many mightie and puissant people: he tooke cities, and triumphed ouer Kings and Princes which he had vanquished in battell. And touching the murder of Remus, it is not certainly knowne of whose hands he dyed. The most parte of authors doe charge other with the death of him. But it is certaine that Romulus deliuered his mother from apparent death, and restored his grandfather to the royall throne of Aeneas, who before was deposed and brought from a King to seruill obedience, without any regarde of honour or dignitie: to whom he dyd many moe great pleasures and seruices. Besides he neuer offended him willingly, no not so muche as ignorantly. Contrarylie I thinke of Theseus, who sayling by negligence to put out his white sayle at his returne, cannot be cleared of parricide, howe eloquent an oration soeuer could be made for his excuse: yea though it were before the most faorable iudges that could be. Wherefore an ATHENIAN very well perceyuing that it was an harde thing to excuse and defend so fowle a faulte, dothe sayne that the good olde man Aegus hauing hauing newes brought him that his sonnes thippe was at hand, dyd runne in so great haste to his castell, to see his sonne arriue a farre off, that as he ranne, his foote hit against some thing, and ouerthrewe him: as though he had none of his people about him, or that neuer a man seeing him runne so hastily to the sea side, dyd make haste to attende and wayte vpon him. Furthermore, Theseus faults touching women and raiuillements, of the twaine, had the lesse shadowe and culler of honestie. Bicause Theseus dyd attempt it very often: for he stale awaye Ariadne, Antiope, and Anaxo the Troezenian. Again being steppend in yeres, and at later age, and past marriage: he stale awaye Helen in her minorie, being nothing neere to consent to marye. Then his taking of the daughters of the TROEZONIANS, of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and the AMAZONES (neither contracted to him, nor comparable to the birthe and linadage of his owne countrie which were at ATHENS, and descended of the noble race and progenie of Erichtheus, and of Cecrops) dyd geue men occasion to suspect that his womannithenes was rather to fatishe lust, then of any great loue. Romulus nowe in a contrarie manner, when his people had taken eight hundred, or thereabouts, of the Sabyne women to raiuilhe them: kept but only one for him selfe that was called Hersilia, as they saye, and deliuered the reste to his best and most honest citizens. Afterwards by the honour, loue, and good entertainment that he caused them to haue & receyue of their husbands, he chaunged this violent force of raiuillement, into a most perfect bonde and league of amitie: which dyd so knyght and ioyne in one these two nations, that it was the beginning of the great mutall loue which grewe afterwards betwext those two people, and consequently of the ioyning of their powers together. Furthermore, time hath geuen a good testimonie of the loue, reuerence, constancie, kyndenes, and all matrimoniall offices that he established by that meanes, betwext man and wife. For in two hundred and thirtie yeres afterwards, there was neuer man that durst forsake or put awaye his wife, nor the wife her husband. And as among the GRECIANS, the best learned men, and most curious obseruers of antiquities doe knowe his name, that was the first murderer of his father or mother: euen so all the ROMAINES knewe what he was, which first durst put away his wife. It was one called Spurius Caruilius, bicause his wife was barren and had no children. The effects also doe agree with the testimonie of the time. For the Realme was common vnto Kings of both nations, and through the alliance of these mariages that beganne first of raiuillements, both nations liued peaceable, and in equalitie, vnder one ciuill policie, and well gouerned common weale. The ATHENIANS contrariwise, by Theseus mariages, dyd get neither loue nor kynred of any one persone, but rather they procured warres, enmities, & the slaughter of their citizens, with the losse in the ende of the citie of APHIDNES: and yet very hardely, and by the mercie of their enemies (whom they honored as gods) they escaped for him, the daunger which the TROIANS suffered afterwards, for the selfe acte done by Alexander Paris. So it fell out at the last, that his mother was not only in daunger, but euen feelingly suffered like miserie and captiuitie, which Hecuba dyd afterwards, when she was forsaken of her sonne: onles peraduenture those things that they write of the imprisonment and captiuitie of Ethra, be founde false, and but fables, as for the fame and memorie of Theseus were behouefull, that both it, and many other things also, were of no more trothe nor likelyhood. That which they write of Romulus diuinements, maketh great difference betwene him and Theseus. For Romulus in his birthe, was preferred by the marvellous fauour of the goddess: Theseus to the contrarie, was begotten against the goddess will, as appeared plainly by the answer of the oracle to Aegus, that he should not meddle with any woman in straunge and foraine countrie.

THE LIFE OF Lycurgus.

MAN cannot speake any thing at all of Lycurgus, who made the A lawes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, but he shall finde great contrarietie of him amongst the historiographers. For, of his parentage & trauail ouer this countrey, of his deathe and making of lawes, of his forme and gouernment, and order of executing the same, they haue written diuersely. And yet about all things, concerning him, they agree worst about the time he liued in. For some of them (and Aristotele is of that number) will needes haue him to haue bene in the time of Iphitus, and that he dyd helpe him to stablish the ordinance that all warres should cease during the feast of the games olympicall: for a testimonie whereof, they alledge the copper coyte which was vsed to be throwen in those games, and had founde B grauen vpon it, the name of Lycurgus. Other computing the dayes and time of the succession of the kings of LACEDÆMON (as Eratothenes, and Apollodorus) saye he was many yeres before the first Olympiades. Timæus also thincketh there were two of this name, and in diuers times: howbeit the one hauing more estimation then the other, men gaue this Lycurgus the glorie of both their doings. Some saye the eldest of the twaine, was not longe after Homer: and some write they sawe him. Xenophon sheweth vs plainly he was of great antiquitie: sayng he was in the time of the Heraclides, who were neere of bloude by descent to Hercules. For it is likely Xenophon ment not those Heraclides, which descended from Hercules self: for the last kings of SPARTA were of Hercules progenie, as well as the first. Therefore he meane those Heraclides, which doubles were the first and nearest before Hercules time. Neuertheles though the historiographers haue written diuersely of him, yet we will not leaue to collect that which we finde C written of him in auncient histories, and is least to be denied, and by best testimonies most to be proued. And first of all, the poet Simonides sayeth, his father was called Prytanis and not Eunomus: and the most parte doe write the pettigree otherwise, as well of Lycurgus self, as of Eunomus.

For they saye, that Patrocles the sonne of Aristodemus begate Sous, and Sous begate Eurytion, and Eurytion begate Prytanis, and Prytanis begat Eunomus, and Eunomus begat Polydectes of his first wife, and Lycurgus of the second wife, called Dianassa: yet Euthychidas an other writer, maketh Lycurgus the sixte of descent in the right line from Polydectes, and the eleuenth after Hercules.
But of all his auncesters, the noblest was Sous, in whole time the citie of SPARTA subdued the

Ilores,

A Ilores, and made them slaues, and dydenlarge and increase their dominion; with the lands and possessions they had got by conquest of the Arcadians. And it is sayed that Sous him self being on a time straightly besieged by the CLITORIANS, in a hard drye ground, where no water could be founde: offered them thereupon to restore all their lands againe that he had gotten from them, if he and all his companie dyd drinke of a fountaine that was there not farre off.
The CLITORIANS dyd graunte vnto it, and peace also was sworne betwene them. Then he called all his souldiers before him, and tolde them if there were any one amongst them that would refrayne from drincking, he would resigne his kingdome to him: howbeit there was not one in all his companie that could (or would) forbear to drinke, they were so fore a thirst. So they all drancke hartely except him self, who being the last that came downe, dyd no more but B a litle moyste his mowthe without, and so refreshed him self, the enemies selues standing by, and drancke not a droppe. By reason whereof, he refused afterwards to restore their lands he had promised, alledging they had not all droncke. But that notwithstanding, he was greatly esteemed for his actes, and yet his house was not named after his owne name: but after his sonnes name Eurytion, they of his house were called Eurytionides. The reason was, because his sonne Eurytion to please the people, dyd first let fall and geue ouer, the sole and absolute power of a King. Whereupon there followed afterwards marueilous disorder and dissolution, which continued a great time in the citie of SPARTA. For the people finding them selues at libertie, became very bolde and disobedient: and some of the Kinges that succee-C ouer the people. Other, either to winne the loue and goodwilles of the people, or because they sawe they were not stronge enough to rule them, dyd geue them selues to dissemble.
And this dyd so muche increase the peoples lofe and rebellious mindes, that Lycurgus owne father being Kinge, was slayne among them. For one daye, as he was parting a fraye betweene two that were fighting, he had suche a wounde with a kytchin knyfe, that he dyed: and left his Realme to his eldest sonne Polydectes, who dyed also sone after, and without heyre of his bodye as was supposed. In so muche as euery man thought Lycurgus should be Kinge: and so he tooke it vpon him, vntill it was vnderstoode that his brothers wife was youngue with childe. Which thing so soone as he perceyued, he published openly, that the Realme belonged to the childe that should be borne, if it were a sonne. After this he gouerned the Realme, D but as the Kings lieutenant and regent. The LACEDÆMONIANS call the regents of their Kinges that are left within age, Prodicos. Lycurgus brothers widow dyd send, and let him secretly vnderstande, that if he would promise to marye her when he should be King, that she would come before her time, and either miscarye, or destroye that she went with. Lycurgus detestably abhorring this brutish and sauage vnnaturallnes of the woman, dyd not re-iect her offer made him, but seemed rather to be very glad, then to dislike of it. Neuertheles he sent her worde againe, she should not neede to trye masteryes, with drinckes and medicines to make her come before her time: for so doing, she might bring her selfe in daunger, and be cast away for euer. Howbeit he aduised her to goe her full time, and to be brought a bed in good order, and then he would finde meanes enough to make awaye the childe that E should be borne. And so with suche persuasions he drew on this woman to her full time of deliuerie. But so soone as he perceyued she was neere her time, he sent certaine to keepe her, and to be present at her labour, commanding them that if she were brought a bed of a daughter, they should leaue her with the woman: and if it were a sonne, they should forthwith bring it to him, in what place soeuer he was, and what busines soeuer he had in hand. It chaunced that the came euen about supper time, and was deliuered of a sonne. As he was sitting at the table with the other magistrates of the citie, his seruants entred the halle, and presented to him the lile babe, which he tenderly tooke in his armes, and sayed openly to them that were present: beholde my lordes of SPARTA, here is a Kinge borne vnto vs. And speaking these wordes, he layed him downe in the Kinges place, and named him Charilaus, as muche to saye, as the ioye of the people. Thus he saue all the lookers on reioycing muche, and might heare them prayse and extoll his sinceritie, iustice, and vertue. By this meanes he raigned only as King, but eight moneths. From thenceforth

he was taken and esteemed so iust and sincere a man among the citizens, that there were more that willingly obeyed him for his vertue, then for that he was the Kings regent, or that he had the gouernment of the whole Realme in his hands. Notwithstanding there were some that bare him displeasure and malice, who sought to hinder & disgrace his credit, and chiefly the friends and kindred of the Kings mother: whose power and honour were thought much impayed by Lycurgus authoritie. In so much, as a brother of hers called Leonidas, entring boldly into great words with him on a daye, dyd nott stick to say to his face. I knowe for a certainte one of these dayes thou wilt be King: meaning thereby to bring him in suspicion with the citizens. Which thing though Lycurgus neuer ment, yet of a subtil and craftie wit Leonidas thought by geuing out such words, that if the young King happened to dye in his minoritie naturally, it would be mistrusted that Lycurgus had secretly made him awaye. The Kings mother also gaue out such like speeches, which in the end dyd so trouble him, with the feare he had, what euil might fall out thereof: that he determined to departe his countrie, and by his absence to auoide the suspicion that therein might growe vpon him any waye. So he trauelled abroade in the worlde as a stranger, vntill his nephew had begotten a sonne who was to succede him in his kingdome. He hauing with this determination taken his iorney, went first of all into Creta, where he diligently obserued and considered the manner of their liuing, the order of the gouernment of their Common weale, and euer kept company with the best, and euer was conferring with the most learned. There he founde very good lawes in his iudgement, which he noted of purpose to carie home to his countrie, to serue when time should come. He founde there other lawes also, but of them he made no reckoning. Nowe there was one man that aboute the reft was reputed wise and skillfull in matters of state & gouernment, who was called Thales: with whom Lycurgus dyd so much by intreatie, and for familiar friendship, that he perswaded him to goe with him vnto Sparta. This Thales was called the Poet Harper, whereupon he had that title and name: but in effect he sange all that the best and sufficientest gouernours of the worlde could deuise. For all his songes were goodly ditties, wherein he dyd exhorte and perswade the people to liue vnder obedience of the law, in peace & concord one with the other. His words were set out with such tunes, countenance, & accents, that were so full of sweetenes, harmony, and pearling: that inwardly it melted mens heartes, and drew the hearers of a loue to like the most honest things, and to leaue all hatred, enmitie, sedition, and diuision, which at that time reigned fore among them. So as it maye be sayed, he it was that prepared the waye for Lycurgus, whereby he afterwards reformed and brought the Lacedemonians vnto reason. At his departing out of Creta, he went into Asia, with intent (as it is sayed) to compare the maner of life and pollicie of thole of Creta (being then very straight and seuer) with the superfluties and vanities of Ionia: and thereupon to consider the difference betwene their two manners & gouernments, as the physician doth, who to knowe the hole & healthfull the better, doth vife to compare them with the sicke & diseased. It is very likely it was there, where he first sawe *Homer*s works, in the hands of the heires & successeurs of Cleophylus: & finding in the same, as well many rules of pollicie, as the great pleasure of Poets faining, he diligently copied it out, and made a volume thereof to carie into Greece. It is true there was much fame abroad of *Homer*s poesies among the Grecians, howbeit there were fewe of them brought together, but were scattered here & there in diuers mens hands, in pamphlets & peeces vnswolde & without any order: but the first that brought them most to light among men, was Lycurgus. The *Egyptian*s saye, that he was in their countrie also, & that hauing founde there one notable ordinance among other, that their souldiers ad men of warre were separated from the rest of the people, he brought the practise of it into Sparta: where setting the marchants, artificers, & labourers euery one a parte by them selues, he did establish a noble Common wealth. So the Egyptian historiographers, and some others also of Greece do write. He was also in Africke, and in Spain, & as farre as India, to conferre with the wise men there, that were called the philosophers of India. I knowe no man that hath written it, sauing Aristocrates, that was Hipparchus sonne. The Lacedemonians wished for him often when he was gone, and sent diuers and many a time to call him home: who thought their Kings had but the honour and title of Kings, and not the vertue or maiestie of a prince, whereby they dyd excell the common people.

A people. But as for Lycurgus, they thought of him thus: that he was a man borne to rule, to commaund, and to geue order, as hauing in him a certaine naturall grace and power, to drawe men willingly to obeye him. Moreouer the Kings them selues were not vnwilling to haue him to returne home, because they hoped that his presence would somewhat brydle, & restrayne the people from their insolencie & disobedience towards them. Whereupon Lycurgus returning home in this opinion and affection of men, it fell out that he was no sooner arriued, but he beganne to deuise how to alter the whole gouernment of the common weale, & throughout to chaunge the whole course and order of the state: thinking that to make only certaine particular lawes were to no purpose, but much like, as one should geue some easie medicine, to purge an over-thrown bodye with all humours and diseases. Therefore he thought first that all grosse & superfluous humours, were meete to be dissolved & purged, and then afterwards to geue them a new forme and order of gouernment. When he had thus determined with him self, before he would take in hand to doe any thing, he went to the city of Delfes: where after he had sacrificed to Apollo, he consulted with him about his matters. From whom he returned with this glorious title by the oracle of Pythia: O beloued of the goddess, and rather god then man. Vv here when he craued grace of Apollo to establish the good lawes in his countrie, it was answered him: that Apollo granted his petition, and that he should ordaine the best and perfectest manner of a Common wealth, that euer had or should bein the worlde. This answer dyd comfort him very much, & so he beganne to breake his purpose to certain of the chief of the citie, & secretly to praye & exhorte them to helpe him, going first to those he knew to be his friends, & after by little & little he wanne others to him, who ioyned with him in his enterprise. So when he saw the time fit for the matter, he caused thirde of the chiefe men of the citie in a morning to come into the market place well appointed & furnished, to suppress those that would attempt to hinder their purpose. Hermippus the historiographer reheareth twentie of the chiefe: but he that aboute all others dyd most assist him in his doings, & was the greatest ayde vnto the establishing of his lawes, was called Aristimachus. The king Charilaus hearing of this assembly, dyd feare there had bene some conspiracie or insurrection against his person, & for his safety he fled into the temple of Iuno, called Chalceaeos, as much to saye, as Iunos brasen temple. Howbeit afterwards when he knew the trothe, he waxed bolde, & came out of the temple againe, & he him self fauored the enterprise, being a prince of a noble minde, howbeit very soft by nature, as witnesseth Archelaus (that was then the other king of Lacedemon) by telling how Charilaus answered one that praised him to his face, in saying he was a good man. And how should I not (quoth he) be good, when I cannot be euill to the euill? In this chaunge of the state, many things were altered by Lycurgus, but his chiefe alteration was, his lawe of the erection of a Senate, which he made to haue a regall power & equall authoritie with the Kings in matters of weight & importance, & was (as Plato sayeth) to be the healthfull counterpeale of the whole bodye of the Common weale. The other state before was euer wauering, sometime inclining to tyrannie, when the Kings were too mighty, & sometime to confusion, when the people would vsurpe authoritie. Lycurgus therefore placed betwene the Kings & the people, a counsaill of Senators, which was as a strong boue, that helde bothe these extremes in an euen ballance, & gaue sure footing & ground to either parte, to make a stand from the state of the common weale. For the eight & twenty Senators, which made the whole bodye of the Senate, tooke sometime the Kings parte, when it was nott full to pull downe the furie of the people: and contrarie, they held sometimes with the people against the Kings, to brydle their tyrannicall gouernment. Aristotle sayeth, he ordained the number of Senators to be but eight and twenty, because two of thirte that ioyned with him, & a fowr, dyd forsake him at his enterprise. Howbeit Sphernus writeth, that from the beginning, he neuer purposed to haue more then eight and twenty to be the Senate, and perhaps he had great regard to make it a perfect number, considering it is compounded of the number of seuen, multiplied by foure: and is the first perfect number next to fixe, being equal to all partes gathered together. But as for me, my opinion is, he chose this number, rather then any other: because he ment the whole bodye of the counsaill should be but thirte persons, adding to that number, the two Kings. Lycurgus tooke so great care to establish this counsell, that he brought an oracle for it, from Apollos temple in

DALPHES. This oracle is called vnto this daye Retra, as who would saye, the same oracle whereof the answer was. When thou hast built a temple vnto Iupiter the Syllanian, and to Minerua the Syllanian, and deuided the people into lineages, thou shalt stablish a Senate of thirtie counsellors, with the two Kings: & shalt assemble the people at times conuenient, in the place betwene the bridge and the riuier Cnacion. There the Senatours shall propound all matters, and breake vp after their assemblies: and it shall not be lawfull for the people to speake one worde. In those dayes the people were euer assembled betwene two riuers, for there was no hall to assemble a counsaill at large, nor any other place prepared for them. For Lycurgus thought no buyled place meete for men to geue good counsaill in, or to determine caules, but rather a hinderance: because in such places men be drawn to muse on vaine things, and their mindes be caried away with beholding the images, tables, and pictures, commonly set vp for ornamēt in such open places. And if it be in a Theater, then beholding the place where the playes and sportes be made, they thincke more of them, then any counsaill. Again, if it be in a great hall, then of the fayer embowed or vawted roofes, or of the fretted feelings curiously wrought, and sumptuously set forth, and tend not still their busines they come for. When the people were assembled in counsaill, it was not lawfull for any of them to put forth matters to the counsell to be determined, neither might any of them deliuer his opinion what he thought of any thing: but the people had only autoritie to geue their assent (if they thought good) to the things propounded by the Senatours, or the two Kings. Howbeit afterwards, the two Kings Polydorus and Theopompus, because the people dyd many times crosse and alter the determination of the Senate, by taking away or adding some thing to it, they dyd adde these wordes to the oracle aforesaid. That if the people would not assent to any ordinance of the Senate, then should it be lawfull for the Kings and Senate to breake vp the counsell, and to frustrate all things done in the same: the wise aduise of the Senate being encountered thus, & their meaning to the best, so peruerted to the worse. These two Kings perswaded the people, that at the very first, this addition came with the oracle of Apollo: as the poet Tyræus maketh mention in the place, where he sayeth:

*From Delphos Ile, this oracle is brought of Pythia: into their country soyle.
The Kings (euen they to whom of right there ought a louing care in princely breasts to boyle, Lycurgus wis-

dome.

Lycurgus now hauing thus tempered the forme of his comon weale, it seemed notwithstanding to those that came after him, that this small number of thirtie persones that made the Senate, was yet to mightie, & of to great autoritie. Wherefore to biddie them in a litle, they gaue them (as Plato sayeth) a bytte in their mouths, & that was the autoritie of the Ephores, which signifie as much as comptrollers: and were erected about a hundred and thirtie yeres after the death of Lycurgus. The first which was chosen of these, was Elatus, and it was in the time of king Theopompus, whose wife on a daye in her anger sayd: howe through his negligence he would leaue lesse to his successours, then he had receyued of his predecessours. To whom he answered againe, not lesse but more, for their shall continue longer, and with a more suertie. For, in losing thus their too absolute power, that wrought them great enuie & hatred among their citizens, they dyd escape the danger & mischief that their neighbours the Argiues, and Messenians dyd feele: who would not geue ouer the foueraine autoritie which they had gotten once. This example maketh Lycurgus great wilddoing and foresight manifestly knowne: who so will deeply consider the seditions & ill gouernements of the Argiues, & Messenians (their neere neighbours and kinsmen) as well from the people, as from the Kings. Who from the beginning had all things alike to the Spartans: & in deuiding of their lands a farre better order then theirs. This notwithstanding, they dyd not prosper longe: but through the pryde of their Kings,

A Kings, and the disobedience of their people, they entred into ciuill warres one against another, shewing by their disorders & misfortunes the speciall grace the godds dyd beare to Sparta, to geue them such a reformer, as dyd so wisely temper the state of their comon weale, as we will shewe hereafter. The second lawe that Lycurgus made, and the boldest and hardest he euer tooke in hande, was the making of a newe diuision of their lands. For he sawe so great a disorder & vnequallity among the inhabitants, as well of the countie, as of the cite Lacedæmon, by reason some (and the greatest number of them) were so poore, that they had not a handfull of ground, and other some being least in number were very rich, that had all: he thought with him self to banishe out of the citie all insolencie, enuie, couetousnes, & delicioufnes, and also all riches and pouertie, which he tooke the greatest, and the most continuall plagues of a citie, or common weale. For this purpose, he imagined there was none so ready and necessarie a meane, as to perswade his citizens to suffer all the landes, possessions, and inheritance of their countie, to runne in common together: and that they should make a newe diuision equally in partition amongst them selues, to liue from thenceforth as it were like brothers together, so that no one were richer the another, & none should seeke to go before each other, any other waye then in vertue only: thincking there should be no difference or vnequallitie among inhabitants of one citie, but the reproaches of dishonestie, & the prayes of vertue. Thus Lycurgus following his determination, dyd out of hande make a lawe of the diuision of their lands. For first he dyd deuide all the countie of Laconia, into thirtie thousand equal parts, the which he dyd set out for those that inhabited about Sparta: and of those landes that ioyned next to the citie of Sparta, that was the chief metropolitian citie of Laconia, he made other nine thousand partes, which he deuided to the natural citizens of Sparta, who be those that are properly called Spartans. Howbeit some will saye, he made but sixe thousand partes, & that king Polydorus afterwards dyd adde to other three thousand partes. Other saye also, that Lycurgus of these nine thousand partes made but the halfe only, & Polydorus the rest. Euery one of these partes was such, as might yelde vnto the owner yerely, three score and tenne bushels of barley for a man, and twelue bushels for the woman, and of wine & other liquide frutes, much like in proportion: which quantitie Lycurgus iudged to be sufficient, to kepe the bodye of a man in health, & to make him stronge & lustie, without any further allowance. They saye after this, as he returned home one day out of the fields, and came ouer the lands where wheate had bene reaped not longe before, and sawe the number of sheaues lying in euery hocke together, & no one (hocke bigger then another: he fell a laughing, & told them that were with him, he thinks all Laconia is as it were an inheritance of many brethern, who had newly made partition together. He gaue an attempt to haue deuided also moueables, & to haue made a common partition betwene them, to the end he would haue utterly taken away all vnequallitie. But finding the citizens tooke it very impatiently, that openly that which they had, should be taken away: he went about to doe it more secretly, and in a conninger wise to take away that couetousnes. For first of all, he dyd forbid all coyne of golde & syluer to be currant: & then he dyd set out certaine coynes of iron which he commaunded only to be currant, whereof a great weight and quantitie was but litle worthe. So as to laye vp therof the value of tenne Minas, it would haue occupied a whole celler in a house, besides it would haue needed a yoke of oxen to carie it any where. Nowe golde & syluer being thus banished out of the countie, many lewde partes & faultes must needs cease thereby. For who would robbe, steale, picke, take awaye, hyde, procure, or whorde vp any thing, that he had no great occasion to desire, nor any profit to possesse, nor would be any pleasure to vfe or employe. For, the iron they occupied for their coyne, they cast vineger vpon it while it was redde hote out of the fire, to kill the strength & working of it to any other vfe: for thereby it was so eger & brittle, that it would bryde no hammer, nor could be made, beaten, or forged to any other facion. By this meane he banished also, all superfluous & vnprofitable sciences, which he knew he should not neede to doc by any proclamation: because they would fall awaye (or the most parte of them) euen of them selues, when the batenes of the money they should take for their worke, should vndo them. For their iron moneys were not currant els where in the cities of Greece, but euery bodye made a ieste of it there. By this occasion, the Lacedæmonians could buye no forreine wares nor marchandises, neither came there any shippe into their haven to trafficke with them, neither any fine curious Rethorician dyd repaire into their cuntry to teache them eloquence, & the cunning craft of lying: nor yet came there to them any wyfard to tell them their fortune, nor any Pander to keepe any brothell house, nor yet goldsmiths or iuellers, to make or sell any toyes or trifles of golde or siluer to set forth women: considering all these things are vsed to be made to get money, and to hound vp that they had not. After this sorte, delicatenes that wanted many things that entertained it, beganne by litle and litle to vanishe awaye, & lastely, to fall off from them selues: when the most rich men had no more occasion then the poorest, and riches hauing no meane to shewe her selfe openly in the worlde, was sayne to remaine shut at home idely, as not able to doe her master any seruice. Thereupon moueables and householde stuffe (which a man cannot be without, and must be daylie occupied) as bedsteades, tables, chayers, and suche like necessaries for house, were excellently well made: and men dyd greatly prayse the facion of the LACONIAN cuppe which they called Cothon, and specially for a souldier in the warres, as Critias was wont to saye. For it was made after such a facion, that the culler of it dyd let the eye to discern the fowle & vnuholle water, which men are driuen oftentimes to drinke in a campe, and goeth many times against ones stomake to see it: and if by chaunce there was any filth or muddie in the bottome, it would cleaue and stick fast vpon the ribbes of the bellie, and nothing came through the necke, but cleane water to his mouth that drank it. The reformer of their state was the cause of all this: because their artificers tending now no superfluous works, were occupied about the making of their most necessary things. Further, nowe to driue awaye all superfluitie and delicioufnes, and to roote out vterly desire to get and gather: he made another thirde lawe for eating and drinking, and against feastes and banquetts. First he willed and commanded the citizens, that they should eate together all of one meate, and chiefly of those he had permitted by his ordinance. Then he dyd expressly forbid them to eate alone, or a parte, or secretly by them selues, vpon riche tables and sumptuous beddes, abusing the labour of excellent worke men, and the deuises oflikorous cookes to cramme them selues in corners, as they doe fatter vp beastes and poultrie, which doth not only breede ill conditions in the minde, but dothe marre the complexions of men, and the good states of their bodie, when they giue them selues ouer to such sensuallitie and gluttonie. Whereof it followeth in the ende that men must needes sleepe muche, to helpe to digest the excessse of meates they haue taken, and then must they goe to the whotte houses to bathe them selues, and spend long time about the ordinarie attendance of their sickely bodies. This was a marueilous thing for him to bring to passe, but much more, to make riches not to be stolen, and least of all to be coueted, as Theophrastus sayd of him: which by this meane of making them eate together with all sobriety at their ordinarie dyet, was brought to passe. For there was no more meane to the riche, then to the poore, to vse to playe, or shewe riches, sithe both of them were forced to be together in one place, and to eate all of one meate: so as that which is commonly spoken, that Pluto the god of riches is blinde, was truly verified only in the citie of SPARTA, about all other places of the worlde. For there riches was layed on the grounde like a corse without a soule, that moeth no whit at all: considering it was not lawfull for any man to eate at home secretly in his house, before he came to their open halles, nor might not come thither for a countenance only to his meales, being already fedde and full fraight. For euery mans eye was vpon those specially which did not eate & drinke with a good stomake amongst them: & it was the vse to reproche them as gluttons, and dayntie mouthed men, which refused to eate as it were in common together. So as this was the ordinance they saye, that grieved most the riche about all that Lycurgus made, and whereat they were most madde and angrie with him: in so muche, as on a daye, they all setting vpon him to alter it, he was compelled to runne out of the market place, and getting grounde of them, he recovered the liberties of a church, before any could ouertake him: sauing one young man called Alexander, who otherwise had no ill nature in him, but that he was somewhat quicke of his hande, and cholericke with all. Who following Lycurgus nerer then any other, dyd geue him a blowe ouerthwart the face with a staffe, and strake out one of his eyes, as Lycurgus turned toward him. Yet for all this, Lycurgus neuer bashed or made worde about the matter, but dyd liue vp his head to those that followed him, and shewed

Custom a strange kinde of cuppe of the Lacedaemonian souldiers.

Lycurgus appointed order for dyet into the Lacedaemonians.

Alexander strooke out Lycurgus eye.

A shewed them his face all a gore bloude, and his eye put out cleane: whereof they were all so fore ashamed, that there was not a man that durst once open his mouth against him, but to the contrarye, they seemed to pittie him, and dyd deliuer Alexander into his handes that had done the dede, to punish him as him selfe pleased. And so they all brought him to his house, and shewed they were right hartely sorie for his hurte. Lycurgus thanking them, returned them all backe againe, saue that he made Alexander to goe with him into his house, where he neuer hurte him, nor gaue him fowle worde: but commaunded him onely to waite vpon him, and made his other ordinarie seruants to withdraw their waiting. This young man who now beganne to spye his owne faulte, dyd most willingly attend vpon him, and neuer spake worde to the contrarye. When he had serued him a certaine time, being very nere continually about him, he beganne to feele and taste of his naturall liberalitie, and sawe of what affection and intention Lycurgus was moued to doe all he dyd: he perceyued what was the feueritie of his ordinary life, and what his constancy was to endure labour without wearines. Alexander then beganne to loue and honour Lycurgus from his hart, and tolde his parents and friends, howe he was no suche feuerie man as he seemed, but was of so kynde and gentle a nature to all men as might be. See I praye you howe Alexander was transformed by Lycurgus, and his punishment also, which he should haue receyued: for of a fierce, rathe, and a lewde conditioned youth he was before, he became nowe a very graue and wise man. But for memorie of this his misfortune, Lycurgus built a temple to Minerva, which he surnamed Oprileide, because the DORIANS which dwell in those partes of PELOPONNESVS, doe call the eyes, opiles. There are other writers (as Dioscorides for one) which saye Lycurgus had a blowe with a staffe, but he had not his eye stricken out with it: and how contrariwise, he founded this temple to Minerva, to giue her thankes for healing of his eye. Hereof it came, that euery since the SPARTANS haue bene restrayned to carie staues in any assembly of counsell. But to returne to their common repasts, which theCRETANS called Andria, and the LACEDAEMONIANS Phiditia, either because they were places wherein they learned to liue soberly and straightly (for in the GREKE tongue Phido, is to fauce and spare) or els because their amitie and friendship grewe there towards one another, as if they would haue called them Philitia, feasts of loue, by chaunging d. into l.: It maye be also they added the first letter as superfluous, and ment to call the places Editia, because they dyd eate and drinke there. They sat in their halles by fiftene in a companie, litle more or lesse, and at the beginning of euery moneth euery one brought a bushell of meale, eight gallons of wine, fise pound of cheefe, and two pound and a halfe of figges for a man, besides some litle portion of their monye to buye certaine freshe acates. And ouer and aboue all this, euery man when he dyd sacrifice in his house, was bounde to send the best and chiefest things of his sacrifice to the halles to be eaten. Likewise if any man went an hunting, and killed any venison: it was an order, he should send a pece of the fleshe thither. Hauing these two lawfull causes, they might eate and drinke by them selues at home, either when they sacrificed any beast to the goddesses, or when they came late home from hunting: otherwise they were bounde of necessitie to meete in their halles at meales, if they would eate any thing. This order they kept very straightly a great time: in so muche as king Agis on a daye, E returning from the warres, where he had ouerthrowen the ATHENIANS, and being desirous to suppe at home priuately with the Queene his wife, he sent to the halles for his portion. But the Polemarchi, that be certaine officers assisting the Kings in the warres, dyd denye him. The next daye Agis left off for spight, to doe the accustomed sacrifice they were wont to celebrate in the ende of euery warre: whereupon they set a fine on his head, and condemned him to paye it. The young children also went to these repasts, euen as they should goe to schooles to learne grauity and temperance, where they heard wife and graue discourses touching the gouernment of a common weale, but not of matters that were as hierlinges. There they learned pretylie to playe vpon wordes, and pleasauntly to spoorte one with another, without any broade speeches, or vncomely lestes, and at others handes to beare the fame againe, without choller or anger. For this propertie haue the LACEDAEMONIANS about all other, to take and geue a mocke without any offence: neuertheles, if any mans nature could not beare it, he neded but praye the partie to forebare his iesting, and so he leste it straight.

warres.

And it was euer an ordinarie among them, that the eldest of the companie tolde the rest that A were come into the hall to meale, with shewing them of the dore: Sirs, remember, there goeth not a worde here out of this dore. Euen so he that would be receyued to meale there in their companie, must first of necessity be allowed and receyued in this sorte, by all the rest. Euery one of them tooke a litle balle of branne or dowe to waite their hands with, and without euer a word speaking, they threw it into a bafe, which the seruant that waited on them at the table dyd carie vpon his head: he that was contented the other should be receyued in companie, dyd cast in his balle as he dyd receyue it, but if he misliked him, then he pressed it flat betwene his fingers, and threw it in. This ball of branne thus pressed flat, was as much as a beane bored thorough, and was to them a signe of condemnation. If any one balle were found of this sorte, the futer was reiecte: for they would not haue any enter into their companie, that was not liked of all the rest. He that thus was reiecte, they saye he was discadd: for the bafe in wherein the litle balles were caried, was called Caddos. The best dishe they serued at these meales, was that they call their blacke brothe: so that when they had that, the olde men dyd eate no fleshe, but leste it all to the young men, and they by them selues dyd eate the brothe. There was a king of PONTVS, that being desirous to taste of this blacke broth, dyd buye of purpose a LACEDÆMONIAN cooke: but after he had once tasted thereof, he was very angry straight. The cooke then sayed vnto him: and it please your grace, ere one shall finde this brothe good, he must be washed first in the riuer of Eurotas. After they had eate and druncke thus soberly together, euery one repaired home without any light: for it was not lawfull for them to goe thither, nor any where els with light, because they should accustom them selues boldly to goe vp and downe the darcke, and all about in the night. This was the order and manner of their meales. But here is specially to be noted, that Lycorgus would in no wise haue any of his lawes put in writing. For it is expressly set downe in his lawes they call Retra, that none of his lawes should be written. For he thought that which should chiefly make a citie happie, and virtuously, ought thoroughly by education to be printed in mens heartes and manners, as to haue continuance for euer: which he tooke to be loue and good will, as a farre stronger knot to tye men with, then any other compulsiue lawe. Which when men by vie and custome through good education doe take in their childhoode, it maketh euery man to be a lawe to him selfe.
Furthermore, concerning buying and bargaining one with another, which are but trifles, and sometime are chaunged in one sorte, and sometime in another, as occasion serueth: he thought D it best not to constrain them to doe it by writing, nor to establishe customes that might not be altered, but rather to leaue them to the libertie and discretion of men which had bene brought vp in the same, bothe to take awaye, and to adde therein, as the case and time should require. But to conclude, he thought the chiefe point of a good lawe maker or reformer of the common weale was, to cause men to be well brought vp and instructed. One of his ordinances therefore was expressly, that not one of his lawes should be written. Another of his deuises was, against superfluous charges and expences: which to auoide, he made a lawe that all roofes of houses should be made only with the axe, and all gates and doores with the sawe, and that without any other toole of occupation. Wherein he had the like imagination as afterwards Epaminondas had, when he sayed, speaking of his table: Such a borde neuer receyue E any treason. Euen so thought Lycorgus, that such a buyt house would neuer receyue curiosities or dainties. For no man is so madly disposed or simply witted, as to bring into so poore and meane houses, bedsteades with siluer feete, imbrodered couerlettes, or counterpointes of purple silke; neither yet plate of golde nor of siluer, nor fuche other like costly furniture and finenes, as those things require to wayte vpon them: because the beddes must be answerable to the meannes of the house, the furnitures of the beddes must be fute like to the same, and all other householde stuffe, dyet, meate, and drinke agreeable to the rest. Hereof proceeded that, which Leontichidas the first King of that name, sayed once: who supping on a time in the citie of CORINTHVS, and seeing therooft of the hall where he satte, lumpuously em-bowed and carued, he asked straight if the trees dyd growe carued so in that countrie. The F third lawe was, he dyd forbyd them to make warre often with one enemy, lest the enemy forced to take often armes in hande, might in the ende growe expertter and valliantier then they.

A they: For this cause king Agelawus was greatly blamed, who was a long time after. For by making often warres with the countrie of BOEOTIA, he made the THEBANS in the ende as expert and valliant souldiers, as the LACEDÆMONIANS. Whereupon Antalidas seeing him hurto one daye, sayed vnto him: The THEBANS haue nobly rewarded thee for their learning, sith thou hast made them expert soldiery vnwilling to learne the discipline of warre: These be the lawes Lycorgus selfe called Retra; and signifie as muche as Oracles; that the god Apollo had discouered to him. Nowe the education of children; he esteemed the chiefest and greatest matter, that a reformer of lawes should establishe. Therefore beginning a farre of, he first considered the state of marriage, and the generation of children. For Aristotle sayeth, that Lycorgus dyd attempt to reforme women, and dyd soone geue it ouer B againe: because he could doe no good therein, by reason of the great libertie they had taken by the absence of their husbands in the warres, compelled often so to be abroad, and that they dyd leaue them mistresses of their house, and at their returne dyd honour them so much, and make of them so beyonde measure, with calling them ladies and mistresses.
Howbeit this is true, that he had an eye to the rule and order of their life, as well as he had of mens: and so reason dyd require. First of all, he willed that the maydens should harden their bodies with exercise of running, wrestling, throwe the barre, and casting the darte, to the ende that the fruite wherewith they might be afterwarde conceyued, taking nourishment of a stronge and lustie bodye, should shoote out and spread the better: and that they by gathering strenght thus by exercises, should more easily awaye with the paynes C of childe bearing. And to take away from them their womanlike dayntines, and finnes, he brought vp a custome, for young maydes and boyes to goe as it were a procession, and to daunce naked at ioleme feastes and sacrifices, and to singe certaine songes of their owne making, in the presence and sight of young men. To whom by the waye they gaue many times prety mockes of purpose, as pleasantly hitting them home, for things wherein before they had forgotten their duties: and sometimes also in their longe for their vertues, wittes, or manners, they prayed them which had deserued it. By this meanes, they dyd set young mens hartes a fire, to strue to winne most prayse and honour. For who so was praysed of them for a valliant man, or whose worthy actes were longe by them, he thereby was in-courage to doe the better another time: and the pretie girdes and quippes they gaue to others, D was of no lesse force, then the sharpest wordes and admonitions that otherwise could be geuen them. This tooke place the rather, because it was done in the presence of the Kings, the Se-natours, & all the rest of the citizens which came thither to see these sportes. And though the maydes dyd shewe them selues thus naked openly, yet was there no dishonesty seene nor offended, but all this sporte was full of playe and toyes, without any youthfull parte or wantonnes:
and rather caried a shewe of demurenes, and a desire to haue their best made bodies seene and spyed. Moreouer, it somewhat lifted vp their hartes, and made them noblier minded, by geuing them to vnderstand, that it was no lesse comely for them, in their kynde and exercises to carie the bell, then it was for men in their games and exercises to carie the price. Hereof it came, that the women of LACEDÆMON were so bolde to saye, and thincke of them selues E that, which Gorgona the wife of king Leonidas one daye answered: being in talke with a strange woman that sayed to her. There be no women in the worlde that commaund their husbands, but you viues of LACEDÆMON. Whereto the Queene straight replied: so be there no women but we, which bringe forth men. Furthermore, these playes, sportes, and daunces, the maydes dyd naked before young men, were prouocations to drawe and allure the young men to marye: not as persuaded by geometrical reason, as sayeth Plato, but brought to it by liking, and of very loue. Those which would not marye, he made infamous by lawe. For it was not lawfull for fuche to be present, where these open games and pastimes were shewed naked. Furthermore, the officers of the citie compelled fuche as would not marye, euen in the hardest time of the winter, to enuironne the place of these sportes, and F to goe vp and downe starcke naked, and to singe a certaine songe made for the purpose against them, which was: that iultely were they punished, because that lawe they disobeyed.
Moreouer, when fuche were olde, they had not the honour and reuerence done them, which old married men vially received. Therefore there was no man that misliked, or reproved that, which was spoken to Derclidas: albeit otherwise he was a noble captaine. For, comming into a presence, there was a young man which would not vouchesafe to rise & doe him reuerence, nor to geue him place for to sit downe: & worthely, g he, because thou hast not gotten a sonne, who maye doe so muche for me in time to come. Those which were desirous to marie any, were driuen to take them awaye by force whom they would marie, not litle younge wenches I meane, which were not of age to be married: but lustie & strong maides of age to beare children. And when one of them was stolen awaye in this sorte, she that was priuie thereto, and meane to make the mariage, came and shaued the heares of her head that was married: then she put her into mans apparell, & gaue her all things fute like to the same, and layed her vpon a matteresse all alone, without light or candell. After this was done, the bridegroom, being neither droncke nor finelier apparelled then he was wonte to be, but hauing supped soberly at his ordinarie, came home secretly to the house where the bride was: and there vntied his wiues girdell, tooke her in his armes, layed her vpon a bed, and talked together a while, and afterwards fayer & softly stole awaye to the place, where he was wonte to sleepe with other young men. And so from thenceforth, he continued allwayes to doe the like, being all the daye time, and sleeping most of the night, with his companions, onles he sometime stole to see his wife, being affrayed, and ashamed euert to be seene, by any of the house where she was. And hereunto his younge wife did helpe for her parte, to spyce meanes and occasions howe they might mete together, and not be seene. This manner endured a great while, and vntill some of them had children, before they boldly met together, and sawe eache other on the daye time. This secret meeting in this sorte did serue to good purposes, not only because it was some meane of continencie and chastetie, but also it kept their bodies in strength and better state, to bring forth children. It continued also in both parties, a still burning loue, and a newe desire of the one to the other, not as it were luke warme, nor wearie, as theirs commonly be which haue their bellies full of loue, and as muche as they lust: but they euer parted with an appetite one from another, keeping still a longing desire to deuise howe to mete againe. Nowe when he had stablished suche a continencie, and so kynde a framed honestie in mariage, he tooke no lesse care to driue awaye all foolerie ialousie therein, thinking it very good reason to beware there should be no violence, nor confusion in mariage: and yet as reason would, they should suffer those which were worthe to get children as it were in common, laughing at the mad follie of them which reuenge such things with warre and bloudshed, as though in that case men in no wise should haue no fellowshipp together. Therefore a man was not to be blamed, being stepped in yeres, and hauing a young wife, if seeing a fayer young man that liked him, and known with all to be of a gentle nature, he brought him home to get his wife with childe, and afterwards would auowe it for his, as if him selfe had gotten it. It was lawfull also for an honest man that loued another mans wife, for that he saue her wife, shamefast, and bringing forth goodly children, to intreate her husband to suffer him to lye with her, and that he might also plowe in that lustie grounde, and cast abroad the seede of well fauored children: which by this meane came to be common in bloude and parentage, with the most honorable and honestest persones. For first of all, Lycurgus did notlike that children should be priuate to any men, but that they should be common to the common weale: by which reason he would also, that such as should become citizens, should not be begotten of euery man, but of the most honestest men only. So Lycurgus thought also there were many foolerie vaine toys and fanfies, in the lawes and orders of other nations, touching mariage: seeing they caused their bitches and mares to be limed and couered with the fayrest dogges and goodliest stalons that might be gotten, praying or paying the masters and owners of the same: and kept their wiues notwithstanding shut vp safe vnder locke and key, for feare least other then them selues might get them with childe, although they were sickely, feeble brayned, and extreme olde. As if it were not first of all, and chiefly a discommoditie to the fathers and mothers, and likewise to those that bring them vp, to haue vnperfect and feeble children borne, as it were begotten of drie and withered men: and then to the contrarie, what pleasure and benefit is it to those that haue fayer and good children, borne,

A borne, as gotten of like seede and men. These things were done then by naturall and ciuill reason, neuertheles they saue women were so farr of then from intreatie, as euer they were before: so as in olde time, in SPARTA, men knew not what adulterie ment. For prooue where- of, the aunswer made by Geradas (one of the first auncient SPARTANS) vnto a stranger, maye be alleaged: that asked him, what punishment they had for adulterers. My friend, g he, there be none here. But if there were? replied the stranger againe. Marye sayed he, then he must paye as great a bull, as standing vpon the toppes of the mountaine Taygetus, maye drinke in the riuier of Eurotas. Yea marye: but howe is it possible (g the stranger) to finde such a bull? Geradas laughing, aunswered him againe. And howe were it possible also to finde an adulterin SPARTA? And this is that which is found of Lycurgus lawes touching mariages. Furthermore, after the birthe of euery boye, the father was no more master of him, to cocker and bring him vp after his will: but he him selfe caried him to a certaine place called Lesche, where the eldest men of his kind being set, did viewe the childe. And if they founde him fayer, and well proportioned of all his limmes, and stronge: they gaue order he should be brought vp, and appointed him one of the nine thousand partes of inheritance for his education. Contrariwise, if they founde him deformed, mishapen, or leane, or pale, they sent him to be throwen in a deepe pyrt of water, which they commonly called Apothetes, and as a man would saue, the common house of office: holding opinion it was neither good for the childe, nor yet for the common weale, that it should liue, considering from his birthe he was not well made, nor geuen to be stronge, healthfull, nor lustie of bodie all his life longe. For this cause therefore, the nurse after their birthe did not washe them with water simply (as they doe euery where at that time) but with water mingled with wine: and thereby did they prooue, whether the complexion or temperature of their bodies were good or ill. For they suppose, that children which are geuen to haue the falling sicknes, or otherwise to be full of reumes & sicknesses, cannot abide washing with wine, but rather drye and pyne awaye: as contrariwise the other which are healthfull, become thereby the stronger and the lustier. The nurses also of SPARTA vse a certaine manner to bring vp their children, without swadling, or binding them vp in clothes with swadling bandes, or hauing on their heades any crosse clothes: so as they made them nimble of their limmes, better shaped and goodlier of bodie. Besides that, they acquainted their children to all kinde of meates, and brought them vp without muche tendance, so as they were neither fine nor licorous, nor fearefull to be leste alone in the darcke, neither were they criers, wrallers, or vnhappy children, which be all tokens of base and cowardly natures. So that there were strangers, that of purpose bought nurces out of LACONIA, to bring vp their children: as they saue Amycla was one of them, which nurced Alcibiades. But Pericles his tutor, gaue him afterwarde a bonde man called Zopyrus, to be his master and gouernour: who had no better propertie in him, then other common slaues. This did not Lycurgus. For he did not put the education and gouernment of the children of SPARTA, into the handes of hyered masters or slaues bought with money: neither was it lawfull for the father him selfe to bring vp his owne childe after his owne manner and liking. For so soone as they came to feuen yeres of age, he tooke and diuided them by companies, to make them to be brought vp together, and to accustom them to playe, to learne, and to studie one with another. Then he chose out of euery company one, whom he thought to haue the best wit, and had most courage in him to fight: to whom he gaue the charge and ouersight of his owne companie. The reste had their eyes waiting allwayes on him, they did obey his commaundementes willingly, they did abide patiently all corrections he gaue them, they did suche tasks and workes as he appointed them: so that all their studie was most to learne to obey. Furthermore, the olde graye headed men were present many times to see them playe, and for the most parte they gaue them occasions to fall out, and to fight one with another, that they might thereby the better knowe and discern the naturall disposition of euery one of them, and whether they gaue any signes or F tokens in time to come, to become cowardes or valliant men. Touching learning, they had as muche as serued their turne: for the reste of their time they spent in learning howe to obey, to awaye with payne, to indure labour, to ouercome still in fight. groweth and yeres, they dyd change the exercisies of their bodies: they dyd shauie their heads, they went barelegged, they were constrained to playe naked together the most parte of their time. After they were past twelue yeres of age, they were no longer coates: and they gaue them yerely but one seely gowne. This was the cause they were alwayes so nasty & flurty, & they neuer vsed to bathe or nuynt them selues, sauing only at certaine dayes in the yere, when they were suffered to tast of this refreshing. They laye and slept together vpon beddes of straw, which they them selues dyd make, of the toppes of reedes or canes that grewe in the riuier of Eurotas: which they were forced to goe gather and breake them selues with their handes, without any toole or iron at all. In the winter, they dyd mingle thistle downe with these, which is called Lycophonas, because that stuffe seemeth somewhat warme of it selfe. About this time, the fauourers and likers of this prety youthe, which were commonly the lustiest and best disposed youthe of the cittie, beganne to be offer in their companie: and then the olde men tooke the better regarde vnto them, and frequented more commonly the places of their daylie exercisies, & where their vse was to fight together, helping them when they played, how one should moeke another. This dyd their olde men, not by waye of pastime only, but with such care and harty loue towards them, as if they had bene altogether their fathers, masters, & gouernours, while they were boyes: in so much as there was neuer time nor place, where they had not allwayes some to admonishe, reprove, or correct them, if they dyd a faulte. Notwithstanding all this, there was euer one of the honestest men of the cittie, who had exprefly the charge and gouernance of these boyes. He dyd diuide them in companies, and afterwards gaue the ouersight of them, to suche a one of the boyes as was discreetest, the manliest, the most hardie, and of the best coragamongest them. They called the children that were past infancie two yeres, Irenes: and the greatest boyes Melirenes: as who would saye, ready to goe out of boyerie. This boye who was made ouerser of them, was commonly twenty yeres of age. He was their capitaine when they fought, and did commaunde them as his seruants when they were in the house: and willed them which were strongest, and the most growen, to carie wodde when they should prepare dinner or supper, and those which were least and weakest, to goe gather erbes, which they must steale or lacke them. So they went out to steale some in gardens, some at the markets, other in the halles where the feastes were kept, and men did eate together, in to the which they conueyed them selues as closely and cunningly as they could deuise: for if they were taken with the manner, they were scourged terrible, because they were so grosse and negligent, and not fine and cunning in their facultie. They stole also all other kinde of meate, whatsoeuer they could get or laye hands on. They pried and fought all occasions howe to take and steale meate handfomely, bothe when men were a sleepe, or els that they were careless, or did not geue good hede vnto them. But he that was taken with the manner, had his payment roundly, and was punished with fasting besides: for they had but a slender pittaunce, because necessity should driue them to venter boldly, and wit should finde out all the deuises to steale finely. This was the chiefe cause, why they gaue them so small a diet. The seconde cause was, that their bodies might growe vp higher in height. For the vitall spirities not being occupied to concoct and digest much meate, nor yet kept downe, or spread abroad by the quantitie or ouerburden thereof, doe enlarge them selues into lengthe, and shoote vp for their lightnes: and for this reason they thought the bodie did growe in height and lengthe, hauing nothing to let, or hinder the rising of the fame. It seemeth, that the same selfe cause made them fayerer also. For the bodies that are leane and slender, doe better and more easily yeld to nature, which bringeth a better proportion and forme to euery member: and contrariwise it seemeth theye grosse, corpulent, and ouersedde bodies doe encounter nature, and be not so nimble and pliant to her, by reason of their heauy substance. As we see it by experience, the children which women bring a litle before their time, and be somewhat cast before they should haue bene borne, be smaller and fayerer also, and more pure commonly then other that goe their time: because the matter whereof the bodie is formed, being more supple and pliant, is the easelier welded by nature, which geueth them their shape and forme. Touching the natural cause of this effect, let vs geue place to other to dispute it that will, without our further deciding of the same. But to returne to the matter of the Lacedæmonians children.

- A They dyd robbe with so great care, and feare to be discouered: that they tell of one, which hauing stolen a litle foxe, dyd hyde him vnder his cloke, and suffered him with his teethe and claws to teare out all his bellie, and neuer cryed, for feare he should haue bene betrayed, vntill he fell downe dead in the place where he stode. This is not vncredible, by that we see younge boyes doe abide at this daye: for we haue feene diuers, which haue bidden whipping euen to death, vpon the altar of Diana, surnamed Orthia. Nowe this vnder matter, who had the charge of euery companie of these boyes, vsed after supper (sitting yet at the table) to byd one of them singe a songe: to another he put forth a question, who was to be well aduised of his answer, as for example: Who is the honestest man in the cittie: or howe thinkest thou by that such a one dyd? By this exercise they were enured from boyes state, to iudge of things well or ill done, and to vnderstand the life and gouernment of their citizens. For which of them dyd not answer quickly and directly to these questions, who is a good man, who is an honest citizen, and who not: they thought it was a signe of a dulle wit, and careless nature, not geuen to any vertue, for desire of honour and estimation. Furthermore this vnder matter was euer to waite for his answer, and to see it should be brief and well knyt vp in wordes: otherwise his punishment that answered crossly, or to litle purpose, was that his master byt him by the thumbe. This he dyd many times in the presence of the olde men and magistrates of the cittie, that they might see whether he punished them with reason or not, and according to their deservung. And though he dyd hurte him, they dyd not by and by reprove him, but when the children were gone awaye, then was he him selfe rebuked and punished, if he had corrected them to fore, or contrarily he had fauored them too much. Moreover they dyd ascribe the good or ill opinion conceaued of the children, vnto euery of their fauourers, and louers, which dyd affect and entaine them: in as much as they saye, a younge boye vpon a time fighting with another, and a crye scaping out of his mouth, which his fauourer cowardly harte dyd yelde, his fauourer & louer was straight condemned by the officers of the cittie to a fine. Albeit this loue was a thing euen incorporated into them, that the most honest and vertuousest women loued the younge maydes thus also: yet was there no ialousie nor suspition that grewe hereof, but rather to the contrarie, there grewe a maruelous mutuall loue and kyndnes betweene them, which loued in one selfe place. For either of them by all the meanes they could, dyd deuise howe to make the childe they loued in common, the wisest, the gentlest, and the best conditioned aboue all other. They taught these children to speake in suche sorte, that their speache had euer in it a pleasaunt grace, and in fewe wordes comprehended much matter. For Lycurgus ordained, a great masse and weight of iron money, should be but litle worthe, and of a small value, as we haue tolde you before: and contrarily, that speache in fewe wordes, without any affectation, should holde much deepe and graue matter, wherewith the children being acquainted, after long silence, should be brief and pittie in their answers. For as the feede of incontinent men which are to busie with euery ragge and colman hedge, can take no roote to bringe forth fruite: euen so immoderate speache, full of wordes and busie tattle, bringeth forth as litle sensie. Hereof it cometh, that the answers of the Lacedæmonians were so shorte & witty. As they saye, king Agis answered on a daye an Athenian, who iesting at the swords
- E The Lacedæmonians dyd were, sayed they were so shorte, that these tumbler, and jugglers dyd swallowe them downe in the fight of all the world: and yet sayed Agis, we hurte our enemies with them for all that. For mine owne opinion, I like well of the Lacedæmonians manner of speaking: which is not to speake much, but when they speake, to touch the matter effectually, and to make the hearers vnderstand them. I thincke also, that Lycurgus selfe, was shorte and quicke in his talke. For so a man maye coniecture by his answers which are written: as that which he made to one who earnestly prayed him to stablish a popular state in Lacedæmonia, that the basest might haue as great authoritie as the highest. Begynne (q he) to doe it first in thine owne house. And as that also which he answered another who asked him, why he had appointed so small things, and so litle of value to be offered to the goddes? Because (q he) we should neuer cease to honour them. And as that which he spake another time, touching fights and frays, which was: that he dyd neuer forbid his citizens any of them, but those wherein they vse to geue their hande, as you would saye to yeld. Men finde also suche like aunfvers, in some of his letters written to his citizens, as when they asked him. Howe can we defende our selues against our enemies? He aunswered: If ye be poore, and one doe couerno more then another. And in another letter that was sent, where he discoufeth, whether it were requisite to inclose the citie with walles: he sayeth, can that citie be without walles, which is enuironned with men, though it be vncompaffed with stone? Neuertheles it is harde to resolve, whether those letters, and other fuche like that are shewed, be to be beleueed, or discredited to be his. But that long fpeache was much disliked, and reproued among the LACEDÆMONIANS, it is manifestly to be feene by the words, which fomme amongst them haue heretofore aunfwered. As king Leonidas sayd one day, to one that discoufied with him many good things, but out of fealon: friend, thou speakeft many good wordes, but to litle purpose. And Charilaus, nephew to Lycurgus, being asked why his vncl made fo fewe lawes: bicaufe sayd he, to men of fewe wordes, fewe lawes will ferue. And Archidamidas sayd thus to fomme, which reproued Hecateus the Orator, for that being bidden to fupper at one of their feasts he fpa ke not a worde al fupper time. He how can fpeake well, knoweth alfo when to fpeake. And where I haue tolde before, that in their feate and quicke aunfvers, commonly there was fome prety grace, it may be well feene and known by thefe that followe. Demaratus aunfwered a bulie fellowe who troubled him to much with vaine importunate queftions, asking him ftill: who was the honefteft man of LACEDÆMON? euen he that is leaft like thy felfe. And Agis sayd to fomme which highly prayed the ELIANS for their vpright iudgement, & iuft dealing in the games Olympicall. What wonder make ye of it (q he) if in five yerres paffe the ELIANS one daye doe good iuftice? And Theopompus likewise to a ftraunger, who as defirous to thew his affection he bare the LACEDÆMONIANS, told him how euery bodye called him Philolacon (as to faye) a louer of LACEDÆMON. It were more honeftie for thee (fayd he) to be named Philopolites, a louer of her citizens. And Pliftonax the fonne of Paufanias, when an Orator of ATHENS layd the LACEDÆMONIANS were vnlearned, and ignorant: thou fayest true q he, for we only of all the GRECIANS haue learned none of your ill conditions. And Archidamidas, to one that daunted of him, what number of fighting men there might be of the SPARTANS: Enowe fayd he, to driue awaye the wicked. We maye coniecture alfo their manner of fpeaking, by their wordes in mirth, which they fpa ke sometimes playing wife: for they dyd neuer vfe to fpeake vaine wordes at randome, but it had alwayes fome fecret meaning in it, which required anothers good obferuation that would finde it. As he which was defired to goe heare the nightingall counterfeited naturally: I haue (fayd he) heard the nightingall it felfe. And another which hauing redde this infcription vpon a tumbie.

VWhen as they had, vrell quenched tyrannie throughout their lande, by vvorthise vvarlike pouuer, Their happe was yet in vretched vviſe to dye, by fealing Selynnates ftrongeſt ouer.

They well defered death, sayd he, that dyd but quenche tyrannie: they should haue quire confumed it with fire. And one younger boye to another, promiſing to geue him fuche hardie cockes of the game, as shoul dye in the place where they fought. O geue me not thofe (fayd he) which will dye, but thofe which with fighting will kill others. Another feeing men fitting in coches and litters as they went: god forbid (fayd he) that I should euer fit in a chayer, where I could not rife to my elders. Suche were their aunfvers & encounters. So that fomme had reafon which sayd heretofore, to fpeake LACONTIAN like, was to be philofopher like: as you would faye, more to exerciſe the minde, then the bodye. Befides all this, they dyd ftudie to finge well, and to make goodly ditties and fonges. Then they fpa ke moſt properly and fearely. There was in their fongs alfo a certaine motion, I wote not what, which ftirred vp the hearers hartes, and dyd kinde defire in them to doe notable feates. Their tongue was plaine, without affectation: their matter graue and morall, conteining for the moſt parte the prayfe of thofe, which were flayne in battell for the defence of their countrie, as being happy men: & a shame to thofe that liue, which for faine hartes refuſed fo to dye, to leade a miſerable and vnfortunate life. Or els they fange howe they were the pattenes for time to come, or the right glorie of the worlde, and the true representation of vertuous men: as the fonge would beſt become their

A their ages which dyd finge. It ſhall not be impartiſent for the better vnderſtanding hereof, to bring you here an exāple. For in their open feasts, there were alwayes three daūces, according to the difference of the three ages. The daunce of the olde men, thus beganne firſt for to finge.

VVe haue bene young and ſtrong yea valliant heretofore, till crooked age did holde vs backe, and bad vs doe no more.

The young men followed after, finging:

VVe yet are young, bolde, ſtrong, and ready to maintaine that quarell ſtill, againſt all men that doe on earth remaine.

The third was of children that came after and fayd:

And vve doe hope aſ vrell, to paſſe you all at laſt, and that the worlde ſhall wittnes be ere many yerres be paſt.

B To conclude, who nerely will confider the wordes and makings of the LACON poets (whereof ſome are yet extant) and will marke alfo the notes and tunes of the pipe, after the found and meature whereof they marched in arraye, going to charge the enemy: he ſhall finde, that Terpander, and Pindarus, had reafon to ioyne hardynes with muſicke. For Terpander ſpeaking of the LACEDÆMONIANS, ſayeth in a place:

This is that lande vvhich deedes of cheualtrie, did florish moſt, in many a martiall ſeate:

VVhere muſicke made, her choiſe of harmonie, and iuſtice kept her ſtately royall ſeate.

C And Pindarus ſpeaking of them alfo ſayeth:

There: graue aduife is founde in aged braynes: there: gallant youthes, are luſty lads in dede.

VVhich can both ſinge, and daunce, in courtlike traires: yet dant their foes, vvvith many a doughty dede.

By which teſtimonies it appeareth, the one and the other made, and deſcribeth them to haue loued muſicke, and the warres together. For as another LACON poet ſayeth,

It ſitteth vvell, and is a ſemelie thinge, for ſuch as ſpend their time in ſeats of vvarre: To haue the ſkyl, ſvverete ſuncts for to ſinge, and touche the harpe vvvithouten iangling iarre.

D For this cauſe therefore in all their warres, when they ſhould geue battell, the King dyd firſt ſacrifice to the Muſes, to put his ſouldiers in minde (as it ſhould ſeeme) of the diſcipline & wildome of the Muſes that they had bene brought vp in, to the end that when his ſouldiers were in the moſt extreme daunger, the Muſes ſhould preſent them ſelues before the ſouldiers eyes, to prick them forward to doe ſome noble actes of worthy memotie. In their time of warre, they dyd tollerate their young men a litle of their hard & old accuſtomed life, & ſuffered them then to trime their hearres, to haue braue armour, to weare gay apparell, & tooke as great delight therein, to ſee them gallant, & luſtie, as to behold young neyng & ſnorthing horſe, deſirous for to fight. And although from the beginning of their youth, they dyd vſe to weare longe E heares: yet were they neuer ſo carefull to combe & bruiſe their hearres, as when they ſhould to the battell. For when they dyd nointe them ſelues with ſweete oyles, & dyd ſhed their heare, remembering Lycurgus ſaying: who was wont to tell them, that hearres to them which were fayer, dyd make them more fayer, & to them that were fowle, they made them more ougly & dredfull. The exerciſes alfo of their bodies, were more eaſie & gentle, & not ſo hard & ſtraight in their warres, as they were in a peace: & generally, their whole manner of life was not then ſo ſtraightly vviwed, nor yet controlled: So as they only were the men of the worlde, to whom warres were made a reſt from labour, which men ordinarylie doe endure: to make them the fitter for the warres. Afterwardes when their armie was ſet in battell raye, euen in the face of the enemy, the King dyd ſtraight ſacrifice a goat vnto the goddes, & forthwith commaunded F all his ſouldiers to put their garlands of flowers on their heads, & willed that the pipes ſhould ſound the ſonge of Caſtor: at the noyle & tune whereof, he him ſelfe beganne firſt to marche forward. So that it was a maruelous pleasure, & likewise a dreadfull sight, to see the whole battell marche together in order, at the found of the pipes, and neuer to breake their pace, nor confounde their ranckes, nor to be dismayed nor amazed themselves, but to goe on quietly & ioyfully at the founde of these pipes, to hazard themselves euen to death. For it is likely, that such corages are not troubled with much feare, nor yet overcome with much furie: but rather they haue an assured conitance & valliantnes in good hope, as those which are backed with the assisting fauour of the goddes. The King marching in this order, had allwayes some about him, which had before time wonne the prizes in games and iustes. And they saye there was one of these on a time, that was offered a great some of money at the games Olympically, not to present him selfe at them: but he refused it, liking better with great payne to winne the prise, then for much money to lose his honour. Whereupon one sayed vnto him, LACONIAN: & what hast thou gotten nowe, to carie away the prise with so much sweate? The LACONIAN answered him laughing: I shall fight in the battell, sayeth he, before the King. When they had once broken into their enemies, they dyd still fiercely and fiercelier set vpon them, and dyd neuer cease, vntill their enemies gaue waye and fled: and then they chased and followed them still, vntill such time as their ouerthrowe and flight had assured them of the victorie. Then they quickly and quietly returned to their campe, iudging it to be no manhod, neither the parte of a noble minde, or of so wor hye a nation as the GRECIANS were, to kill and hewe in peeces, men so cattered and out of order, hauing forsaken all the hope of victorie. This fell out not only honorable, but also very profitable for them. For they which were in battell against them, knowing they killed none but suche as resisted stowtely, and howe they dyd let other goe which fled before them: they found it was more their benefite to flye, then to tarie and abide the strokes. Hippias the sophister sayeth, that Lycurgus himselfe was a very good captaine, & a great souldier, as he that had bene in many foughten fieldes: & Phalostephanus ascribeth to him the deuite to put horsemen in troupees & companies, which they called Oulames, whereof fitt men at armes was a troupe, whose manner was to put them selues in squadrōs. But Demetrius the Phalerian writeth otherwise, that Lycurgus was neuer at the warres, & that he made all his lawes and gouernment in a full peace. But in my opinion, the intermission of warres during the playes Olympically, which they saye he deuised, doeth shew in appaurance that he was a gentle natured man, & one that loued quietnes and peace. Some notwithstanding (amongest whom Hermippus was one) saye, he was not with Iphitus at the first beginning when he ordeined the playes Olympically, but that by chance he happened to come thither, passing by in his iorney only, & that he stayed there to see the games: where he thought he heard the voyce of a man behinde him, saying, he maruelled much why he dyd not persuade his cittizens also to be parteners of this newe deuise: and turning backe to see who it was that spake to him, he sawe no bodye. Whereupon he tooke a conceit that it was a speache from the goddes: & went therefore presently to seeke out Iphitus, with whom he made all the statutes and orders of the feast, which afterwards were farre more famous, better ordered, & more statly then before. But to returne againe to the LACEDÆMONIANS: their discipline & order of life continued still, after they were full grown men. For it was not lawfull for any man to lue as he listed, but they were within their citie, as if they had bene in a campe, where euery man knoweth what allowance he hath to lue withall, & what busines he hath els to doe in his calling. To be shorte, they were all of this minde, that they were not borne to serue them selues, but to serue their countrie. Therefore if they were commaunded nothing els, they went continually to fee what the children dyd, and to teache them somewhat which might profit the common weale, or els they went to learne of those which were their elders. For one of the best and happiest things which Lycurgus euer brought into his citie, was the great rest and leysure which he made his cittizens to haue, only forbidding them that they should not prolesse any vile or base occupation: and they needed not also to be carefull to get great riches, in a place where goodes were nothing profitable nor esteemed. For the Ilotes, which were made bonde men by the warres, dyd till their groundes, and yielded them a certaine reuenue euery yere. And as touching this matter, they tell of a LACEDÆMONIAN, who being on a daye at ATHENS where the lawe was pleaded, dyd vnderstand that a citizen there was condemned for Idleness, and howe he went home

A to his house very sorrowfully, accompanied with his friends which were forie for him, & greedily lamented his ill happe. The LACEDÆMONIAN then prayed those which were about him, to shewe him the man condemned for liuing nobly, and like a gentleman. I haue alledged this, to shew how he thought it a vile & seruill thing to exercise any handy craft, or to worke any thing by hand to get money. For futes in lawe, a man maye be well assured that they were banished with the golde & siluer from LACEDÆMON, considering now there was no more auarice nor couetousnes there, nor yet pouertie nor lacke, but equalitie with aboundsance, & quiet life with fortuitie. All other times but when they had warres, they followed daunting, feastes, playes, banquetts, hunting, or other exercises of bodye, & meetings to passe the time away. For the younge men vntill they came to thirtie yeres of age, neuer went into the market to buye any prouision B or things for the house, but dyd their fathers or their friends busines: naye it was a shame for the oldest men, to hawnte the market to often. As to the contrary, it was honorable for them to be present at the shewe place the most parte of the daye, where they diuersely exercised their bodies, & likewise to be at the places of assembly, there to spend time with talking together, & discouraging honestly one with another, without talking of any matter of gaine, traffike, or money. For all their talke (for the most parte) was about the praying of some honest thing, or sportingwise to reprove some dishonestie, which alwayes caried with it some gentle lesson or monition by the waye. For Lycurgus was not such a fower man, as they neuer sawe him laugh: but as Sophistus writeth, it was he that first sacrificed to the litle god of laughter, which is at LACEDÆMON, because he would mingle their feastes and assemblies with mirth, as a pleasant C sawce to ease the trouble of their strickt and harde life. To be briefe, he did accustom his cittizens so, that they neither would nor could liue alone, but were in manner as men incorporated one with another, and were allwayes in company together, as the bees be about their master bee: still in a continuall loue to serue their countrie, to winne honour, & to aduaunce the common weale. Which affection of theirs is playne & easely seene to be imprinted in them by certain of their answers, as in that which Pedareus sayed on a time, being left out of the election of the number of the three hundred. Who departing home to his house mery and iocund as might be, sayed: It did him good to see there were three hundred founde better in the citie than him selfe. Pisistratidas also being sent ambassadour with certain other to the lieutenants of the king of PERSIA, the PERSIAN lordes asked him, if they came of their owne desire, or D whether they were sent from the whole state: if we obtaine, sayed he, it is from the state: if we be denied, then we come of our selues. And Argileonida the mother of Brasidas, asked some that went to visite her after they were returned home to LACEDÆMON from their iorney to AMPHIPOLIS, if her sonne died like a man, and a worthy SPARTAN. And they straight did commend him highly, saying: there was not left in all LACEDÆMON suche a valliant man. She replied vnto them. Saye not so, my friends. I praye you: for Brasidas was in dede a valliant man, but the country of LACONIA hath many moe yet valliantier than he was. Now touching their Senate: Lycurgus was the first that erected it among them. The first that were thereof, were Lycurgus chief ayders & assisters of that erection, as we haue declared before: but afterwards he ordeined, that when any of those first should happen to dye, they should choose in his E place the most honest reported man in the citie, so he were three score yere olde and aboue. This was the noblest glorie that could be among men, when a man bare the bell and prise, not that he was swiftest among the swift, nor strongest amongest the strong, but that he among the honest was honestest. He had the reward of his vertue, as for libertie to speake, foureraine authoritie to gouerne, and princely power ouer the common weale, the honour, the life, and the goodes of the whole cittizens: howbeit the election was made after this sorte. The people first assembled in the market place, where there were some appointed and shut vp thereabout in a house, from where they could neither see, nor be seene of those that were assembled, but onely they might heare the noyse which they made there. For the people by their crye and shoute, did declare whom they did choofe, and whom they did refuse of the competitorrs, as they vsed F to shewe their liking by the like crye in other things. The competitorrs were not brought in, and presented all together, but one after another in order, as by lot did fall out. He on whom the lot fell, passed through the midst of the assemblee of the people, and sayed neuer a worde.

ple after, that they would keepe his lawes and ordinance without chaunging or altering any thing, vntill he did retorne againe. This done, he went to the citie of DELPHES, where so lone as he arriued, he sacrificed in the temple to Apollo, and asked him: If the lawes he had made were good to make a man a happy life. Apollo made him answer, his lawes were very good; and that his citiekeeping them, should be the most renowned of the worlde. Lycurgus caused this oracle to be written, which he sent to SPARTA. After he sacrificed to Apollo againe: and then taking leaue of his friendes, and of his sonne, he determined to dye, because his citizezns should neuer be releafed of the othe they had made betwene his handes. When he had this determination, he was come to the age, wherein a man hath strength enough to liue longer: and yet was olde enough also to dye if he would. Wherefore finding him selfe happy to haue obtained his desire, he willingly pynd him selfe to death, by abstinence, and lacke of meate. For he thought it meete, that the very death of great personages should bring benefit euer to the common weale, and that the end of their life should be no more idle, or vnprofitable, then the rest of their life before: nay rather, that it was one of their most meritorious actes, to haue their death extolled for worthines. So he imagined, that his death would be the perfection and crowne of his felicitie, after he had made and ordeined so many good and notable lawes, for the honour and benefit of his countrie: and should be as a seale of confirmation of his lawes, and the continuall preferitour of his citie, considering all his citizezns had sworne to keepe them all inuiolably, vntill he were returned. He was not deceaued of his hope, for his citie was the chiefe of the worlde, in glorie and honour of gouernment, by the space of fife hundred yeres. For so long his citie kept his lawes without any chaunge or alteration by any of the Kings successours, vntill king Agis, the sonne of Archidamus beganne to reigne. For the creation of the Ephores, did not breake, nor discontinue any of the lawes of Lycurgus, but reduced them rather to a more straight and strickt order: although it seemed at the first that the Ephores were ordeined, for the maintenance & defence of the libertie of the people, whereas in deede they did also strengthen the authoritie of the Kings and Senate. Nowe in the raigne of king Agis, gold and siluer beganne first to creepe in againe to the citie of SPARTA, by means of Lyfander. With money there came in straight couetousnes, and greedines to get and gather. And although Lyfander was not desirous to get it, nor would be corrupted for any money: yet he brought riches and couetousnes into the countrie, and filled the same with all finenes, by bringing in great store of golde and siluer from the warres, directly against the lawes and ordinance of Lycurgus. The which so long as they were in force and vse, it appered that the gouernment of SPARTA seemed not to be a pollicy or common weale, but rather a certaine holy place & order of religion. And euen as the Poets sayne, that Hercules went through the world with his clubbe, and Lyons skynne, punishing cruell robbers and vnnaturall tyrannes: so in like case with a litle crowe of parchment, and a poore cape, did the SPARTANS commaund and geue lawes, to all the rest of GRECE, euen with their good liking and consent. And they chafed the tyrannes away, which vsurped tyrannicall power ouer any of their cities, and did decide all controuersies, and oftentimes pacified their seditions, without sending out one souldier, but only a simple poore ambassadour. At whose commaundement, the people presently assembled like the bees, which gather together about their King, so soone as they spye him: they did then so greatly reuerence the good gouernment & iustice of the SPARTANS. Therefore I can but wonder much at those which saye, the citie of LACEDEMON could obey well, but not commaunde: and for prooffe they alleage wordes of king Theopompus, who answered one which sayd, that SPARTA was maintained, because the Kings could commaund well. Naye the rather (sayd he) because the citizezns can obey well. For men commonly disdaine to obey those, which are not wise in commaunding. So that the faithfull obedience of the subiectes, dependeth much vpon the sufficient commaundement of the wise prince. For he that directeth well, must needs be well obeyed. For like as the arte of a good rider, is to make his horse gentle, and ready at commaundement: euen so the chiefe point belonging to a prince, is to teach his subiects to obey. Wherefore the LACEDEMONIANS procured, that not only F other people did willingly obey them, but also desired to be ruled, and commaunded by them. For they asked them, neither shippes nor money, nor yet did send them any number of men of

A of warre to compell them, but only they sent one citize of SPARTA to gouerne them, to whom all the other people submitted them selues, and were holpen by him in their necessitie, as fearing and reuerencing him. In this wise the SICILIANS were holpen by Gysippus, the CHALCIDIANS by Bradus, and all the GRECIANS inhabiting ASIA, by Lyfander, Callistratus, and by Agessilaus, who were called the reformers and directers of princes, peoples, and Kings, vnto whom they were sent here and there: but euer they had their eye vpon the citie of SPARTA, as vpon the most perfect patterne to order mans life by, and to gouerne a common weale after. To this effect tended the mery wordes spoken in iest by Stratonice: Who said he did order the ATHENIANS to tend their sacrifices, and the EOLIANS to tend their games: and if they made any fault therein, the LACEDEMONIANS should be well whipped. That B was merely spoken, and in a iesting manner. But Antisthenes (the philosopher and one of Socrates scholes) seeing the THEBANS growen very hauie & glorious, after that they had conquered the LACEDEMONIANS in the iorney of LEVCTRES: me thinketh sayed he, these THEBANS here doe like the schoole boyes, which bragge and reioyce when they haue a litle beaten their master. But this was not Lycurgus meaning, to haue his citie to commaunde many. But he thought the felicitie of a citie, as of a priuate man, consisted chiefly in the exercise of vertue, and in the vnitie of the inhabitants thereof. He framed his common weale to this end, that his citizezns should be nobly minded, content with their owne, and temperate in their doings, that thereby they might mainteine and keepe them selues long in safetie. The selfe same intention had Plato, Diogenes, and Zenon, in setting forth their bookes, which they wrote C of the gouernment of common weales: and so had likewise many other great and learned men which haue written of the same matter. Howbeit they only left behinde them, wordes, and written bookes: but Lycurgus contrariwise, left no written bookes nor pamphlets, but stablished and left behinde him, a royall forme of gouernment, which no man euer before had inuented, nor neuer after could be followed. He hath made them plainly see, a whole citie liue together, and gouerne it selfe philosophically, according to the true rules and preceptes of perfect wisdom: which imagined, that true wisdom was a thing hanging in the ayre, and could not visiblie be seene in the worlde. Whereby he hath worthily excelled in glorie all those, which euer tooke vpon them to write or stablish the gouernment of a common weale. And therefore sayeth Aristotle, that after his death they did him lesse honour in LACEDEMONIA, D then he had deserued: albeit they did him all the honour they possibly could deuise. And yet they buylt a temple for him, and made solemne sacrifice to him euery yere, as vnto a god. More, they saye, that when the ashes of his bodie were brought to SPARTA, there fell straight lightning vpon his tumbere where they were put: which they had not often seene to happen, to other men of name after their decease, sauing only to the poet Euripides, who dying in MACEDONIA, was buried neere the citie of ARETHUSA. The which is some manifest argument, for suche as loue the Poet, to laye against those which somewhat depraue him, seeing this signe came to him after his death, which had happened before to a most well beloued man of the goddes. Some saye Lycurgus died in the citie of CIRRA. But Apolothemis sayeth, he died in ELIDA. Timon and Aristoxenus writte, he ended his dayes in CRETA. And Aristoxenus E sayeth further, that those of the Ile of CRETA doe shewe his graue in the place, which they call Pergamia, by the broad high wayes side. He left one only begotten sonne named Antisthenes, who died without issue, so that his house and name sayled with him. But his neere kinsmen and famillier friendes, did set vp a company or brotherhood in memorie of him, which continued a long time: and the dayes wherein they assembled, were called the Lyurgides. There is another Aristocrates (the sonne of Hipparchus) who sayeth, that he being dead in CRETA, his friendes burned his bodie, and afterwards threwe his ashes into the sea, according as he had prayed and requested them. For he feared, that if any parte of him should at any time haue bene brought to SPARTA, the inhabitants would haue sayed he was returned againe, and thereby would haue thought them selues discharged of their othe, and might haue F lawfully altered the lawes which he had appointed. And this is the discourse and ende of Lycurgus life.

Lib. 2.

THE Historiographers differ maruelously of the time, in which Numa Pompilius reigned King, albeit some will deriue from him many noble houfes descended in Rome. For one Clodius, who wrote the booke intituled the table of time, affirmeth that the auncient registers of the citie of Rome were lost when it was taken and sacked by the Gayles: and that those which are extant at this day be not true, but were only made by men desirous to gratifie some, which haue thrust in auncient houfes and families of the first Romaines, that concerne nothing them whom they ment to represent. On the other side, although the common opinion be, that Numa was a familer friend and scholler of Pythagoras the philosopher, yet some saye he was neuer learned, nor had any knowledge at all in the Greeke tongue. B And yet mainteining that it is possible enough, that he was fowell borne, and had such perfection in all kind of vertue, that he neuer needed any master: & though he had needed, they had rather attribute the honour of the instructing of this King vnto some other foreane person, that was more excellent then Pythagoras. Other saye, that Pythagoras the philosopher was long time after the raigne of Numa, & well mighte five ages after him. Howbeit other saye, there was another Pythagoras borne in Sparta (who hauing wonne the pryfe of running at the games Olympicall in the sixteenth Olympiade, & the third yere of Numaes raigne) did come into Italye, where he kept much about Numa, & did assist & helpe him in the gouerning & ordering of his Realme. By meanes whereof there be many customes yet of the Laconianians, mingled with the Romaines, which this second Pythagoras was sayed to haue taught him. C Neuertheles it is not confessed that Numa was borne of the *Sabyne*s, which they saye are descended from the Lacedemonians. So it falleth out very hard to agree certainly of the time when Numa was, and chiefly for suche as will followe the rolle or table of those, which from Olympiades to Olympiades haue wonne the pryfes of games Olympicall: considering the rolle or table that they haue at this present, was very lately published by one Hippias an Elian, who deliuereth no reason or argument of necessitie, why it should be taken for an vndoubted trothe, which he in that sorte hath gathered. Yet we will not leaue to put in writing those things wor-

At this of memorie, which we could gather by any meanes of king Numa, beginning at that place which we thought to be meetest. It was nowe sithence Rome was buylt, seuen and thirtie yeres (for so long time reigned Romulus) when Romulus the fift of the moneth of Iuly (which they call the Nones of the goates) made a solemne sacrifice without the citie, neere to a certaine place commonly called, the goate marthe. As all the whole Senate, with the most parte of the people were present at this sacrifice, sodainly there rose in the ayer a very great tempest, and a maruelous darcke thicke clowde, which fell on the earth with such boylterous windes, stormes, lightnings, and thunder: that the poore common people being affrayed of so fore a tempest, disperfed them selues sodainly, running here and there for succour, and therewithall king Romulus vanished away in such forte, that he was neuer after seene aliuie nor dead. This brought the Senatours, and noble men whom they called Patricians, into great suspicion. And there ranne a fowle tale among the common people, howe they had a long time borne very impaciently to be subiects to a King, because them selues would haue had and taken vpon them some soueraine authoritie, and that for this cause they had killed king Romulus. Adding somewhat more vnto it, howe a litle before he had vied them more roughly, and commaunded them more straightly then he was wont or accustomed. Neuertheles they found the meanes to quenche all these bruits and murmurings, by doing diuine honour and sacrifice vnto him, as one not dead, but passed to a better life. To confirme this, one of the noblest men among them called Proculus came in, and by othe affirmed before all the people, that he sawe Romulus ascending vp into heauen, armed at all peces, and that he heard a voyce saye: C from thenceforth call him Quirinus. This being thus appeased, there sprang vp another trouble, to knowe whom they should choose in his place. For the strangers which were come then from other places to dwell in Rome, were not yet thoroughly ioyned to the naturall borne Romaines: in so muche, as the common people dyd not only wauer, and stagger vp and down in opinion, but the Senatours also (that were many & of diuers nations) did enter into a suspicion one of another. These things notwithstanding they all agreed in this, that of necessitie they must choose a King: howbeit in the rest they differed much, not only whom they should choose, but also of what nation he should be. For those which were the first founders and buylders of the citie of Rome with Romulus, could in no wise abide, nor suffer, that the *Sabyne*s (to whom they had diuided parte of their landes, and a mytie of their citie) should attempt D and presume to commaund them, whom they dyd receyue and associate into their company and felowshippe. The *Sabyne*s alledged on thother side for them, a good reason, and such as caried great probabilitie. Which was, that neuer sence the death of their king Tatius, they neither had in any thing disobeyed nor disquieted king Romulus, but had suffered him to raighe peaceably: and therefore Romulus being nowe deceased, reason would that the newe King should be chosen of their nation. And that albeit the Romaines had receyued them into their citie, they could not say therefore, that in time of this association, they were lesse to be reckoned of in any thing, than them selues. Further they added, that in ioyning with them, the Romaines had doubly increased their might and power, and had made a bodie of a people, which deserued the honour and title of a cime. These were the causes of their contention. E But to preuent that of this contention there might growe no confusion in the citie, if it should remaine without an head to commaund: the Senatours which were a hundred and fiftie in number, gaue counsell that euery one of them by turnes, one after another, should carie the royall state of the King, and all the shewes and ornaments of his maiestie, and should doe the ordinarie sacrifices of the King, and dispatche all causes fixe howers in the daye, and fixe howers in the night, as the King before had vied. Thus they thought it best to deuide the rule, that one might haue as much power as the other, as well in respect of them selues, as also for the sake of the people. For they imagined, that the chaunging and remouing thus of this regall dignitie, and passing it from man to man, would cleane take away enuie among them, and make euery of them to rule temperately, and vprightly see, that in one, and the selfe same daye F and night, euery of them should be a King and priuate persone also. The Romaines call this manner of regiment in vacation, Interregnum: as you would saye, rule for the time. Nowe albeit their gouernment was very modest and ciuill, yet they could not for all this

keepe them selues from falling into the suspition, and slander of the people: who gaue it out straight, that this was a fine deuise of theirs, to chaunge by this meanes the rule of the Realme into a few noble mens hands, to the ende that the whole authoritie and gouernment of all publicke causes, should remaine still in them selues, because it grieved them to be subiect to a King. And in the ende, the two partes of the cittie came to this agreement: that the one parte should choose one of the bodie of the other, to be the King. This course they liked very well, aswell for the pacification of present sturre and disention amongst them selues, as for procuring equalitie of affection, and furring vp a likenes of goodwill in the King that thus indifferently should be chosen: whereby he should loue the one parte for that they had chosen him, and likewise the other parte for that he was of their nation. The S A B Y N E S were the first, which referred the election to the R O M A I N E S choise: and the R O M A I N E S thought it better to chuse one of the nation of the S A B Y N E S, then to haue a R O M A I N E chosen by the S A B Y N E S. After they had consulted, they determined amongst them selues: and did choose Numa Pompilius one of the bodie of the S A B Y N E S to be King, who was none of the number of them which came to dwell at R O M E, howbeit he was a man so famous for his vertue, that the S A B Y N E S so soone as they named him, did receyue him more willingly, then they who had chosen him. After they had thus published their election, the first and chiefe perlones of the one & the other side, were chosen out to goe vnto him. Now Numa Pompilius was borne in one of the chiefe and best citties which the S A B Y N E S had, called Cures, whereupon the R O M A I N E S, and their fellowes the S A B Y N E S, were called afterwards Quirites, and he was the sonne of Pomponius a noble man, the youngest of foure brethern: being by the secret working of the goddess, borne on the very daye, on the which R O M E was first founded by Romulus, which was the one and twenty daye of Aprill. This man being naturally geuen and inclined vnto all vertue, did yet increase the same, by studie, and all kynde of good discipline: and by the exercise thereof, and of true pacience, and right philosophie, he did maruelously adorne him selfe and his manners. For he did not only clere his soule, and minde, of all passions and vices commonly vsed in the worlde: but he conquered in him selfe all heates, violence, & couetousnes. And would neither seeke nor vsurpe, that which was an other mans, a thing at that time honoured among the most barbarous people: but thought that to be the true, and right victorie in man, first to conquer and commaund him selfe by iudgement & reason, & then to subdue all couetousnes & greedines. Hauing therefore this opinion, he would in D no wife haue in his house any superfluitie or finenes. He became to euery man that would employe him (aswell stranger as his owne countrie man) a wife counsaillour, & an vpright iudge. He bestowed his leysure, not to followe his owne delight, or to gather goods together: but to serue the goddess, & to behold their celestiall nature and power, as much as mans reason & vnderstanding could comprehend. Thereby he got so great a name & reputation, that Tatius (which was king of R O M E with Romulus) hauing but one onely daughter called Tatia, made him his sonne in law. Howbeit this marriage put him in no such iolity, that he would dwell at R O M E with his father in lawe, but rather kept at home at his own house in the countie of the S A B Y N E S, there to serue & cherish his olde father with his wife Tatia: who for her parte also liked better, to liue quietly with her husband being a priuate man, then to goe to R O M E where he might haue liued in much honour and glorie, by meanes of the King her father. She died as it is reported, 13. yeres after he was married. After her death, Numa leauing to dwell in the cittie, was better contented to liue in the country alone, & solitarie, & gaue him selfe to walke much in the fields & woddes consecrated to the gods, as one desirous to leade alone life, farre from the companie of men. Whereupon was raised (in my opinion) that which is spoken of him, & of the goddess Egeria. That it was not for any straungenes, or melancholines of nature, that Numa withdrew him self from the conseruation & companie of men, but because he had found another more honorable & holy society of the Nymphes, & goddess Egeria, who had done him, as they saye, that honour, as to make him her husband: with who as his beloued darling it is sayed he enioyed happy dayes, & by dayly frequenting of her company, he was inspired with the loue & knowledge of all celestiall things. Surely, these deuises are much like vnto certain old fables of the Phrygians, which they hauing learned from the father to the sonne, doe loue to tell of one Atis: of the Babymians, of one

A of one Herodotus: of the Archadians, of one Endymion: and of many other such like men, who in their liues were taken for sayntes, and beloued of the goddess. Notwithstanding, it is likely, that the goddess loue neither birdes, nor horse, but men, and haue sometimes a liking to be familiar with perfect goodmen, and doe not disdaine sometime the conseruation of such as be holie, religious, and deuout. But to beleuee the goddess haue carnall knowledge, and doe delight in the outward beawtie of creatures, that seemeth to carie a very harde beliefe. Yet the wise Egyptians thinke it probable enough and likely, that the spirit of the goddess hath geuen originall of generation to women, and doe beget fruite of their bodies: howbeit they holde that a man can haue no corporall companie with any diuine nature. Wherein they doe not consider, that euery thing that ioyneth together, doth deliuer againe a like substance, to that wherewith it was ioyned. This notwithstanding, it is mete we should beleuee the gods beare good will to men, and that of it doth spring their loue, whereby men saye the goddess loue those whose manners they purifie, and inspire with vertue. And they doe not offende, which sayne, that Phorbas, Hyacinthus, and Admetus, were sometimes the louers of Apollo, and also Hippolytus the Sicyonian: of whom they report, that euer when he passed ouer the arme of the sea which lieth betweene the citties of Sicyona, and of Cirraha, the god which knewe he came, reioyced, and caused Pythia the propheteesse to pronounce these heroycall verses, Goddess familiar with men.

I knowe full well, my deare Hippolytus, returns by sea, my minde diuineeth thus.

Pythia be beloued of the goddess.

It is sayd also that Pan was in loue with Pindarus and his verses, and that the goddess honored C the poets Hesiodus, & Archilocus, after their death by the Muses. They saye moreover, that Aesculapius laye with Sophocles in his life time, and at this daye they doe yet shewe many tokens thereof: and after his death, another god (as it is reported) made him to be honorably buried. Nowe if they graunte, that such things maye be true: how can we refuse to beleuee, that some goddess haue bene familiar with Zaleucus, Minos, Zoroastres, Lycurgus, Numa, and such other like personages, which haue gouerned kingdomes, & stablished common weales? and it is not vnlike that the goddess in deepe dyd company with them, to inspire and teache them many notable things, and that they did drawe neere vnto these Poets, & players of the harpe, that made and played many dolefull and ioyfull ditties, at the least for their sporte and pleasure onely, if euer they came neere them. Neuertheles if any man be of other opinion, the waye is open and D large as Bacchylides sayed, to thinke and saye as he list. For my selfe I doe finde, that which is written of Lycurgus, Numa, and other suche persones, not to be without likelihood and probability: who hauing to gouerne rude, churllike, & stiffe necked people, and purposing to bring in straunge nouelties into the governments of their countries, did sayne wisely to haue conference with the gods, considering this sayning fell to be profitable & beneficiall to those them selues, whom they made to beleuee the same. But to returne to our historie. Numa was forty yeres olde, when the ambassadours of R O M E were sent to present the Kingdome vnto him, & to intreate him to accept thereof. Proclus, and Velsus, were the ambassadours that were sent. One of the which the people looked should haue bene chosen for King, because those of Romulus side, did fauour muche Proclus: and those of Tatius parte fauored Velsus. Nowe they vsed no E long speache vnto him, because they thought he would haue bene glad of suche a great good fortune. But contrarily it was in deepe a very hard thing, & required great perswasions, & much intreatie, to moue a man which had allwayes liued quietly, & at ease, to accept the regiment of a cittie, which as a man would saye, had bene raysed vp and grown by warres, and martiall dedes. Wherefore he answered them in the presence of his father, and one other of his kinsmen called Martius in this sorte. Change & alteration of mans life is euer dangerous: but for him that lacketh nothing necessarie, nor hath cause to complaine of his present state, it is a great follie to leaue his olde acquainted trade of life, & to enter into another newe and vknowne, if there were no other but this only respect: that he leaueth a certaintie, to venter vpon an vncertainty. Howbeit there is further matter in this, that the daungers & perills of this kingdom which F they offer me, are not altogether vncertaine, if we wil looke backe what happened vnto Romulus. Who was not vn suspected to haue layed waite, to haue had Tatius his fellow & copanion murdered: & now after Romulus death, the Senators selues are mistrusted to haue killed him on the other side by treason. And yet they saye it, and singe in euery where: that Romulus was the sonne of a god, that at his birth he was miraculously preserved, and afterwards he was as incredible brought vp. Whereas for my owne parte, I doe confesse, he was begotten by a mortall man, and was fostered, brought vp, and taught by men as you know: and these fewe qualities which they praye & commend in me, are conditions farr vnmeet for a man that is to raigne. I neuer loued a solitarie life, quiet and studie, and did exempt my selfe from worldly causes. All my life time I haue sought and loued peace aboue all things, and neuer had to doe with any warres. My conuersation hath bene to companie with men, which meete only to serue & honour the goddes, or to laughe and be merie one with another, or els to spende their time in their priuate affayres, or otherwise sometime to attend their pastures, and feeding of their cattell. Whereas Romulus (my ROMAINE lordes) hath left you many warres begonne, which peradventure you could be contented to spare: yet now to maintaine the same, your citie had neede of a martiall King, active, & strong of bodye. Your people moreover, through long custome, and the great increase they are geuen vnto by feates of armes, desire nought els perhappes but warres: and it is plainly seene, they seeke still to growe, and command their neighbours. So that if there were no other consideration in it, yet were it a mere mockerie for me, to goe to teach a citie at this present to serue the goddes, to loue iustice, to hate warres, and to fyve violence: when it rather hath neede of a conquering capitaine, then of a peaceable King. These and suche other like reasons Numa alleged, to discharge him selfe of the Kingdome which they offered him. Howbeit the ambassadours of the *ROMAINE*s most humbly belought and prayed him with all instance possible, that he would not be the cause of another newe stirre, and commotion among them, seeing both partes in the citie haue geuen their consent and liking to him alone, and none other to be their King. Moreover, when the ambassadours had left him vpon this sute, his father, and Martius his kinsman, beganne also priuately to perswade him, that he should not refuse so good and godly an offer. And albeit he was contented with his present state, and desired to be no richer than he was, nor coveted no princely honour nor glorie, because he sought only most famous vertue: yet he must needs thincke, that to rule well, was to doe the goddes good seruice, whose will it was to employe the iustice they knewe in him, and not to suffer it to be idle. Refuse not therefore (say they) this royall dignitie, which to a graue and wise man is a goodly field, to bring forth many commendable workes and fruites. There you maye doe noble seruice to the godds, to humble the hearres of these martiall people, and to bring them to be holy and religious: for they readily turne, and easily conforme them selues vnto the nature of their prince. They dearely loued Tatius, although he was a stranger: they haue consecrated a memorie to Romulus with diuine honours, which they make vnto him at this daye. And it maye be, that the people seeing them selues conquerors, will be full enough of warres: and the *ROMAINE*s being now full of spoyle & triumphes, will be glad to haue a gentle prince, and one that loueth iustice, that they maye thenceforth liue in peace, vnder good and holy lawes. And yet if it be otherwise, that their hartes be still full of heate and furie to fight: is it not better to turne this their desire to make warres some other waye, when a man hathe the bridle in his owne handes to doe it, and to be a meane in the meane time to ioyne the countrey, and all the nation of the *SABYNE*s, in perpetual loue and amitie, with so mighty and flourishing a citie? besides all these persuations and reasons, there were many signes also (as they saye) which promised him good lucke, together with the earnest affection and liking of his owne countie citizens. Who, so soone as they vnderstoode the coming, and commission of the ambassadours of ROME, they importunately desired him to goe thither, and to accept the offer of the Kingdome: that he might more straightly vnite and incorporate them together with the *ROMAINE*s. Whereupon, Numa accepted the Kingdome. Then after he had done sacrifice to the goddes, he set forwardes on his journey towards ROME: where the people and Senate went out to meete him, with a wonderfull desire to see him. The women at his entrie, went blessing of him, and singing of his prayles. They dyd sacrifice for him, in all the temples of the goddes. There was neither man nor woman but seemed to be as ioyfull and glad: as if a newe Realme, and not a newe King, had bene come to the citie of ROME. Thus was he brought with this open ioye,

A and reioycing, vnto the market place, where one of the Senatours, which at that time was regent, called Spirius Vettius, made them pronounce his open election: and so by one consent he was chosen King, with all the voyces of the people. Then were brought vnto him the tokens of honour and dignitie of the King. But he him selfe commaunded they should be stayed a while, saying: He must first be confirmed King by the goddes. Then he tooke the wife men & priests, with whom he went vp into the Capitoll, which that time was yet called mounte Tarpeian. And there, the chiefe of the soothsayers called Augures, turned him towards the south, hauing his face couered with a veyle, and stoode behinde him, laying his right hande vpon his heade, and praying to the goddes that it would please them to declare their willes by flying of birdes, or some other token concerning this election: and so the soothsayer cast his eyes all about, as farre as he could possiblye discern. During all this time there was a marvelous silence in the market place, although then an infinite number of people were assembled there together, attending with great deuotion what the issue of this diuination would be vntill there appeared vnto them on the right hande, good and lucky birdes, which did confirme the election. Then Numa putting on his regall robes, came downe from mounte Tarpeian, into the market place, where all the people receyued him with wonderfull shewes of ioye, as a man the most holy, and best beloued of the goddes that they could haue chosen. So hauing taken the royall seate of the Kingdome, his first acte was this. That he discharged the garde of the three hundred fouldiers, which Romulus had allwayes about his person, called Celeres: saying, he would not mistrust them which trusted him, neither would he be King ouer people, which should mistrust him. His second acte was, that he did adde to the two priests of Iupiter & Mars, a thirde, in the honour of Romulus, who was called Flamen Quirinalis. For the ancient *ROMAINE*s also called their priests, instituted in the olde time, Flamines, by reason of certaine litle narrowe hattes which they did weare on their heades, as if they had called them Pilamines: for Pilos in Greeke signifieth a hatte. And at that time (as they saye) there were many moe Greeke wordes mingled with the Latine, then there are at this daye. For they called the mantells the Kings did weare Lanas. And Iuba sayeth that it is the very same which the GRECIANS call Chlenas, and that the younge boye which was a seruante in the temple of Iupiter, was called Camillus, as some of the GRECIANS doe yet call the god Mercurie, because he is seruant of the godds. Now Numa hauing done these things at his first entrie into his Kingdome, still to winne further fauour and goodwill of the people: beganne immediately to frame his citizens to a certaine ciuilitie, being as iron wrought to softenes, and brought them from their violent and warlike desires, to temperate and ciuill manners. For out of doubt, ROME was properly that, which Plato ascribeth to a citie full of trouble and pryde. For, first it was founded by the most coragious and warlike men of the worlde, which from all partes were gathered there together, in a most desperate boldnes: and afterwards it increased, and grew strong, by armes and continuall warres, like as pyles driuen into the grounde, which the more they are rammed in, the further they enter, and sticke the faster. Wherefore Numa iudging it no small light enterprife, to plucke downe the hawty stomacks of so fierce and violent a people, and to frame them vnto a sobre and quiet life: dyd seeme to worcke it by means of the goddes, with drawing them on thereto by litle and litle, and pacifying of their whotte and fierce corages to fight, with sacrifices, feastes, dauncings, and common processions, wherein he celebrated euery him selfe. In the which together with their deuotion, there was mingled now and then, pastime and pleasure: and sometimes he layed the terrour and feare of the goddes before their eyes, making them beleue that he had seene straunge visions, or that he had heard voyces, by which the goddes dyd threaten them with some great troubles and plagues, allwayes to pull downe and humble their heartes, vnto the feare of the goddes. This was the cause why they thought afterwards that he had learned his wisdom of Pythagoras the philosopher: because the greatest parte of the philosophie of the one, and of the government of the other, consisted in suche ceremonies, and diuine studies. They reporte also that Numa dyd put on the outwarde shewe and semblance of Pythagoras holines, as following his intention and example. For Pythagoras as they saye, made an eagle to tame and gentle, that she would stoupe, and come downe to him by certaine voyces, as she flew in the ayer ouer his head. And that Numa and Pythagoras institutions muche alike.

Numa begins to bring backe home with service of the goddes.

passing through the assembly of the games Olympickall, he shewed her thighe of golde, and many other prety feates and deedes they tell of, which seemed to be wonderfull, and for which Timon Philiastan hath written these verses of him:

Pythagoras which loved to dwell in dignitie, and had an harte to glorie bent, and past in pollicie, Muche like a man which sought by charming to enchaunte, did use this arte, to winne mens minde, which unto him did haunte.
His graue and pleasaunt tongue in sugred speache did flourish, whereby he drew most minde of men, to bent of his owne bovrre.

Euen so the fayned fable of Numa, which he so cunningly disguised, was about the loue of a goddesse, or some Nympe of the mountaine: with whom he seemed to haue certaine secret meetings and talke, whereof we haue spoken before. And it is sayed he much frequented the Muses in the wooddes. For he would saye, he had the most parte of his reuelations of the Muses, and he taught the ROMAINEs to reuerence one of them aboute all the rest, who was called Tacita, as ye would saye, ladye silence. It seemeth he inuented this, after the example of Pythagoras, who did so specially command, and recomend silence vnto his schollers. Again, if we consider what Numa ordeined concerning images, and the representation of the goddes, it is altogether agreeable vnto the doctrine of Pythagoras: who thought that god was neither sensible, nor mortall, but inuisible, incorruptible, and only intelligible. And Numa dyd forbid the ROMAINEs also to beleue, that god had euer forme, or likenes of beast or man. So that in those former times, there was in Rome no image of god, either painted or grauen: and it was from the beginning a hundred three score & tenne yeres, that they had buylt temples & chapels vnto the godds in Rome, and yet there was neither picture nor image of god within them. For they tooke it at the first for a sacrilege, to present heauenly things by earthly formes: seeing we cannot possibly any waye attaine to the knowledge of god, but in minde and vnderstanding. The very sacrifices which Numa ordeined, were altogether agreeable, & like vnto the manner of seruing of the goddes, which the Pythagorians vsed. For in their sacrifices they spilt not the bloude, but they did theirs commonly, with a litle meale, a litle sheading of wine and milke, and with suche other light things. Suche as affirme that those two men did much company and were famillier together, doe laye further proofes & arguments for the same. The first is this: That the ROMAINEs did make Pythagoras a free man of the citie of Rome, as Epicharmus the Comickall poet an auncient writer (and sometimes one of Pythagoras schollers) sayeth in a booke he wrote & dedicated vnto Antenor. The other prooffe is: That Numa hauing had foure children, called one of them Mamercus, after Pythagoras sonnes name, from whom they saye is descended, the house of the Emylians, which is the noblest of the Patricians: for the King gaue him the surname of Emylius, because of his sweete tongue and pleasaunt voyce. Furthermore, I my self haue heard saye many times in Rome, that the ROMAINEs hauing receiued an oracle, which commanded them to set vp images in their citie, to the wisest and valliantest man that euer was amongst the Grecians: caused two statues of brasse to be set vp in their marker place, the one of Pythagoras, and the other of Alcibiades. Howbeit to striue about this matter any further, seeing there are so many doubtles: me thincketh it were but vaine. Moreover, they attribute to Numa, the first erection of the college pontificall: and saye he him selfe was the first Pontifex that euer was. But touching the name of Pontifex, some will saye they were so called, because they chiefly were ordeined & appointed for the seruice of the almightie: for this worde Potens in the ROMAINE tongue, betokeneth mightie. Other thincke this name was geuen to them by their founders, as to exempt perones out of the worlde: who enioyned them to doe all the seruice and sacrifices to the goddes they could possibly, & yet notwithstanding, if they had any other lawfull let or impediment thereof, they were not straight condemned for omitting the same. Howbeit the most parte doe bringe out another deriuation of this name, wherein me thinckes there is litle reason. As that they should be called Pontifices, because they had the charge of maintenance of the bridge. For that which the Grecians call Cephyran, the Latines call Pontem: that is, a bridge. And to saye truly, the charges of repairing the bridge, belongeth to the bihoppes: as well as the keeping of the most holy and

A and vnchangeable ceremonies. For the ROMAINEs thought it not only a thing vnlawfull, but tooke it for a most damnable & wicked acte, to destroye or breake the bridge of wodde, which was only ioyned together (as they saye) with pinnes of wodde, & without any iron at all, by the commandement of an olde oracle. But the stone bridge was buylt long time after the raigne of Numa, and in the time of the raigne of his nephew Martius. Nowe the first and chiefe of these bihoppes, which they call the great Pontifex, hath the place, authoritie, and dignitie of the highe prieste and master, of their pontificall lawe: who should be careful, not only about all publicke sacrifices and ceremonies, but also about suche as were priuate, and to see that no man priuately should breake the auncient ceremonies, nor bring in any newe thing into religion, but rather euery man should be taught by him, how, and after what sorte he should serue and honour the goddes. He also hath the keeping of the holy virgines which they call Vestales. For they doe geue Numa the first foundation and consecrating of them, and the institution also of keeping the immortall fire with honour and reuerence, which these virgines haue the charge of. Either for that he thought it meete to commit the substance of fire (being pure and cleane) vnto the custodie of cleane and incorrupt maydes: or els because he thought the nature of fire (which is barren, and bringeth forth nothing) was fittest, and most proper vnto virgines. For in Greece, where they kept continuall fire likewise (as in the temple of Apollo in Delfes, and at Athenes) the maydens doe not keepe the fame, but olde women which are past marriage. And if this fire chance to faile, as they saye in Athenes the holy lampe was put out in the time of the tyrannie of Aristion: and in the citie of Delfes it was put out, when the temple of Apollo was burnt by the Medes: and at Rome also, in the time of the warres that the ROMAINEs had against King Mithridates: and in the time of the ciuill warres, when altar, fire, and all were burnt and consumed together: they saye that it must not be lighted againe with other common fire, but must be made a newe, with drawing cleane and pure flame from the beames of the funne, and that they doe in this manner. They haue a hollow vessell made of a peece of a triangle, hauing a corner right, and two sides alike: so that from all partes of his compasse and circumference, it falleth into one point. Then they set this vessell right against the beames of the funne, so that the bright funne beames come to assemble and gather together in the center of this vessell, where they doe pearce the ayer so strongly, that they set it a fire: & when they put to it any drye matter or substance, the fire taketh it straight, because the beame of the funne, by meanes of the reuerberation, putteth that drye matter into fire, and forceth it to flame. Some thincke that these Vestall virgines keepe no other thing, but this fire, which neuer goeth out. Other saye, there are other holy thinges also, which no bodie maye lawfully see but they: whereof we haue written more largely in the life of Camillus, as the leastfo much as maye be learned and tolde. The first maydens which were vowed and put into this order of religion by Numa, were (as they saye) Gegania, and Verenia: and after them, Canuleia and Tarpeia. Afterwardes King Seruius increased the number with two other, and that number of foure continueth vntill this daye. Their rule and order set downe by King Numa was this: that they should vowe chastitie for the space of thirtie yeres. In the first tenne yeres they leaue what they haue to doe: the next tenne yeres following, they doe that which they haue learned: & the last tenne yeres, they teach young nouices. After they haue passed their thirtie yeres, they maye lawfully marie if they be disposed, and take them to another manner of life, and leaue their religion. But as it is reported, there haue bene very fewe of them which haue taken this libertie, and fewer also which haue ioied after they were professed, but rather haue repented them selues, and liued euer after a very grieuous and sorowfull life. This did so fraye the other Vestalls, that they were better contented with their vowed chastitie: and so remained virgines, vntill they were olde, or els died. He gaue them also great priuiledges, and prerogatiues. As: to make their will and testament, in their fathers life time. To doe all things without any gardian or ouerseer, as women which haue three children at a birth. When they goe abroad, they carie maces before them to honour them. And if by chance they meete any offendour in their waye, going to execution, they faue his life: howbeit the professed Vestall must affirme by othe, that he met him vnwares, & not of set purpose. If any man presume vnder their chayer, whereup they are caried through the citie, he shall die for it. Also when they them selues doe any faulte, they are corrected by the great byshoppe, who sometimes doth whippe them naked (according to the nature and qualitie of their offence) in a darcke place, & vnder a curtē. But he that hath deflowred her virginity, is buried quicke by one of the gates of the citie, which they call Collina gate: where within the citie there is a mount of earth of a good length, & with the LATINES is sayd to be raised. Vnder this forced mount, they make a litle hollowe vawte, and leaue a hole open, whereby one maye goe downe: and with in it there is set a litle bed, a burning lampe, and some vitells to susteine life withall. As a litle bread, a litle water, a litle milke, and a litle oyle, and that for honours sake: to the ende they would not be thought to famiſhe a bodie to deathe, which had bene consecrated by the most holy and deuoute ceremonies of the worlde. This done, they take the offender, and put her into a litter, which they couer strongly, and close it vp with thick leather in such sorte, that no bodie canne so much as heare her voyce, & so they carie her thus shut vp through the marker place. Euery one draweth backe, when they see this litter a farre of, and doe geue it place to passe by: & then follow it mourningly, with heauy lookes, & speake neuer a word. They doe nothing in the citie more fearefull to behold, then this: neither is there any day wherein the people are more forowful, then on such a daye. Then after the is come to the place of this vawte, the sergeants straight vnloſe theſe fast bounde coverings: and the chiefe byshoppe after he hath made certain secret prayers vnto the godds, and lift his handes vp to heauen, taketh out of the litter, the condemned Vestall muffled vp close, and so putteth her vpon the ladder, which conueyth her downe into the vawte. That done, he withdraweth, and all the priestes with him: and when the ſeely offendour is gone downe, they straight plucke vp the ladder, & cast abundance of earthe in at the open hole, so that they fill it vp to the very toppe of the arche. And this is the punishment of the Vestalls which defile their virginity. They thincke also it was Numa that buylt the round temple of the goddesse Vesta, in which is kept the euerlasting fire: meaning to represent not the forme of the earth, which they saye is Vesta, but the figure of the whole world, in the middelt whereof (according to the Pythagorians opinion) remaineth the proper seate and abiding place of fire, which they call Vesta, and name it the vnitie. For they are of opinion, neither that the earth is vnmoueable, nor yet that it is set in the middelt of the world, neither that the heauen goeth about it: but saye to the contrarie, that the earth hanged in the ayer about the fire, as about the center thereof. Neither will they graunte, that the earth is one of the first and chiefeſt partes of the world: as Plato helde opinion in that age, that the D earthe was in another place then in the very middelt, and that the center of the world, as the most honorableſt place, did apperteyne to some other of more worthy substance than the earthe. Furthermore, the byshoppes office was to show those that needed to be taught, all the rites, manners, and customes of buriall: whom Numa taught not to belecue that there was any corruption or dishonesty in burialles, but rather it was to worshiſſe & honour the godds of the earthe, with vsuall and honorable ceremonies, as those which after their death receyue the chiefeſt seruice of vs that they canne. But aboute all other in burialles, they did ſpecially honour the goddesſe called Liberina, that is sayd, the chiefe gouernour and preferer of the rites of the dead: or be it Proſerpina, or Venus, as the most learned men among the ROMAINES doe iudge, who not without cause doe attribute the order of the beginning and ende of mans life, to one ſelf god, & power diuine. Numa ordained also, how long time euery bodie should mourne in blackes. And for a childe from three yerres to tenne yerres of age, that died: he ordeined they should mourne no more monethes then it had liued yerres, and not to adde a daye more. For he commaunded, that the longest time of mourning should be but then monethes onely, and so long time at the least he willed women should remaine widowes, after the deceaſe of their husbands: or els the that would marie within that time, was bounde by his orderto sacrifice a whole bullocke. Numa also erected many other orders of priestes: of two sortes whereof I will only make mention. The one ſhalbe the order of the SALII, and the other of the FECIALES: for me thinckes, both the one and the other doth manifestly ſhewe the great holines, and ſingular deuotion which he had in him. The FECIALES are properly those, which the GREGIANS call IRENOPHYLACHS, as who would saye, peacekeepers. And in my iudgement, they had their right name according to their office, because they dyd

A did pacifie quarells with reason by waye of order, and did not suffer (as much as in them laye) that any matter should be tried by violence, vntill they were past all hope of any peace. For the GREGIANS call it properly Irenen, when both parties agree, and decide their controuersie with reason, and not with ſworde. Euen so those which the ROMAINES called the Feciales, went many times in perſone to those that dyd the ROMAINES iniurie, and sought to persuade them with good reason, to keepe promise with the ROMAINES, and to offer them no wrong. But if they would not yeld to reason, whom they sought to persuade: then they called the goddes to the wittes thereof, and prayed them, that if they dyd not most earnestly incenſe the ROMAINES, to purſue that most iuſtely apperteyned vnto their right, that all euills and miſchieues of the warres might fall vpon them ſelues, and on their countrie. This done, they dyd B threaten open warres againſt ſuch enemies. And if the FECIALES would not coſent to open warres, and dyd happen to ſpeake againſt them: it was not lawfull in that caſe, neither for priuate perſone, nor for the King him ſelfe to make any warres. But like a iuſt prince, he muſt haue leaue by their ſufferance to make the warres. Then dyd he coſider, & conſult, by what meanes he might beſt procure, & proſecute the ſame. Concerning this matter, they iudge that the ill happe which came to the ROMAINES, when the citie of ROME was taken and ſacked by the GAVLES, chaunced iuſtly for breaking of this holy inſtitution. For at that time, the barbarous people beſieged the citie of the CLYVSINIANS: and Fabius Ambuſius was ſent ambaffador vnto them, to ſee if he could make peace betweene them. The barbarous people gaue him an ill aunſwer: whereupon Fabius thinking his embafie had bene ended, and being loſt C what whotte, and raſhe in defence of the CLYVSINIANS, gaue deſaunce to the valliantſt GAVLE there, to fight with him man to man. Fortune fauored him in this chafge: for he ſlew the GAVLE, and ſtripped him in the ſield. The GAVLES ſeeing their man ſlayne, ſent immediately an heraulde to ROME, to accuſe Fabius, howe againſt all right and reaſon, he beganne warres with them, without any open proclamation made before. The FECIALES being then conſulted with thereabout, did declare, he ought to be deliuered into the handes of the GAVLES, as one that had broken the lawe of armes, & had deſerued it: but he made friends to the people which fauored him very much, & by their meanes eſcaped his deliuerie, and puniſhment. Neuerthles, the GAVLES within ſhorte time after, came before ROME with all their power: which they tooke, ſacked, and burnt euery whit, ſauiſng the Capitoll, as we haue written D more ample in the life o. Camilius. Now concerning the Prieſtes that were called Salii, they ſaye he dyd inſtitute them vpon this occaſion. In the eight yere of his reigne, there came a peſtilent diſeaſe through all ITALIE, and at the length it crept alſo into ROME. Whereat euery man being greatly affrayed, and diſcourage, they ſaye there fell from heauen a target of copper, which lighted betweene the handes of Numa. They tell hereof a wonderfull tale, which the King him ſelfe affirmed he heard, of the Nympe Egeria, and the Muſes. To wit, that this target was ſent from heauen, for the health and preſeruacion of the citie: and therefore he ſhould keepe it carefully, and cauſe eleuen other to be caſt and made, all like vnto the ſame in facion and greatnes, to the ende, that if any would enterpriſe to ſteale it, he ſhould not tell which of them to take for the right target. Moreover he ſaid, he was commaunded to conſecrate the place to the Muſes (in the which he dyd oftentimes companie with them) and alſo the ſieldes which were neere thereabouts: and likewiſe to geue the fountaine that ſprange in that place, vnto the Vestalls profeſſed, that euery daye they might drawe water at that well, to waſhe the ſanctuarie of their temple. The ſuccelſe hereof proued his words true, for the ſicknes ceaſed incontinently. So he aſſembled all the chiefe craſtes men then in ROME, to proue which of them would take vpō him to make one like vnto that. Euery man deſpayred to performe it. Howbeit one called Peturius Mamurius (the excellentſt workeman that was in thoſe dayes) dyd make them all ſo ſute like, that Numa him ſelfe dyd not knowe the firſt target, when they were all layed together. So he ordeined theſe prieſts Salii, to haue the cuſtodie of theſe targets, to ſee them ſafe kept. They were called Salii, not after the name of a SALIAN borne in SAMO- F THRACIA, or in MANTINEA, as ſome haue vntreuly alleaged, who firſt inuēd the manner of dauncing all armed: but they were ſo called, of their facion and manner of dauncing, and leaping. For in the moneth of Marche, they goe ſkipping and leaping vp and downe the citie, with those targetes on their armes, apparelled in red cassoques without fleues, and girded about with broad leather sword girdles, studded with copper, hauing helmets of copper on their heads, & striking vpon their targets with shorte daggers, which they carie in their hands. Moreouer, all their dauncing consisteth in mouing of their feete: for they handle them finely, making tornes about ground and beneath, with a sodaine measure, & a maruelous force of agilitie. They call these targets Ancylia, bicause of their facion, which is not altogether compasse: for they are not all round as other comon targets be, but they are cut with circles wreathed about, both the endes bowing in many foldes, and one fo neere another, that altogether they come to a certaine wreathed forme, which the Grecians call Ancylon. Or els they are so called, bicause Ancon signifieth an elbow, vpon which they carie them. All these deuatiours are written in the historie of Iuba, who in any case will haue this word Ancylia to be drawn out of the Greeke tongue. And it maye be also they were so called, bicause the first came from a boue, which the Grecians call Ancathen: or els for healing the sicke, which is called Acefis. Or els for ceasing of the drines, which in Greke is called, Anchimon Lysis. Or for the ending of all diseases and euills, for which cause the Athenians call Castor and Pollux, Anacis: if they lust to geue this word his deuatiour from the Greeke tongue. Now the reward which Mamurius the goldsmith had for the making of these targets was, that the Saly vnto this daye doe make mention of him, in their songe, which they singe going through the citie, & dauncing of their daunce all armed. Howbeit some thincke they saye not Petrius Mamurius, but veterem memoriam, ancient memorie. But Numa after he had ordeined and instituted these orders of priests, built his palace neere vnto the temple of Vesta, which holdeth his name Regia at this daye, to faye, the Kings palace. In which he remained most part of his life, studying either to sacrifice to the goddes, or to teache the Priests what they should doe, or howe with them he should best conspeler all heavenly things. It is true that he had another house on the hill, which they call at this daye, Quirinal, the place whereof is yet to be scene. But in all these sacrifices, ceremonies, and processions of the Priests, there were alwayes hushers that went before, crying to the people, kepe silence, and tend vpon diuine seruice. For they saye the Pythagorians thought it good, that men should not worshippinge the godds, nor make prayers to them in passing by, or doing any other thing: but they thought it mete, that men should of purpose goe out of their houles, to serue & praye vnto them. Euen so king Numa thought it not mete, that his subiects should come to see, and heare diuine seruice negligently, as it were for a facion, and only to be ryd of it, as heeding an other thing: but he would haue them set a side all other busines, and employ their thoughts & hartes only vpon the principall seruice of religion, & deuotion towards the godds. So that during seruice time, he would not haue heard any noyse, any knocking, boosing, or any clapping, as they commonly heare in all artificers shoppes of occupation, whereof at this daye yet they see some signes, and tokens, remaining in their sacrifices at Rome. For all the time the Augure beholdeth the flying of the birds, or that he is doing any sacrifice, the vergers crie aloud: Hoc age, which meaneth, tend this. And it is a warning to those that are present, to call their wittes home, & to thincke on that which is in hand. Also there are many of his orders like the precepts of the Pythagorians. For as they dyd warne men, not to sit vpon a litle bushell, not to cut fire with a sword, not to looke behinde them when they goe abroad: to sacrifice to the celestiall godds in an odde number, and to the goddes of the earth in an euen number, of which precepts, they would not haue the common people to haue any knowledge or vnderstanding. Euen so there are many institutions of Numa, the reasons whereof are hidden and kept secret: as not to offer wine to the godds of the vine neuer cut, & not to sacrifice vnto them without meale: & to turne a turne about when they doe reuerence to the godds, & to sit down after they haue worshipped them. And as touching the two first ordinances, it seemeth that by them he did recomend clemency, & humilitie, as being a parte of the deuotion towards the godds. But as for the turning which he willeth them to make, that worshipp the goddes: they saye it representeth the turning which the element maketh by his mouing. But me thincketh it should rather come of this: for that the temples being set to the east, he that worshippeth entering into the temple, sheweth his backe to the West, & for this cause turneth towards that parte, & afterwards returneth againe towards god: doing the whole turne, & ending the consummation

A summation of his prayer, by this double adoration which he maketh before & behinde. Onles peraduenture that he ment secretly to signifie, & geue them to vnderstand in this turning & chainging of their looke, that which the Egyptians figured by their wheels, shewing thereby, that these worldly things were neuer constant & in one state. And therefore, that we should take it thankfully, & pacially beare it, in what sorte soeuer it pleased god to chaunge or alter our life. And where he comaunded that they should sit after they had worshipped god: they sayed it was a token of a good hope vnto them that prayed, that their prayers should be exalted, and that their goods should remaine safe, & stick by the. Other saye, that this ease & sitting, is a separating the fro doing: & therefore he would they should sit in the temples of the godds, to shew they had done that which they had in had before, to the end to take of the godds the beginning of another. And it maye well be also, that it was referred to the thing we speake of a litle before. That Numa would accusome his people, not to serue the godds, nor to speake to them at all, as they passed by, or did any other thing, or were in haste: but would haue them praye vnto the godds when they had time & leysure, & all other busines at that time set a parte. By this good instruction & training them vnto religion, the citie of Rome by litle & litle came to be so tractable, & had the great power of king Numa in such admiration: that they tooke all to be as true as the gospel that he spake, though it had no more likelihood of trothe, then tales deuised of pleasure. Furthermore, they thought nothing incredible, or vnpossible to him, if he would haue it. And for prooe hereof, there goeth a tale of him, that he hauing bidden a great company of the citizens of Rome to come & suppe with him, caused them to be serued with plaine grosse meate, & in very poore & homely vessel. And when they were set, and beganne to fall to their meate, he cast out words sodainly vnto them, how the goddesse with whom he accopanied, was come to see him euen at that instant, & that sodainly the hall was richely furnished, & the tables couered with all sortes of excellent fine & delicate meates. Howbeit this farre passed all the vanity of lying, which is fould written of him, about his speaking with Iupiter. The hill Auente was not at that time inhabited, nor inclosed within the walles of Rome, but was full of springs & shadowed groues, whether commonly repaired to solace them selues, the two godds, Piculus & Fannus, which otherwise might be thought two Satyres, or of the race of the Titathians, sauing it is sayed, that they went through all Italia, doing the like miracles & wonders in phisicke, charmes & arte magike, which they reporte of those the Grecians call Satyr, Dactyles. D There they saye that Numa tooke them both, hauing put into the spring both wine & honnie, where they vsed to drinke. Whē they saw that they were taken, they transformed the selues into diuers forms, disguising & disfiguring their natural shape: into many terrible & fearful sights to behold. Neuertheles in the end, perceiuing they were so fast, as to escape there was no reckoning: they reuealed vnto him many things to come, & taught him the purifying against lightning & thunder, which they make yet at this daye with onies, heare, & pilchers. Other saye, he was not taught that by them, but that they fetched Iupiter out of heauen, with their coniuring & magike: whereat Iupiter being offended, answered him in choller, that he should make it with heads. But Numa added straight, of onies: Iupiter replied of men. Then Numa asked him againe, to take a litle away the cruelty of the comaundement: VVhat heares: Iupiter answered, quicke E hears. And Numa put to pilchers also. And it is reported that this was the goddesse Egeria, that taught Numa this subtiltie. This done, Iupiter returned appeased by reason whereof the place was called Ilicium. For Ileos in the Greeke tongue signifieth appeased, & fauorable: & this purifying was afterwards made in that sorte. These tales not onely varye, but full of mockerie & alie, doe show vs yet plainely the zeale & deuotion men had in those times towards the godds: vnto which Numa through custome had wonne them. And as for Numa him self, they saye that he so firmly put all his hope & confidence in the helpe of the godds: that one daye when he was told his enemies were in armes against him, he did but laugh at it, & answered: And I doe sacrifice. It is he (as some saye) that first built a temple to Faith & Temer, & which made the Romains vnderstand, that the most holy & greatest othe they could make, was to sweare by their faith, which they keepe yet at this daye. But Temer, which signifieth bounds, is the god of confines, or borders: vnto whom they doe sacrifice, both publicly & priuately, vpon the limites of inheritances, & now they sacrifice vnto him in laurel. Howbeit in old time they did sacrifice vnto him without any bloude, through the wife institution of Numa: who declared & preached vnto them, that this god of boundes was sincere, & vpright, without bloud or murder, as he hath is a witnes of iustice, & a keeper of peace. It was he, which in my opinion, did first limit out the boundes of the territorie of Rome: which Romulus would neuer doe, for feare least in bounding out his owne, he should confesse that which he occupied of other mens. For bounding & mearing, to him that will keepe it iustly: is a bond that brideleth power & desire. But to him that forceth not to keepe it: is a prooffe to shew his iniustice. To saye truly, the territories of Rome had no great boundes at the first beginning, & Romulus had got by conquest the greatest parte of it, & Numa did wholly deuide it vnto the needie inhabitants to releue the, & to bring them out of pouerty: (which carieth men headlong into mischief, & discourageth them to labour) to the end that plowing vp the faine land, they should also plowe vp the weedes of their own barrennes, to become bountiull & gentle. For there is no exercise nor occupation in the world, which so suddenly bringeth a man, to loue & desire quietnes, as doth husbandrie & tillage: & yet to defend a mans owne, there is in it corage & hardines to fight. But greedy desire, violently to take from others, & vnjustly to occupie that is none of theirs, is neuer in right husbandrie. And therefore Numa hauing brought in husbandrie amongst his subiects, as a medicine & meane to make them loue quietnes: was desirous to inure them to this trade of life, the rather to make them humble & gentle of condition, then to increase them in riches. He deuided all the territorie of Rome into certain parts which he called Pagis: as much to saye, as villages. And in euery one of them he ordeined controuersers & visiters, which should suruey all about: & he him self somtimes went abroade in persone, coëcturing by their labour, the maners & nature of euery man. Such as he found diligent, he aduanced them vnto honour, & gaue them countenance & authoritie: other which he sawe slowthfull & negligent, by rebuking & reprouing of them, he made them amend. But amongst all his ordinances which he made, one about all the rest caried the praise: and that was, that he deuided his people into sundrie occupations. For the citie of Rome seemed yet to be made of two nations, as we haue sayed before: and to speake more properly, it was made of two tribes. So that it could not, or would not for any thing be made one: being altogether impossible to take away all factions, & to make there should be no quarrells nor contentions betwene both parts. Wherefore he considered, that when one will mingle two bodies or simples together, which for their hardnes & contrary natures cannot well suffer mixture: then he breaks & beates them together, as small as may be. For, so being brought into a smaller & lesser powder, they would incorporate and agree the better. Euen so he thought it was best to deuide the people also into many small partes: by meanes whereof they should be put into many parties, which would more easely take away the first & the greatest parte, when it should be deuided & separated thus into sundrie sorts. And this diuision he made by arts & occupations: as minstrells, goldsmiths, carpenters, diers, shoemakers, tawers, taners, bellfounders, & potmakers, & so forth through other craftes & occupations. So that he brought euery one of these into one bodie, & copanie by it self: & ordeined vnto euery particular mysterie or crafte, their feasts, assembles, & seruices, which they should make vnto the gods, according to the dignitie & worthines of euery occupatio. And by this meanes, he first tooke away all faction: that neither side layed, nor thought any more, those are Sabines, these are Romaines, these are of Tatius, these are of Romulus. Inasmuch as this diuision was an incorporating, & an vniting of the whole together. Among other his ordinances, they did much commend his reforming of the law, that gaue libertie vnto fathers to sell their childre. For he did except childre already married, so they were married with their fathers consent & goodwill:udging it to be to cruell & ouer hard a thing, that a woman who thought she had married a free man, should finde her self to be the wife of a bondmaid. He began also to mende a litle the calendar, not so exactly as he should haue done, nor yet altogether ignorantly. For during the reigne of Romulus, they vsed the moneths confusedly, without any order or reason, making some of them twenty dayes & lesse, and others siue & thirte dayes & more, without knowing the difference betwene the course of the sunne & the moone: & only they obserued this rule, that there was three hundred & three score dayes in the yere. But Numa considering the inequality ftoode vpon eleuen dayes, for that the 12. revolutions of the moone are runne in 300. fiftie & foure dayes, & the revolution of the sunne, in 365. dayes, he doubled the

A the 11. dayes, whereof he made a moneth: which he placed first 2. yeres to 2. yeres, after the moneth of February, & the Romaines called this moneth put betwene, Mercidunum, which had 22. dayes. And this is the correctio that Numa made: which since hath had a farre better amēdment. He did also chaunge the order of the moneths. For Marche which before was the first, he made it now the third: & January the first, which vnder Romulus was the 11. & February the 12. & last. Yet many are of opinion, that Numa added these two, January & February. For the Romaines at the beginning had but tenne moneths in the yere: as some of the barbarous people make but three moneths for their yere. And the Acadians amongst the Grecians haue but foure moneths for their yere. The Acarnanians haue fixe to the yere. And the Egyptians had first but one moneth to their yere: & afterwards they made foure moneths for their yere. And this is the cause why they seeme (albeit they inhabit in a new coutrie) to be nevertheless the auncientest people of the world: for that in their chronicles they reckon vp such infinite nūber of yeres, as those which counte the moneths for the yeres. And to proue this true, that the Romaines at the beginning had but tenne moneths in the yere, and not twelue: it is easely to be iudged by the name of the last, which they call at this daye December. And that the moneth of Marche was also the first, maye be coniectured by this: for the first moneth after that, is yet called Quintilis: the 6. Sextilis, & so the other in order following the nūbers. For if January & February had then bene the first, of necessitie the moneth of Iuly, which they call Quintilis, must haue bene named September: considering also that it is very likely, that the moneth which Romulus had dedicated vnto Mars, was also by him ordeined to be the first. The second was April: so called of the name Aphrodite, that is to saye Venus, vnto whom they make open sacrifice in this moneth. And on the first daye of the same, women doe washe them selues, hauing a garland of myrtle vpon their heads. Howbeit some other saye, that it was not called after the name of Aphrodite, but it was only called Aprilis, because then is the chiefe force & strength of the spring, at which season the earth doth open, and the seedes of plants and erbes beginne to bud & shewe forth, which the word it self doth signifie. The moneth following next after that, is called Maye: after the name of Maia, the mother of Mercurie, vnto whom the moneth is consecrated. The moneth of Iune is so called also, because of the quality of that season, which is as the youthe of the yere. Although some will saye, that the moneth of Maye was named of this word Maiores, which signifieth as much as the elders: and the moneth of Iune, of Iunioris, which signifieth the younger men. All the other following, were named in old time by the numbers according to their order, Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, November, & December. But Quintilis was afterward called Iulius, of the name of Iulius Caesar, who slew Pompeius. And Sextilis was named Augustus, Octavius Caesar successeur in the empire, who was also, surnamed Augustus. It is true also that Domitian would they should call the two moneths following (which are September and October) the one Germanicus, and the other Domitianus. But that helde not long: for so soone as Domitian was killed, the moneths recovered their auncient names againe. The two last moneths only, haue euer continued their names, without chaūging or altering. But of the two which Numa added, or at the least trasladed: the moneth of February doth signifie as much as purging, or at the least the deuotion of the word fowndeth neere it.

E In this moneth, they doe sacrifice of plantes, & doe celebrate the feast of the Lupercales, in which there are many things agreeable, & like to the sacrifices made for purification. And the first, which is January, was called after the name of Ianus. Wherefore me thinkes that Numa took away the moneth of Marche from the first place, & gaue it vnto January: because he would haue peace preferred before warre, & ciuill things before martiall. For this Ianus (were he King, or demigod) in the former age was counted very ciuill & politticke. For he haunged the face of man, which before his time was rude, cruell, & wilde: & brought it to be honest, gentle, & ciuill. For this cause they doe painte his image at this daye with two faces: the one before, and the other behinde; for thus chaūging the faces of men. And there is in Rome a temple dedicated vnto him; which hath two doores, that be called the doores of Ianus: for the ciuill stompe is to open them, whereas the Romans haue his wayes in any place, and to shut them when they be appeased. To haue them shut; it was a rare thing to see, and happened very seldom: by reason of the greatnes of their empire, which of all sides was surrounded with barbarous nations, whom they were cōpelled to keepe vnder with force of armes. Nor withoutstanding it was once shut vp in the time of Augustus, after he had slaine Antonie: & once before also in the yere when Marcus Attilius & Titus Manlius were Cōsuls. But that continued not long, for it was opened again incontinently, by reason of warres that came vpon them sone after. Howbeit during the raigne of Numa, it was neuer one day opened, but remained thus continually by the space of three & forty yeres together. For all occasions of warres, were then utterly dead & forgotten: because at ROME the people were not only through the xāple of iustice, clemencie, & the goodnes of the King brought to be quiet, & to loue peace: but in the cities thereabouts, there beganne a maruelous change of manners & alteration of life, as if some gentle ayre had breathed on them, by some graciosus & healthfull wind, blowe from ROME to refresh them. And thereby bred in mens mindes such a hearty desire to liue in peace, to till the ground, to bring vp their children, & to serue the goddesses truly: that almost through all ITALIE, there was nothing but feastes, playes, sacrifices, & bankets. The people did traffike & frequent together, without feare or daunger, & visited one another, making great cheer: as if out of the springing fountaine of Numas wisdom many pretie brookes & streames of good & honest life had rōne ouer all ITALIE, & had watered it: & that the mildnes of his wisdom had frō hard to hand bene disparied through the whole world. In so much, as the ouer excessiue speeches the Poets accustomably doe vye, were not sufficient enough to expresse the peaceable raigne of that time.

There: spiders vncane, their cobwebbes daye and night in harnesses, which vnto to serue for warre:

there: canered rust doth fret, the Steele full bright of trenchant blades, & well vnto in many a Larre.

There: mighty speares, for lacke of use are eaten, with rotten vormes: and in that countrie there, the braying trompe dothe neuer seeme to threaten, their quiet eares, with blaits of bloody feare.

There: in that lande, no dronnyss sleepe is broken, with hoste alarmes, which terrors doe betoken.

For during all king Numas raigne, it was neuer heard that euer there were any warres, ciuill dissention, or inuocation of government attempted against him, nor yet any secret enmitie or malice borne him, neither any cōspiracie once thought on to reigne in his place. And whether it was for feare of displeasing the gods (which visibly seemed to take him into their protection) or for the reuerent regarde they had vnto his vertue, or for his prosperous & good successe all the time he raigned, I cannot tell: howbeit he fought to keepe men still pure, & honest, from all wickednes, & layed most open before the eyes of the whole world, a very xāple of that which Plato long time after did affirme, & saye, concerning true gouernment: which was, That the only meane of true quietnes, & remedy from all euill (which euer troubleth men) was: when by some diuine ordinance from aboue there meteth in one person, the right maiestie of a King, & the minde of a wise philosopher, to make vertue gouernesse & ruler ouer vice. For in deede happie is such a wise man, & more happy are they, which may heare the graue counsaill, & good lessons of such a mouthe. And there me thinkes needeth no force, no cōpulsion, no threaten, nor extremitie to bridle the people. For men seeing the true image of vertue in their visible prince, & in the example of his life, doe willingly growe to be wise, & of them selues doe fall into loue liking, and friendship together, and doe vse all temperance, iust dealing, and good order one toward another, leading their life without offence, and with the commendation of other: which is the chiefe pointe of felicitie, and the most happie good that can light vnto men. And he by nature is best worthy to be a King, who through his wisdom and vertue, can graffe in mens manners such a good disposition: and this, Numa aboue all other, seemed best to knowe and vnderstand. Furthermore, touching his wiues & children, there are great contrarieties among the historiographers. For some of them saye, he neuer married other wife then Tatia, and that he neuer had any children, but one only daughter, and she was called Pompilia. Other writte to the contrary, that he had foure sonnes, Pompo, Pimius, Calpus, and Mamercus: of euery one of the which (by succession from the father to the sonne) haue descended the noblest

All which families by reason of their first progenitor haue kept the surname of Reges, Kings. There are three other writers, which doe reprove the two first saying that they dyd write to gratifie the families, making them falsely to descend of the noble race of king Numa. Moreouer it is sayed, he had his daughter Pompilia, not by Tatia, but by his other wife called Lucretia, whom he married after he was made King. Howbeit they all agree, that his daughter Pompilia was married vnto one Martius, the sonne of the same Martius, which perswaded him to accept the kingdome of ROME. For he went with him to ROME, to remaine there: where they dyd him the honour to receiue him into the number of the SENA- tors. After the death of Numa, Martius the father stood against Tullus Hostilius for the succession of the Realme, and being overcome, he killed him selfe for sorowe. But his sonne

Martius, who married Pompilia, continued still at ROME, where he begotte Anus Martius, who was king of ROME after Tullus Hostilius, and was but fife yere olde when Numa dyed. Whose death was not sodaine. For he dyed consuming by litle and litle, aswell through age, as also through a lingring disease that waited on him to his ende, as Piso hath written: and Numa at his death was litle more, then foure score yere old. But the pompe and honour done vnto him at his funerall, made his life yet more happie and glorious. For all the people his neighbours, friends, kinsmen, and allies of the ROMAINES came thither, bringing crownes with them, and other publicke contributions to honour his obsequies. The noble men selues of the citie (which were called Patricians) caried on their shoulders the very bed, on which the counsell laye, to be conueyed to his graue. The Priestes attended also on his bodie, and so dyd all the rest of the people, women and children in like case, which followed him to his tombe, all beualling and lamenting his death, with teares, sighes, and mournings. Nor as a King dead for very age, but as they had mourned for the death of their dearest kinsman, and nearest friende that had dyed before he was olde. They burnt not his bodie, because (as some saye) he commaunded the contrary by his will and testament: but they made two coffines of stone, which they buried at the foote of the hill called Ianiculum. In the one they layed his bodie, & in the other the holy bookes which he had written him selfe, much like vnto those, which they that made the lawes among the GREEKES dyd write in tables. But because in his life time he had taught the priestes, the substance of the whole contained in the same: he willed the holy tables which he had written, should be buried with his bodie. For he thought it not reasonable that so holy matters should be kept by dead letters and writings, but by mens manners & exercises. And he followed herein they saye, the Pythagorians, who would not put their workes in writing, but dyd printe the knowledge of them in their memories, whom they knew to be worthy men, and that without any writing at all. And if they had taught any manner of person the hidden rules and secretes of Geometrie, which had not bene worthy of them: then they sayed the goddess by manifest tokens would threaten, to reuenge such sacrilege and impietie, with some great destruction and miserie. Therefore, seeing so many things agreeable, and altogether like betwene Numa and Pythagoras, I easily pardon those which maintaine their opinion, that Numa and Pythagoras were familiarly acquainted, and conuer- tained together. Valerius Antias the historian writeth, there were twelue bookes written concerning the office of Priestes, and twelue other containing the philosophie of the GREEKES. And that foure hundred yeres after (in the same yere when Publius Cornelius, and Marcus Bibius were consuls) there fell a great rage of waters and raine, which opened the earth, and discouered these coffines: and the liddes and couers thereof being caried away, they founde the one altogether voyde, hauing no manner of likelyhoode, or token of a bodie that had layen in it: and in the other they founde these bookes, which were deliuered vnto one named Petilius (at that time Prator) who had the charge to reade them ouer, and to make the reporte of them. But he hauing persued them ouer, declared to the Senate, that he thought it not conuenient the matters contained in them should be published vnto the simple people: and for that cause they were caried into the market place, and there were openly burnt. Surely it is a common thing, that happeneth vnto all good and iust men, that they are farre more prayed and esteemed after their death, then before: bicause that enuie doth not long continue after their death, & oftentimes it dieth before them. But notwithstanding the misfortunes which chaunced afterwarde vnto the five Kings which reigned at Rome after Numa, haue made his honour shine, with much more noble glorie then before. For the last of them was driuen out of his Kingdome, and died in exile, after he was very olde. And of the other foure, none of them died their naturall death, but three of them were killed by treason. And Tullus Hostilins which reigned after Numa, deriding, & contemning the most parte of his good and holy institutions, and chiefly his deuotion towards the goddesses, as a thing which made men lowly and faimie harted: dyd aflone as euer he came to be King, turne all his subiects hartes to the warres. But this mad humour of his, continued not long. For he was plagued with a strange, & most grievous disease that followed him, which brought him to chaunge his minde, and dyd farre otherwise turne his contempt of Religion, into an ouer-fearfull superstition, which dyd nothing yet resemble the true Religion & deuotion of Numa: & besides, he infected others with his contagious error, through the inconuenience which happened vnto him at his death. For he was stricken and burnt with lightning.

THE COMPARISON OF Lycurgus with Numa.

The virtues of Numa and Lycurgus
were alike, but their deeds diuers.

THVS hauing written the liues of Lycurgus and Numa, the matter requireth, though it be somewhat harde to doe, that we comparing the one with the other, should set out the difference betweene them. For in those things wherein they were like of condition, their deedes doe shewe it sufficiently. As in their temperance, their deuotion to the goddesses, their wisdom in gouerning, and their discrete handling of their people, by making them beleue that the goddesses had revealed the lawes vnto them, which they established. And now to come vnto their qualities, which are diuersely, & severally commended in either of them. Their first qualitie is, that Numa accepted the Kingdome, and Lycurgus gaue it vp. The one receyued it, not seeking for it: and the other hauing it in his handes, did restore it againe. The one being a stranger, and a private man: was by strangers elected & chosen, their lord & King. The other being in possession a King, made him selfe againe a private person. Such it is a goodly thing to obtaine a Realme by iustice: but it is a goodlier thing to esteeme iustice aboue a Realme. Vertue brought the one to be in such reputatio, that he was iudged worthy to be chosen a King: and vertue bred to noble a minde in the other, that he esteemed not to be a King. Their second qualitie is, that like as in an instrument of musicke, the one of them did tune and wrest vp the slacke strings which were in Sparta: so the other slackened, and set them lower,

A lower, which were to high mounted in Rome. Wherein Lycurgus difficultly was the greater. For he did not persuaide his citizens, to plucke of their armour & ecurates, nor to laye by their swordes: but only to leaue their golde & siluer, to forsake their soft beddes, their fine wrought tables, and other curious riche furniture, and not to leaue of the trauell of warres, to geue them selues only vnto feastes, sacrifices, and playes. But to the contrary, to geue vp banketing and feasting, & continually to take paynes in the warres, yielding their bodiest to all kinde of paynes. By which meanes, the one for the loue and reuerence they did beare him, easely persuaied all that he would: and the other, by putting him selfe in daunger, and being hurte also, obtained not without great trauell and aduenture, the end of his intended purpose and desire. Numa his muse was so gentle, louing, and curteous, that the manners of his citizens, which before were B furious and violent, were now so tractable and ciuill, that he taught them to loue peace and iustice. And to the contrary, if they will compell me to number amongst the lawes and ordinances of Lycurgus, that which we haue written touching the LOTES, which was a barbarous cruell thing: I must of force confesse that Numa was muche wiser, more gentle, and ciuill in his lawes, considering that euen vnto those which in deede were borne slaues, he gaue some little taste of honour, & sweetnes of libertie, hauing ordained, that in the feastes of Saturne, they should sit downe at meate, at their masters owne table. Some holde opinion, that this custome was brought in by king Numa: who willed that those, which through their labour in tillage brought in much fruite, should haue some pleasure thereof to make good cheere with the first frutes of the same. Other imagine, that it is yet a token and remembrance of the equalitie, C which was amongst men in the world in Saturnes time, when there was neither master nor seruauante, but all men were a like equally, as brethren or kinsmen. To conclude, it seemeth either of them tooke a direct course, thought best to them selues, to frame their people vnto temperance, and to be contented with their owne. But for their other vertues, it appeareth that the one loued warre best, and the other iustice: onles it were that men would saye, that for the diuersitie of the nature or custome of their people (which were almost contrary in manners) they were both compelled to vse also contrary and diuers meanes from other. For it was not of a faimie harte, that Numa tooke from his people the vse of armes, and desire to be in warres: but it was to the ende they should not doe any wrong to others. Neither did Lycurgus also studie to make his people souldiers and warlike, to hurte others: but for feare rather that others D should hurte them. And so, to cut of the exceffe in the one, and to supply the defect of the other: they were both enforced to bring in a strange manner of government. Furthermore, touching their feuerall kinde of government, & diuiding of their people into states and companies: that of Numa was maruelous meane and base, and framed to the liking of the meanest people, making a bodie of a cittie, and a people compounded together of all sortes, as goldsmithes, minstrells, founders, shoemakers, and of all sortes of craftes men & occupations together. But that of Lycurgus, was directly contrary: for his was more seuer and tyrannical, in gouerning of the nobility, casting all craftes and base occupations vpon bondemen & strangers, and putting into the handes of his citizens the shield and lance, suffering them to exercise no other arte or science, but the arte and discipline of warres, as the true ministers of Mars: which all their life time neuer knewe other science, but only learned to obey their captaines, E and to commaund their enemies. For to haue any occupation, to buye and sell, or to traffike, free men were expressly forbidden: bicause they should wholly & absolutely be free. And all sciences to get money was lawfull for slaues, and the LOTES: being counted for as vile an occupation, as to dresse meate, and to be a scullion of a kitchen. Numa put not this difference amongst his people, but only tooke away couetous desire to be riche by warres: but otherwise, he did not forbid them to get goodes by any other lawfull meanes, neither tooke any regarde to bring all to equalitie, and to be a like wealthy, but suffered euery man to get what he could, taking no order to preuent pouertie, which crept in, & spread farre in his cittie. Which he should haue looked vnto at the beginning, at that time when there was not too great an vnequalitie F amongst them, and that his citizens for substance were in manner equal one with another: for then was the time whē he should haue made head against avarice, to haue stopped the mischiefes & inconueniences, which fell out afterwards, & they were not lide. For that only was the fountaine and roote, of the most parte of the greatest euills & mischieues, which happened afterwards in Rome. And as touching the diuision of goodes: neither ought Lycurgus to be blamed for doing it, nor Numa for that he did it not. For this equality vnto the one, was a ground & foundation of his common wealth, which he afterwards instituted: and vnto other, it could not be. For this diuision being made not long before the time of his predecessour, there was no great neede to chaunge the first, the which (as it is likely) remained yet in full perfection. As touching marriages, & their children to be in common, both the one & the other wisely sought to take awaye all occasion of iealousie: but yet they tooke not both one course. For the ROMAINE husband, hauing children enough to his contentation: if another that lacked children came vnto him, to praye him to lende him his wife, he might graunte her vnto him, and it was in him to geue her altogether, or to lende her for a time, & to take her afterwards againe. But the LACONIAN, keeping his wife in his house, & the marriage remaining whole & vnbroken, might let out his wife to any man that would require her to haue children by her: naye furthermore, many (as we haue told you before) did them selues intreat men, by whom they thought to haue a trimme broode of children, & layed them with their wiues. What difference, I praye you was betwene these two customes? saying that the custome of the *LACONIAN*s shewed, that the husbands were nothing angrie, nor grieued with their wiues for those things, which for sorowe and iealousie doth rent the hartes of most married men in the world. And that of the *ROMAINE*s was a simplicitie somewhat more shamefast, which to couer it, was shadowed yet with the cloke of matrimonie, and contract of marriage: confessing that to vse wife & children by halves together, was a thing most intollerable for him. Furthermore, the keeping of maidens to be married by Numas order, was much straighter & more honorable for womanhood: & Lycurgus order hauing to much scope and libertie, gaue Poets occasion to speake, and to geue them surnames not very honest. As Ibycus called them Phenomerides to saye, thighe showres: and Andromanes: to saye manhood. And Euripides sayeth also of them.

*Good nutbrowne girles which leste their fathers house at large, and sought for young mens companie, & tooke their vvaire in charge.
And shee uer their thighs all bare, shee saylour did them wrong, on eche side open vnder their cotes, the styttes were all to long.*

And in deede to saye truly, the sides of their petticoates were not fowed beneath: so that as they went, they shewed their thighs naked and bare. The which Sophocles doth easely declare D by these verses:

The songe vvhich you shall singe, shalbe the sonnet sayde, by Hermione lusty lasse, that strong and sturdy mayde: Vvhich trust her petticoate, about her middle shorte, and set to shee vve her naked hippe, in francke and friendly sorte.

And therefore it is sayed, the LACONIAN wiues were bolde, manly, & stowe against their husbands, namely the first. For they were wholly mistresses in the house, and abroad: yea they had law on their side also, to vter their mindes frankly concerning the chiefeest matters. But Numa ever reserued the honour and dignitie vnto the women, which was left them by Romulus in his time, when their husbands, after they had taken them awaye perforce, disposed them selues: to vse them as gently as possibly they could: neuertheless, he added otherwife thereto, great honesty, and tooke away all curiositie from them, and taught them sobrietie, & did inure them to speake litle. For he did vtterly forbid them wine, and did prohibite them to speake, although it were for things necessarie, onles it were in the presence of their husbands. In so much as it is reported, that a woman chauncing one daye to pleade her cause in persone, openly before the iudges: the Senate hearing of it, did send immediately vnto the oracle of Apollo, to know what chat did prognosticate to the citie. And therefore Numa thought the memorie of the naughty women, would much commend the great humilitie, gentleness, & obedience of the good. For like as our GRECIAN historiographers doe note those which were the first that killed any of their citizeis, or haue fought with their brethren, or haue killed their fathers or mothers: euen so the *ROMAINE*s doe note that Spiritus Caruilius was the first which forooke his wife, two hundred & thirtie yeres after the first foundation of ROME, which was neuer done by any before.

Afore. And that the wife of one Pinarius, called Thalea, was the first which euer brawled or quarrelled with her mother in lawe called Gegania, in the time when Tarquinius (surnamed the proud) reigned: so well and honestly were the orders of Numa deuised concerning marriage. Moreover, the age and time of marrying of maydes, which both the one and the other ordeined: doth agree with the rest of their education. For Lycurgus would not that they should be married, till they were of good yeres, and women grownen: to the ende that they knowing the company of man at such time as nature requireth, it should be a beginning of their pleasure and lone; and not of griefe and hate, when (he should be compelled vnto it before time agreeable by nature, and because their bodies also should be more stronge and able to beare children; and to endure the mothers painefull throwes and trauell in childe bearing, considering they are married to no other ende, but to beare children. But the *ROMAINE*s to the contrarie, doe marrye them at twelue yeres of age, and vnder: saying, that by this meanes their bodies & manners be wholly theirs, which doe marrye them, being assured that no body els could touch them. By this reason it is manifest, that the one is more naturall, to make them strong to beare children: & the other more morall, to geue them the forme & manner of conditiōs, which a man would haue them to keepe all their life time. Moreouer touching orders for educatiō of childe, that they should be brought vp, instructed, & taught, vnder the selfe same masters & gouernours, which should haue an eye to make them drincke, eate, playe, and exercise them selues honestly, and orderly together: Numa made no more prouision for the same, then the least maker of lawes that euer was, and nothing in compariō of Lycurgus. For Numa left the parents at libertie, to vse their discretion (according vnto their couetousnes or necessitie) to cause their children to be brought vp as they thought good: whether they would put them to be labourers, carpinters, founders, or minstrells. As if they should not frame the manners of children, and facion them from their cradell all to one ende: but should be as it were like passengers in one shippe, which being there, some for one busines, other for another purpose, but all to diuers endes, doe neuer meddle one with another, but in arough storme or tempest, when euery man is affrayed of his owne life. For otherwise, no man careth but for him selfe. And other makers of lawes also, are to be borne withall, if any thing hath scaped them through ignorance, or some time through lacke of sufficient power and authoritie. But a wife philosopher, hauing receyued a realme of people newly gathered together, which dyd contrary him in nothing: whereto should he D most plye his studie and indeuour, but to cause children to be well brought vp, and to make young men exercise them selues, to the ende they should not differ in manners, nor that they should be troublesome, by their diuers manner of bringing vp, but that they should all agree together, for that they had bene trained from their childhood vnto one selfe trade, and facioned vnder one selfe patterne of vertue? That good education, besides other commodities, dyd also serue to preferre Lycurgus lawes. For the feare of their other which they had made, had bene of small effect, if he had not through institution, and education (as it were) dyed in soule the manners of children, and had not made them from their nources brestes in manner, wolke the Iuice and loue of his lawes, and ciuill ordinaunces. And this was of suche force, that for the space of five hundred yeres & more, Lycurgus chief lawes and ordinaunces remained in full E perfection, as a deepe woded dye, which went to the bottome, and peared into the tender wolke. Contrariwise, that which was Numas chief ende and purpose, to continew ROME in peace and amitie, dyed by and by with him. For he was no foner dead, but they opened both the gates of the temple of Ianus, which he so carefully had kept shut all his reigne, as if in deede he had kept in warres there, vnder locke and keye, and they filled all ITALIE with murder and bloude: & this his godly, holy, and iust gouernment which his Realme enioyed all his time, did not last long after, because it had not the bonde of education, and the discipline of children which should mainteine it. Why, maye a man saye to me here: hath not ROME excelled still, and preuailed more & more in cheualrie? This question requireth a long answer, and specially vnto such men, as place felicitie in riches, in possessions, & in the greatnes of empire, rather then in the quiet safety, peace, & concord of a common weale: and in clemency and iustice, ioyned with contentation. Neuertheless, howeouer it was, that maketh for Lycurgus also, that the *ROMAINE*s, after they had chainged the state which they had of Numa, dyd H so maruelously increafe & growe mightie: and that the Lacedæmonians to the contrarie, so foone as they beganne to breake Lycurgus lawes, being of great authoritie and sway, fell afterwards to be of small accompt. So that hauing lost the foueraintie & commaundemēt ouer Greece, they stode in great hazarde also to be ouerthrowen for euer. But in trothe it was some diuine thing in Numa, that he being a meere straunger, the Romaines dyd seeke him, to make him King, and that he could so chaunge all, and rule a whole citie as he listed (not yet ioynd together) without neede of any force or violence: as it was in Lycurgus, to be affistid with the best of the citie, in resisting the cōmons of Lacedæmon, but he could neuer other-wise haue kept them in peace, & made them loue together, but by his only wisdom & iustice.

THE LIFE OF Solon.

Great friendship betwixt
sistratus.

DIDYMVS the Grammarian, in a litle booke that he wrote & dedicated vnto Asclepiades, touching the tables of the lawes of Solon, allegeth the wordes of one Philocles, in which he speaketh against the common opinion of those that haue written, that Solons father was called Euphorion. For all other writers agree, that he was the sonne of Execestides, a man but reasonably to liue, although otherwise he was of the noblest and most auncient house of the citie of ATHENS. For of his fathers side, he was descended of king Codrus: and for his mother, Heraclides Ponticus writeth, she was colin germaine vnto Pisistratus. For this cause euen from the beginning there was great friendship betwene them, partly for their kinred, and partly also for the curtesie, and beawtie of Pisistratus, with whom it is reported Solon on a time was in loue. Afterwards they fortunited to fall at iarre one with the other, about matter of state and gouernment: yet this square bred no violent inconuenience betwene them, but they reserued in their hartes still their auncient amitie, which continued the memorie of their loue, as a great fire doth a burning flame. That Solon was no stayed man to withstand beawtie, nor any great doer to preuaile in loue, it is manifest to all, as well by other poetically writings that he hath made, as by a lawe of his owne: wherein he dyd forbid

- A forbid bondmen to perfume them selues, or to be louers of children. Who placed this lawe among honest matters, and commendable: as allowing it to the better sorte, and forbidding it to the basest. They saye also that Pisistratus selfe was in loue with Charmus, and that he dyd set vp the litle image of loue, which is in Academia, where they were wont to light the holy candle. But Solons father (as Hermippus writeth) hauing spent his goodes in liberalitie, and deedes of curtesie, though he might easely haue bene relieved at diuers mens handes with money, he was yet affamed to take any, bicause he came of a house which was wont rather to geue and relieue others, then to take them selues: so being yet a young man, he deuised to trade marchandise. Howbeit other saye, that Solon trauelled countries, rather to see the worlde, and to learne: then to traffike, or gayne. For sure he was very desirous of knowledge, as appeareth manifestly: for that being nowe olde, he commonly vsed to saye this verse:

him selfe in youth to trade marchandise.

I growe olde, learning still.

Also he was not couetously bent, nor loued riches to much: for he sayd in one place:

*Who so hath goodes, and golde enough at call, great herds of beastes, and stocks in many a folde, both horse and mule, yea store of corne and all, that maye content eche man about the morwilde: nor richer is, for all those heapes and hoordes, then he which hath sufficiency to seede, and clothe his corpes, with such as god affordes.
But if is ioye, and chief delights doe breede, for to beholde the sayre and heavenly face, of some swete wyfe, which is adorne with grace: or els some childe of beawty sayre and bright, then hath he cause (in deede) of deepe delight.*

Solons indignity of riches.

And in another place also he sayeth:

*In deede I doe desire, some vvealthe to haue at will:
but not vnles the same be got, by faithfull dealing still.
For suer who so desires by wickeednes to thriue:
shall finde that iustice from such goodes, will iustly him deprive.*

- D There is no law forbiddeth an honest man, or gētleman, greedily to scrape goods together, & more then may suffice: & likewise to get sufficient to mainteine one withall, & to defraye all needefull charges. In those dayes no state was discommended, as sayeth Hesiodus, nor any arte or science made any difference betwene men: but marchandise they thought an honorable state, as that which deliuered meanes, to traffike into straunge & farre countries, to get acquaintance with states, to procure the loue of princes, & chiefly to gather the experience of the world. So that there haue bene marchauts, which heretofore haue bene founders of great cities: as he which first buylt Masilia, after he had obtayned the friendship of the Gavles, dwelling by the riuer of Rhone. And they saye also, that Thales Milesius the wife, did traffike marchandise, & that Hippocrates the mathematicke did euē so: & likewise that Plato traouelling into Egypt, did beare the whole charges of his iorney, with the gaines he made of the sale of oile he caried thither. They remember also, that Solon learned to be lauish in expence, to fare delicately, & to speake wantonly of pleasures in his Poemes, somewhat more licētiously then became the gravity of a Philosopher: only bicause he was brought vp in the trade of marchandise, wherein for that men are maruelous subiect to great losses & daingers, they seeke otherwiles good chere to driue these cares away, and libertie to make much of them selues. Yet it appeareth by these verses, that Solon accompted him selfe rather in the number of the poore, than of the riche.

This Poetry at the beginning he vsed but for pleasure, and when he had leysure, writing no matter of importance in his verses. Afterwards he dyd set out many graue matters of philosophie, and the most parte of such things as he had deuided before, in the government of a common weale, which he dyd not for historie or memories sake, but only of a pleasure to discourse: for he sheweth the reasons of that he dyd, and in some places he exhortheth, chideh, and reprimeth the ATHENIANS. And some affirme also he went about to write his lawes and ordinaunces in verse, and doe recite his preface, which was this:

*Vouchesae to mighty Ioue, of heauen and earth highe King:
to graunt good fortune to my lawes, and heasts in euery thing.
And that their glorie growe in such triumphant vses, as maye remaine in fame for aye, which liues and neuer dies.*

He chiefly delited in morall philosophie, which treated of government & common weales: as the most parte of the wise men dyd of those times. But for naturall philosophie, he was very grosse and simple, as appeareth by these verses.

*The clattering hayle, and softly falling snowe doe breede in aye, and fall from cloudes on hie.
The dreadfull clappes, which thunderbolts doe throwe, doe come from heauen, and lightnings bright in skye:
The sea it scife by boysterous blaistes dothe rore which vnder it not provoked so full fore) VVould be both calme and quiet for to passe, as any element that euer was.*

So in effect there was none but Thales alone of all the seuen wise men of GREECE, who fearedch further the contemplation of things in common vse among men, than he. For setting him a parte, all the others got the name of wisdom, only for their understanding in matters of state and government. It is reported that they met on a daye all seuen together in the citie of DELPHES, and another time in the citie of CORINTH, where Periander got them together at a feast that he made to the other sixe. But that which most increased their glorie, and made their fame most spoken of, was the sending backe againe of the three footed stoole when they all had refused it, and turned it ouer one to another with great humanitie. For the tale is, howe certaine fisher men of the Ile of Co, cast their nettes into the sea, and certaine D strangers passing by, that came from the citie of MILETVM, did buye their draught of filhe at aduenture, before the net was drawn. And when they drue it vp, there came vp in the net a three footed stoole of massy gold, which men saye, Hellen (as she dyd retorne from TROYE) had thrown in in that place, in memory of an auncient oracle she called then vnto her minde. Thereupon the strangers & fisher men first fell at strife about this three footed stoole, who should haue it: but afterwarde the two citiees tooke parte of both sides, on their citizens behalfe. In so much as warres had like to haue followed betwene them, had not the propheteesse Pythia geuen a like oracle vnto them both. That they should geue this three footed stoole vnto the wisest man. Whereupon the men of Co, sent it first to Thales in the citie of MILETVM, as being willing to graunte that vnto a priuate persone, for which they had made warres E with all the MILESIANS before. Thales sayed, he thought Bias a wiser man than him selfe: and so it was sent vnto him. He likewise sent it againe vnto another, as to a wiser man. And that other, sent it also vnto another. So that being thus posted from man to man, and through diuers handes, in the ende it was brought backe againe vnto the citie of MILETVM, and deliuered into the handes of Thales the seconde time: and last of all was caried vnto THEBES, and offered vp vnto the temple of Apollo Ismenian. Howbeit Theophrastus writeth, that first it was sent to the citie of PRIENA, vnto Bias: and then vnto Thales, in the citie of MILETVM, by Bias consent. And after that it had passed through all their handes, it was brought againe vnto Bias: and lastely it was sent to the citie of DELPHES. And thus much haue the best and most auncient writers written: sauing that some saye in steade of a three footed stoole, it was a cuppe that king Crasus sent vnto the citie of DELPHES. A plate which Bathycles left there. They make mention also of another priuate meeting betwext Anacharsis and Solon, and of another betwene him and Thales, where they recite, that they had this talke. Anacharsis being arriued at ATHENS, went to knocke at Solons gate, saying that he was a stranger which came of purpose to see him, and to desire his acquaintance and friendshippe. Solon answered him, that it was better to seeke friendshippe in his owne countrie.

Anacharsis replied againe: thou then that arte at home, and in thine owne countrie, beginne to shewe me friendshippe. Then Solon wondering at his bolde ready wit, entertained him very courteously: and kept him a certaine time in his house, and made him very good cheere, at the selfe same time wherein he was most busie in gouerning the common weale, & making lawes for the state thereof. Which when Anacharsis vnderstoode, he laughed at it, to see that Solon

B imagined with written lawes, to bridell mens couetousnes and iniustice. For such lawes, sayed he, doe rightly resemble the spyders cobwebbes: bicause they take holde of litle ties and gnattees which fall into them, but the riche and mightie will breake and runne through them at their will. Solon answered him, that men doe iustly keepe all couenants and bargaines which one make with another, bicause it is to the hinderance of either partie to breake them: & euen so, he dyd so temper his lawes, that he made his citizens knowe, it was more for their profit to obey lawe & iustice, then to breake it. Neuertheles afterwarde, matters proued rather according to Anacharsis comparison, then agreeable to the hope that Solon had conceyued. Anacharsis being by happe one daye in a common assembly of the people at ATHENS, sayed that he maruelled much, why in the consultations & meetings of the GRECIANS, wise men

C propounded matters, and fooles dyd decide them. It is sayed moreover, that Solon was sometime in the citie of MILETVM at Thales house, where he sayed that he could not but maruell at Thales, that he would neuer marie to haue children. Thales gaue him neuer a worde at that present: but within fewe dayes after he suborned a stranger, which sayed that he came but newly home from ATHENS, departing from thence but tenne dayes before. Solon asked him immediately, VVhat newes there? This stranger whom Thales had schooled before, answered: none other there, sauing that they caried a young man to buriall, whom all the citie followed, for that he was one of the greatest mens sonnes of the citie, and the honestest man withall, who at that present was out of the countrie, and had bene a long time (as they sayed) abroad. O poore vnfortunate father, then sayed Solon: and what was his name? I haue heard

D him named, sayed the stranger, but I haue forgotten him nowe: sauing that they all sayed, he was a worthy wise man. So Solon still trembling more and more for feare, at euery answer of this stranger: in the ende he could holde no longer, being full of trouble, but tolde his name him selfe vnto the stranger, and asked him againe, if he were not the sonne of Solon which was buried. The very same, sayed the stranger. Solon with that, like a mad man straight beganne to beat his head, and to saye, and doe, like men impacient in affliction, and ouercome with sorowe. But Thales laughing to see this pageant, stayed him, and sayed. Loe, Solon, this is it that keepeth me from marrying, and getting of children: which is of such a violence, that thou seest it hath nowe ouercome thee, although otherwise thou arte stronge, and able to wrestle with any. Howbeit for any thing he hath said vnto thee, be of good cheere man, for it

E is but a tale, and nothing so. Hermippus writeth, that Platarchus (he which sayed he had Esops fowle) reciteth this story thus. Neuertheles it lacketh iudgement, and the courage of a man also, to be afrayed to get things necessarie, fearing the losse of them: for by this reckoning, he should neither esteeme honour, goodes, nor knowledge when he hath them, for feare to lose them. For we see that vertue it selfe, which is the greatest and sweetest riches a man can haue, decayeth oftentimes through sickness, or els by phisicke, and potions. Furthermore Thales selfe, although he was not married, was not therefore free from this feare, onles he would confesse that he neither loued friends, kynsmen, nor countrie: howbeit Thales had an adopted sonne, called Cybius, which was his sisters sonne. haue once wonne & possessed his loue, they make him euer after to be kynde and tender ouer them. So that ye shall see many times men of such a hard and rough nature, that they like not of them that moue them to marie, and get lawfull children: and yet afterwards are ready to dye for feare & sorowe, when they see their bastards (that they haue gotten of their flauers or concubines) fall sicke or dye, and doe vtter wordes farre vnmeet for men of noble courage. And some such there be, that for the death of a dogge, or their horse, are so out of harte, and take such thought, that they are ready to goe into the grounde, they looke so pittiefully. Other some are cleane contrarie, who though they haue lost their children, forgone their friends, or some gentleman deare vnto them, yet no sorowfull worde hath comen from them, neither haue they done any vnseemly thing: but haue passed the rest of their life like wise, constant, and vertuous men. For it is not loue but weaknes, which breedeth these extreme sorowes, and exceeding feare, in men that are not exercised, nor acquainted to fight against fortune with reason. And this is the cause that plucketh from them the pleasure of that they loue and desire, by reason of the continuall trouble, feare and griefe they feelee, by thinking howe in time they may be deprived of it. Nowe we must not arme our selues with powerie, against the griefe of losse of goodes: neither with lacke of affection, against the losse of our friends: neither with want of marriage, against the death of children: but we must be armed with reason against misfortunes. Thus haue we sufficiently enlarged this matter. The ATHENIANS hauing nowe sustained a long and troublesome warre against the MEGARIANS, for the possession of the Ile of SALAMINA: were in the ende wearie of it, and made proclamation straightly commaunding vpon payne of death, that no man should presume to preferre any more to the counsaill of the citie, the title or question of the possession of the Ile of SALAMINA. Solon could not beare this open shame, and seeing the most parte of the lustiest youtnes desirous still of warre though their tongues were tyed for feare of the proclamation: he sayned him selfe to be out of his wittes, and caused it to be geuen out that Solon was become a foole, and secretly he had made certaine lamentable verses, which he had cunne without booke, to singe abroad the citie. So one daye he ranne sodainly out of his house with a garland on his head, and gotte him to the market place, where the people straight swarmed like bees about him: and getting him vp vpon the stone where all proclamations are usually made, out he singeth these Elegies he had made, which beganne after this sorte.

*I here present my selfe (an Herald) in this case, which come from Salamins lande that noble worthy place.
My minde in peltig prose, shall neuer be express, But songe in verse Heroicall, for so I thinke it best.*

This Elegie is intituled SALAMINA, and containeth a hundred verses, which are excellently well written. And these being songe openly by Solon at that time, his friends incontinently prayed them beyond measure, and specially Pisistratus: and they went about perswading the people that were present, to credit that he spake. Hereupon the matter was so handled amongst them, that by and by the proclamation was reuoked, and they beganne to followe the warres with greater furie then before, appointing Solon to be generall in the same. But the common tale and reporte is, that he went by sea with Pisistratus vnto the temple of Venus, surname Colade: where he founde all the women at a solemne feast and sacrifice, which they made of custome to the goddess. He taking occasion thereby, lent from thence a trusty man of his owne vnto the MEGARIANS, which then had SALAMINA: whom he instructed to goe with him, selfe a reuolted traytour, & that he came of purpose to tell them, that if they would but goe with him, they might take all the chief ladies and gentlewomen of ATHENS on a sodaine. The MEGARIANS easily beleueed him, and shipped forthwith certaine souldiers to goe with him. But when Solon perceyued the shipp vnder sayle coming from SALAMINA, he commaunded the women to departe, and in steade of them he put lusty bearded springalls into their apparell, and gaue them little shorte daggers to conuey vnder their clothes, commaunding them to playe & daunce together vpon the sea side, vntill their enemies were landed, and their shipp at anker: and so it came to passe. For the MEGARIANS being deceived by that they lawe a farre off, as soone as euer they came to the shore side, dyd lande in

A heapes, one in anothers necke, euen for greedines to take these women: but not a man of them elcaped, for they were slayne euery mothers sonne. This stratageame being finely handled, & to good effect, the ATHENIANS tooke sea straight, and costed ouer to the Ile of SALAMINA: which they tooke vpon the sodaine, and wanne it without much resistance. Other saye that it was not taken after this sorte: but that Apollo Delphicus gaue Solon first such an oracle.

Salamina.*

Thou shalt first vrinne by vrvvres and sacrifice, of vrvhose dead bones, the dust engraued lies, the helpe of lordes and demy goddes full bright: in vrvesterne soyle, Asopia that hight.

By order of this oracle, he one night passed ouer to SALAMINA, & dyd sacrifice to Periphe-mia, & to Cicubus, demy goddes of the countie. Which done, the ATHENIANS deliuered him five hundred men, who willingly offered them selues: & the citie made an accorde with them, that if they tooke the Ile of SALAMINA, they should beare greatest authoritie in the common weale. Solon imbarked his souldiers into diuers fisher botes, and appointed a galliot of thirtie owers to come after him, & he ankred hard by the citie of SALAMINA, vnder the pointe which looketh towards the Ile of NEGREPONT. The MEGARIANS which were within SALAMINA, hauing by chance heard some inckling of it, but yet knew nothing of certainte: ranne presently in hurly burley to arme them, and manned out a shippe to descrie what it was. But they fondly comming within daunger, were taken by Solon, who clapped the MEGARIANS vnder hatches fast bounde, and in their roomes put aborde in their shippe the choicest souldiers he had of the ATHENIANS, commaunding them to set their course direct vpon the citie, and to keepe them selues as close out of sight as could be. And he him self with all the rest of his souldiers landed presently, and marched to encounter with the MEGARIANS, which were come into the feld. Now whilest they were fighting together, Solons men whom he had sent in the MEGARIANS shippe, entred the haven, & wanne the towne. This is certainly true, & testified by that which is shewed yet at this daye. For to keepe a memoriall hereof, a shippe of ATHENS arriueth quietly at the first, & by & by those that are in the shippe make a great howte, and a man armed leaping out of the shippe, ronnethe showing towards the rocke called Sciradion, which is as they come from the firme lande: and hard by the same is the temple of Mars, which Solon built there after he had ouercome the MEGARIANS in battell, from whence he sent backe againe those prisoners that he had taken (which were saued from the slaughter of the battell) without any ranfome paying. Neuertheless, the MEGARIANS were sharply bent still, to recouer SALAMINA again. Much hurte being done & suffered on both sides: both parts in the ende made the LACEDÆMONIANS iudges of the quarrell. But vpon iudgement geuen, common reporte is, that Homers authoritie dyd Solon good seruice, because he did adde these verses to the number of shippes, which are in the Iliades of Homer, which he rehearsed before the iudges, as if they had bene in deede written by Homer.

vrvvne shippes from Salamina soyle, vrvhich he had left at large, and euen those selfe same shippes, in battell did he cast and place in order for to fight, vrvith enemies force at last.
In that same vrvv place, vrvvwhereas it seemed then the captaines vrvhich from Athens came, imbattelled had their men.*

Howbeit the ATHENIANS selues thinke, it was but a tale of pleasure: and saye that Solon made it appeare to the iudges, that Phileus, and Euryaces (both Ajax sonnes) were made free denizens of ATHENS. Whereupon they gaue the Ile of SALAMINA vnto the ATHENIANS, & one of them came to dwell in a place called Brauron, in the countie of ATTICA: and the other in a towne called Melivm. And for due prooff thereof, they saye there is yet a certen canton or quarter of the countie of ATTICA, which is called the canton of the Philaides, after the name of this Phileus, where Pisistratus was borne. And it is sayed moreover, that Solon (because he would thoroughly conuince the MEGARIANS) did allege that the SALAMINIANS buried not the dead after the MEGARIANS manner, but after the ATHENIANS manner. For in MEGARA they burie the dead with their faces to the East: and in ATHENS their faces are towards the West. Yet Hereas the Megarian denieth it, saying that the MEGARIANS dyd burie them also with their faces towards the West: alleaging moreover, that at ATHENS euerie corse to his owne beere or coffin by it selfe, & that at MEGARA they dyd put three or foure corse together. They saye also there were certaine oracles of Apollo Pythias, which dyd greatly helpe Solon, by which the god called SALAMINA, IONIA. Their strife was iudged by fūe Arbitrators, all SPARTANS borne: that is to saye, Critolaidas, Amompharetus, Hyspechidas, Anaxilas, & Cleomenes. Solon vndoubtedly wonne great glory & honour by this employe, yet was he much more honoured & esteemed, for the oration he made in defence of the tēple of Apollo, in the citie of DELPHES: declaring that it was not meete to be suffered, that the CYRRHEIANS should at their pleasure abuse the sanctuarie of the oracle, & that they should aye the DELPHIANS in honour and reuerence of Apollo. Whereupon the counsell of the Amphictyons, being moued with his words and perswasions, proclaimed warres against the CYRRHEIANS; as diuers other doe witness, and especially Aristotle, in the storie he wrote of those that wanne the Pythian games, where he ascribeth vnto Solon the honour of that determination. Neutertheles Hermippus sayeth, Solon was not made generall of their armie, as Euanthes Samian hath written. For Æschines the Orator wrote no such thing of him: & in the chronicles of the DELPHIANS they finde, that one Alemon, & not Solon, was the generall of the ATHENIANS. Now the citie of ATHENS had a long time bene vexed and troubled through Cylon his heynous offence, euer since the yere that Megacles (gouernour of the citie of ATHENS) dyd with fayer words handle so the confederates of the rebellion of Cylon, which had taken sanctuarie within the libertie of the temple of Minerua: that he perswaded them to be wife, and to present them selues before the iudges, holding by a threed, which they should tye about the base of the image of the goddesse where she stoode, bicause they should not lose their libertie. But when they were come to the place of the honorable goddesse so called (which be the images of the furies) comming downe to present them selues before the iudges, the threed brake of it selfe. Then Megacles, and other officers his copanions, layed holde on them presently, saying that it was a manifest signe that the goddesse Minerua refused to faue thē. So those they tooke, & all they could lay hands of, were immediately stoned to death without the citie: the rest which tooke the altars for refuge, were flaine there also. And none were saved, but such as had made meanes to the gouernours wiues of the citie, to intreate for them: which from that time forth were euer hated of the people, and commonly called the abiects and excommunicates. Who being the issues of the rebell that rose with Cylon, chaunced to rise again in credit, & growing to great authority, they neuer left quarrelling & fighting continually with th offspring of Megacles. These factions were greatest & highest in Solons time: he being of authority, & seeing the people thus diuided in two parties, he stepped in betweene them, with the chieft men of ATHENS, & did so perswade & intreate those whom they called the abiects & excommunicates, that they were contented to be iudged. So three hundred of the chieft citizens were chosen iudges to heare this matter. The accuser was Myron Phyeian. This matter was heard and pleaded, & by sentence of the iudges, the excommunicates were condēd. Those that were alive, to perpetuall exile: & the bones of them that were dead, to be digged vp, & throwen out of the confines of the territorie of ATHENS. But whilest the citie of ATHENS was occupied with these vyprotes, the MEGARIANS wisely caught holde of the occasion deliuered, and set vpon the ATHENIANS, tooke frō them the haue of NYSEA, & recovered againe out of their handes, the Ile of SALAMINA. Furthermore, all the citie was possessed with a certen superstitious feare: for some sayed, that sprites were come againe, and straunge fights were seene. The prognosticator also sayed, they perceiued by their sacrifices, the citie was defiled with some abominable & wicked things, which were of necessitie to be purged and throwen out. Hereupon they sent into CRETA for Epimenides Phasian, whom they reckoned the seventh of the wise men, at the least such as will not allowe Periander for one of the number. He was a holy and deuoute man, and very wise in celestiall things, by inspiration from aboue: by reason whereof, men of his time called him the newe Curetes, that is to saye, Prophet: and he was thought the sonne of a Nymphe called Baltē. When he was come to ATHENS, and growen in friendship with Solon: he dyd helpe him much, and made his waye for establishing of his lawes. For he acquainted the ATHENIANS to make their sacrifices much lighter, and of lesse

A lesse coster: & brought the cittizs to be more moderate in their mourning, with cutting of certaine seuer and barbarous ceremonies, which the most parte of the women obserued in their mourning, & he ordeined certain sacrifices which he would haue done immediately after the obsequies of the dead. But that which exceeded all the rest was, that by vsing the cittizs vnto holines & deuotion, daylie sacrifices, prayers vnto the godds, purging of them selues, & humble offerings: he wanne mens hartes by litle & litle, to yelde them more cōformable to iustice, & to be more inclined to cōcorde & vnity. It is reported also that Epmenides, whē he saw the haueu of Munychia, & had long cōsidered of it: told those about him, that men were very blinde in foreseeing things to come. For if the ATHENIANS (sayed he) knew, what hurt this haueu would bring the citye like eate it (as they saye) with their teethe. It is sayed also that Thales did pro-B notifiaue such a like thing, who after his death he commaunded they should burie his bodie in some vile place of no reckoning, with in the territorie of the MILESIANS, sayeing that one day there should be the place of a cittie. Epmenides therefore being maruelously esteemed of euery man for these causes, was greatly honoured of the ATHENIANS, and they offered him great prefents of money and other things, but he would take nothing, and only prayed them to geue him a bough of the holy olyue: which they graunted him, and so he returned shortly home into CRETA. Nowe that this edition of Cylon was vtterly appealed in ATHENS, for that the excommunicates were banished the countrie: the citye fell againe into their old troubles and dissentions about the gouernment of the common weale: & they were deuised into so diuers partes and factions, as there were people of sundry places & territories within the countrie of C ATTICA. For there were the people of the mountaines, the people of the vallies, and the people of the sea coaste. Those of the mountaines, tooke the cōmon peoples parte for their liues.
Those of the valley, would a few of the best cittizens should carie the sway. The coaste men would, that neither of the should preuaile, because they would haue had a meane gouernmēt, & mingled of them both. Furthermore, the faction betwene the poore & riche, proceeding of their vnequalitie, was at that time very great. By reason whereof the cittie was in great daunger, and it seemed there was no way to pacifie or take vp these controuersies, vnles some tyrant happened to rise, that would take vpon him to rule the whole. For all the cōmon people were so fore indetted to the riche, that either they plowed their landes, & yelded them the fixt parte of their croppe: (for which cause they were called Hectemorij and seruants) or els they D borrowed money of them at vsurie, vpon gage of their bodies to serue it out. And if they were not able to paye them, then were they by the law deliuered to their creditours, who kept them as bond men & slaues in their houles, or els they sent them into strange countie to be sold: & many euen for very pouertie were forced to sell their owne children (for there was no lawe to forbid the contrarie) or els to forsake their citie & countrie, for the extreme cruelty & hard dealing of these abominable vlturers their creditours. In such as many of the lustiest & stow-test of them, banded together in cōpanies, & incoraged one another, not to suffer & beare any lenger such extremitie, but to choose them a frowte & trusty captaine, that might fet them at libertie, and redeeme those out of captiuitie, which were iudged to be bondmen & seruants, for lacke of paying of their detts at their dayes appointed: & so to make againe a newe diuision of E all landes and tenements, and wholly to chaunge and turne vp the whole state & gouernment.
Then the wisest men of the cittie, who sawe Solon only neither partner with the riche in their oppression, neither partaker with the poore in their necessitie: made sure to him, that it would please him to take the matter in hande, & to appease and pacifie all these broyles and sedition.
Yet Phanias Lesbian writeth, that he vsed a subtiltie, whereby he deceiued both the one and the other side, concerning the cōmon weale. For he secretly promised the poore to deuide the landes againe: & the riche also, to confirme their couenants & bargaines. Howeouer it fell out, it is very certain that Solon frō the beginning made it a great matter, & was very scrupulous to deale betwene them: fearing the couetousnes of the one, & arrogancie of the other. Howbeit in the end he was chosen gouernour after Philobrotus, & was made reformer of the rigour of the F lawes, & the tēperer of the state & cōmō weale, by cōsent & agreemēt of both parties. The riche accepted him, because he was no begger: the poore did also like him, because he was an honest man. They saye moreover, that one word & sentēce which he spake (which at that present was life in euery mans mouthe) that equalitie dyd breede no stryfe: did aswell please the riche & A wealthie, as the poore and needie. For the one sorte conceyued of this worde equalitie, that he would measure all things according to the qualitie of the man: & the other tooke it for their purpose, that he would measure things by the number, & by the polle only. Thus the capitaines of both factions perswaded & prayed him, boldly to take vpon him that foueraigne authoritie, sithence he had the whole citie nowe at his commaundment. The newters also of euery parte, when they sawe it very harde to pacifie these things with lawe and reason, were well content that the wisest, and honestest man, should alone haue the royall power in his handes.

Some saye also that there was such an oracle of Apollo.

Sitt thou at helme, as gouernour to steere to guyde our course, and rule the rowling shippe, for thou shalt see full many Athenians there, will take thy parte, and after thee will trippe.

But his familiar friends aboute all rebuked him, saying he was to be accounted no better then a beast, if for feare of the name of tyranne, he would refuse to take vpon him a Kingdome: which is the most iust and honorable state, if one take it vpon him that is an honest man. As in olde time, Tymonidas made him selfe King of those of Negrepon, with their consent: and as Pittacus was then presely of those of METELIN. Notwithstanding, all these goodly reasons could not make him once alter his opinion. And they saye he answered his friends, that principallitie and tyrannie, was in deede a goodly place: howbeit there was no way for a man to get out, whē he was once entered into it. And in certen verses that he wrote C to Phocius, thus he sayde:

*I neither blushe, nor yet repent my selfe, that haue perswade my native soyle all wayes, and that therein (to howde vntyrashe and pelfe) no tyrants thought, could once eclypse my prayse.
No might could moue my minde to any wronge, which might beblot the glory of my name: for so I thought, to liue in honour longe, and farre excell all other men for fame.*

Hereby appeareth plainly, that euen before he was chosen reformer of the state, to stablsh D newe lawes: he was then of great countenance and authoritie. But he him selfe writeth, that many sayed of him thus, after he had refused the occasion of vsurping of this tyrannie:

*Suer, Solon was a foole, and of a bashefull minde, that would refuse the great good happe, which goddes to him assignde.
The praye was in his handes, yet durst he neuer drawe, the net therefore: but stoode abasht, and like a dastard darre.
For had not that so bene, he would (for one dayes raigne, to be a King in Athens to vne) him selfe (all quicke) haue slayen.
And eke subuerted quite, his familie withall, So foruete it is to rule the roste, yelad in princely pall.*

Thus brought he common rumor to taber on his head. Nowe, notwithstanding he had refused the kingdom, yet he waxed nothing the more remisse nor softe therefore in gouerning, neither would he bowe for feare of the great, nor yet would frame his lawes to their liking, that had chosen him their reformer. For where the mischief was tollerable, he dyd not straight plucke it vp by the rootes: neither dyd he so chaunge the state, as he might haue done, least if he should haue attempted to turne vpsidowne the whole gouernment, he might afterwards haue bene neuer able to settle & stablsh the same againe. Therefore he only altered that, which he thought by reason he would perswade his citizens vnto, or els by force he ought to compell them to accept, mingling as he saied, softer with sweter, & force with iustice. And herewith a-greeth his aunswer that he made afterwards, vnto one that asked him, if he had made the best F lawes he could for the ATHENIAN s: yea suer, sayeth he, such as they were to receiue. And this

A pleasunt, that be hatefull, finely conueying them vnder culler of pleasing names. As calling whores, lemans: taxes, contributions: garnisons, gardes: prisiones, houses. And all this came vp first by Solons inuention, who called clearing of detts, Seisachtheia: in English, discharge. For the first change & reformation he made in gouernment was this: he ordeined that all manner of detts past (should be cleere, and no body should aske his detter any thing for the time past.
That no man should thenceforth lende money out to vsury, vpon couenants for the bodye to be bounde, if it were not repayed. Howbeit some write (as Androtion among other) that the poore were cōtēct that the interest only for vsury (should be moderated, without taking away the whole dett: & that Solon called this easie & gentle discharge, Seisachtheia, with crying vp the value of money. For he raised the pound of siluer, being before but three score and thirtene B Drachmes, full vp to an hundred: so they which were to paye great summes of money, payed by tale as much as they ought, but with lesse number of peces then the dett could haue bene payed when it was borrowed. And so the detters gayned much, & the creditours lost nothing.
Neuertheles the more parte of them which haue written the same, saye, that this crying vp of money, was a generall discharge of all detts, conditions, & couenants vpon the same: whereto the very Poemes them selues, which Solon wrote, doe seeme to agree. For he glorieth, & breaketh forth in his verses, that he had taken away all bakkes & marcks, that separated mens lands through the countrie of ATTICA: & that now he had set at libertie, that which before was in bondage. And that of the citizens of ATHENS, which for lacke of payment of their dettes had bene condēd for slaues to their creditours, he had brought many home again out of straite C countries, where they had bene so long, that they had forgotten to speake their naturall tongue: & other which remained at home in captiuitie, he had nowe set them all at good libertie. But while he was a doing this, men saye a thing thwarted him, that troubled him maruelously. For hauing framed an Edict for clearing of all detts, and lacking only a litle to grace it with words, and to geue it some prey peface, that otherwise was ready to be proclaymed: he opened him selfe somewhat to certayne of his familiers whom he trusted (as Conon, Clinias, and Hippocleus) & tolde them how he would not medle with landes and possessions, but would only cleere and cut of all māner of detts. These men before the proclamation came out, went presently to the money men, & borrowed great summes of money of them, & layed it out straight vpon lade. So when the proclamation came out, they kept the landes they had purchased, but restored not D the money they had borrowed. This fowle parte of theirs made Solon very ill spoken of, & wrōgfully blamed: as if he had not only suffered it, but had bene partaker of this wrong, & iniustice.
Notwithstāding he cleared him self of this slanderous reporte, losing fīue talents by his owne lawe. For it was well knowen that so much was due vnto him, & he was the first that following his owne proclamation, dyd clearly release his detters of the same. Other saye he was owing fifteene talents: and among the same, Polyzelus the Rhodian is one that affirmeth it. Notwithstanding they euer after called Solons friends, Greocopides, cutters of detts. This lawe neither liked the one nor the other sorte. For it greatly offended the riche, for cancelling their bondes: and it much more miliked the poore, because all landes and possessions they gaped for, were not made againe common, & euery bodye a like riche and wealthie, as Lycurgus had made the E LACEDÆMONIANS. But Lycurgus was the eleuēth descend of the right line from Hercules, & had many yeres bene king of LACEDÆMON, where he had gotten great authoritie, & made him self many friends: all which things together, dyd greatly helpe him to execute that, which he wisely had imagined for the order of his common weale. Yet also, he vsed more persuasion then force, a good wīnes thereof, the losse of his eye: preferring a lawe before his priuate iniurie, which hath power to preserue a citie long in vnion and concord, and to make citizens to be neither poore nor riche. Solon could not attain to this, for he was born in a popular state, & a man but of meane wealth: Howbeit he did what he could possible, with the power he had, as one seeking to winne no credit with his citizez, but only by his counsaile. Now, that he got the ill will of the more parte of the citie, by his proclamation which he made: he him self doth

For it greatly offended the riche, for cancelling their bondes: and it much more misliked the poore, because all landes and possessions they gaped for, were not made againe common, & euery bodye a like riche and wealthe, as Lycurgus had made the E LACEDÆMONIANS. But Lycurgus was the eleuthē descended of the right line from Hercules, & had many yeres bene king of LACEDÆMON, where he had gotten great authoritie, & made him self many friends: all which things together, dyd greatly helpe him to execute that, which he wisely had imagined for the order of his common weale. Yet also, he vsed more persuation then force, a good wimes thereof, the losse of his eye: preferring a lawe before his private iniurie, which hath power to persue a citie long in vnion and concord, and to make citizens to be neither poore nor riche. Solon could not attain to this, for he was born in a popular state, & a man but of meane wealth: Howbeit he did what he could possible, with the power he had, as one seeking to winne no credit with his citizez, but only by his counsaile. Now, that he got the ill will of the more parte of the citie, by his proclamation which he made: he him self doth F witnesse it, saying:

But shortly after, hauing a feeling of the benefit of his ordinance, and euery one forgetting his priuate quarrell: they altogether made a common sacrifice, which they called the sacrifice of Seisachthia, or discharge, and chose Solon generall reformer of the lawe, and of the whole state of the comon weale, without limiting his power, but referred all matters indifferently to his will. As the offices of state, common assemblies, voyces in election, iudgements in iustice, and the bodie of the Senate. And they gaue him also full power and authoritie, to sesse and take any of them, to appointe the number, what time the sesse should continue, and to keepe, confirme, and disanull at his pleasure, any of the ancient lawes and customes then in being. To beginne withall, he first tooke away all Dracons bloody lawes, fauouring for murder, and man slaughter, which were to seuer & cruell. For almost he dyd ordaine but one kinde of punishment, for all kinde of fautes and offences, which was death. So that they which were condemned for idleness, were iudged to dye. And pety larceny, as robbing mens horteyards, & gardens of fruite, or erbes, was as seuerly punished: as those who had committed sacriledge or murder. Demades therefore encountered it pleasauntly, when he sayed: that Dracons lawes were not written with incke, but with blood. And Draco him selfe being asked one daye, why his punishments were so vnequall, as death for all kinde of fautes: he answered. Bicause he thought the least offence worthe so much punishment: and for the greatest, he found none more grieuous. Then Solon being desirous to haue the chief offices of the citie to remaine in riche mens handes, as already they dyd, and yet to mingle the authoritie of gouernment in such sorte, as the meaner people might beare a litle swaye, which they neuer could before: he made an estimate of the goodes of euery priuate citizen. And those which he founde yerely worthe fife hundred bushells of come, & other liquide fruites and vpwards, he called Pentacosioedimnes: as to saye, fife hundred bushell men of reuenue. And those that had three hundred bushells a yere, and were able to keepe a horse of seruice, he put in the second degree, and called them knights. They that might dispend but two hundred bushells a yere, were put in the thirde place, & called Zengites. All other vnder those, were called Thetes, as ye would saye, hyerlings, or craftes men liuing of their labour: whom he dyd not admit to beare any office in the citie, neither were they taken as free citizens, sauing they had voyces in elections, and assemblies of the citie, and in iudgements, where the people wholly iudged. This at the first seemed nothing, but afterwards they felt it was to great purpose: for hereby the most parte of priuate quarrells and strifes that grew among them, were in the ende layed open before the people. For he suffered those to appeale vnto the people, which thought they had wrong iudgement in their causes. Furthermore, bicause his lawes were written somewhat obscurely, and might be diuerfly taken and interpreted: this dyd geue a great deale more authoritie and power to the iudges. For, considering all their controuersies could not be ended, and iudged by expresse lawe: they were driuen of necessitie allwayes to runne to the iudges, and debated their matters before them. In so muche as the iudges by this meanes came to be somewhat aboute the lawe: for they dyd euen expounde it as they would them selues. Solon self doth note this equall diuision of the publicke authoritie, in a place of his poesies, where he sayeth,

*Suche power haue I geuen, to common peoples hande, as might become their meane est ate, with equity to stande:
and as I haue not pluckt from them their dignitie, so haue I not to much increast, their small authoritie.
Vnto the riche like vvisite, I haue allowed no more, then vrell might seeme (in iust conceit) sufficient for their store.*

The darkness of the lawe increased, the authority of the iudge.

And so I haue for both provided in such vvisite, that neither shall eche other wronge, nor seeme for to despire.

Yet considering it was meete to prouide for the pouertie of the common sorte of people: he suffered any man that would, to take vpon him the defence, of any poore mans case that had the wrong. For if a man were hurte, beate, forced, or otherwise wronged: any other man that would, might lawfully sue the offendour, and prosecute lawe against him. And this was a wife lawe ordained of him, to accustom his citizens to be forie one for anothers hurte, & so to feele it, as if any parte of his owne bodie had bene iniured. And they saye he made an answer on a time, agreeable to this law. For, being asked what citie he thought best gouerned: he answered. That citie where such as receyue no wronge, doe as earnestly defend wronge offered to other, as the very wrong & iniurie had bene done vnto them selues. He erected also the counsaill of the Areopagites, of those magistrates of the citie, out of which they dyd yerely chooe their gouernour: & he him self had bene of that number, for that he had bene gouernour for a yere. Wherefore perceyuing now the people were grown to a stomake, & hawtines of minde, bicause they were cleare discharged of their detts: he set one vp for matters of state, another counsell of an hundred chosen out of euery tribe, whereof foure hundred of them were to consult & debate of all matters, before they were propounded to the people: that when the great counsell of the people at large should be assembled, no matters should be put forth, onles it had bene before well considered of, & digested, by the counsell of the foure hundred. Moreover, he ordeined the higher court (should haue the chiefe authoritie & power ouer all things, and chiefly to see the lawe executed and maintained: supposing that the common weale being settled, and stayed with these two courtes (as with two stronge anker holdes) it should be the lesse tymouled and troubled, and the people also better pacified and quieted. The most parte of writers holde this opinion, that it was Solon which erected the counsaill of the Areopagites, as we haue sayed, and it is very likely to be true, for that Draco in all his lawes and ordinances made no manner of mention of the Areopagites, but allwayes speaketh to the Ephetes (which were iudges of life and death) when he spake of murder, or of any mans death. Notwithstanding, the eight law of the thirteenth table of Solon sayeth thus, in these very words, All such as haue bene banished or detected of naughty life, before Solon made his laws, shalbe restored againe to their goodes and good name, except those which were condemned by order of the counsaill of the Areopagites, or by the Ephetes, or by the Kings in open court, for murder, and death of any man, or for aspiring to vlurpe tyrannie. These wordes to the contrary, seeme to proue and testifie, that the counsell of the Areopagites was, before Solon was chosen reformer of the lawes. For howe could offenders and wicked men be condemned, by order of the counsell of the Areopagites before Solon, if Solon was the first that gaue it authoritie to iudge? onles a man will saye peraduenture, that he would a litle helpe the matter of his lawes which were obscure and darke, and would supply that they lacked, with expounding of the same by them. Those which shalbe founde aintained and convicted of any matter, that hath bene heard before the counsaill of the Areopagites, the Ephetes, or the gouernours of the citie when this lawe shall come forth: shall stand condemned still, and all other shalbe pardoned, restored, and set at libertie. Howe soeuer it is, sure that was his intent and meaning. Furthermore amongst the rest of his lawes, one of them in deede was of his owne deuise: for the like was neuer stablished els where. And it is that lawe, that pronounceth him defamed, and vnholiest, who in a ciuill vpror among the citizens, sitteth still a looker on, and a neavter, and taketh parte with neither side. Whereby his minde was as it should appeare, that priuate men should not be only careful to put them selues & their causes in safety, nor yet should be careless for others mens matters, or thincke it a vertue not to meddle with the miseries and misfortunes of their countrie, but from the beginning of euery sedition that they should ioine with those that take the iustest cause in hande, and rather to hazarde them selues with such, then to tarie looking (without putting them selues in daunger) which of the two should haue the victorie. There is another lawe also, which at the first sight me thinketh is very vnholiest and fond. That if any man according to the lawe hath matched with a riche heire & inheritance, and of him selfe is impotent, and vnable to doe the office of a husband, she maye lawe-

fully lye with any whom she liketh, of her husbands nearest kinsmen. Howbeit some affirme, A that it is a wife made lawe for those, which knowing them selues vnmeet to entertaine wedlocke, will for couetousnes of landes, maye with riche heires and possessioners, and minde to abuse poore gentlewomen vnder the colour of lawe: and will thincke to force and restraine nature. For, seeing the lawe suffereth an inheritour or possessor thus ill bestowed, at her pleasure to be bolde with any of her husbands kynne: men will either leaue to purchase such mariages, or if they be so careless that they will nedes maye, it shalbe to their extreme shame and ignominie, and so shall they deservely paye for their greedy couetousnes. And the lawe is well made also, bicause the wife hath not cope to all her husbands kynsmen, but vnto one choyce man whom she liketh best of his house: to the ende that the children that shalbe borne, shalbe at the least of her husbands bloude and kynred. This also confirmeth the same, B that such a newe married wife should be shut vp with her husband, and eate a quince with him: and that he also which marryeth such an inheritour, should of duty see her thryse a moneth at the least. For although he get no children of her, yet it is an honour the husband doth to his wife, arguing that he taketh her for an honest woman, that he loueth her, and that he esteemeth of her. Besides, it taketh away many mislikings and displeasures which oftentimes happen in such cases, and keepeth loue and good will waking, that it dyenot vterly betweene them. Furthermore, he tooke awaye all ioynters and dowries in other mariages, and willed that the wiues should bring their husbands but three gownes only, with some other little moueables of small value, and without any other thing as it were: vterly forbidding that they should buye their husbands, or that they should make marchaundise of mariages, as of other trades to gaine, but would that man and woman should maye together for issue, for pleasure, and for loue, but in no case for money. And for prooe hereof, Diomysius the tyranne of SICILE, one daye answered his mother (which would nedes be married to a young man of SYRACUSA) in this forte. I haue power, saith he, to breake the lawes of SYRACUSA, by hauing the Kingdome: but to force the law of nature, or to make marriage without the reasonable compasse of age, that passeth my reache and power. So is it not tolerable, and much lesse allowable also, that such disorder should be in well ordered cities, that such vncomely and vnfit mariages should be made, betweene coples of so vnequall yeres: considering there is no meete nor necessary ende of such matches. A wife gouernour of a cittie, or a iudge and reformer of lawes and manners, might well saye to an olde man that should D maye with a young mayde, as the Poet sayeth of Philoctetes:

Al seely wretche, howe trynne a man arte thou, as these young yeres, for to be married now?

And finding a young man in an olde riche womans house, getting his liuing by riding of her errands, and waxing fat as they saye the partridge doth by treading of the hennes: he maye take him from thence, to bestowe him on some young mayde that shall haue neede of a husband. And thus much for this matter. But they greatly commend another lawe of Solons, which forbiddeth to speake ill of the dead. For it is a good and godly thing to thinke, that they ought not to touche the dead, no more than to touche holy things: and men should take great heede to offend those that are departed out of this world, besides it is a token of wisdom and ciuillitie, to beware of immortall enemies. He commaunded also in the selfe same lawe, that no man should speake ill of the liuing, specially in Churches, during diuine seruice, or in counsaill chamber of the cittie, nor in the Theaters whilst games were a playing: vpon payne of three siluer Drachmes to be payed to him that was iniured, & two to the common treasure. For he thought it to much shameles boldnes, in no place to keepe in ones choller, and moreover, that such lacked ciuillitie and good manners: and yet altogether to suppress and smother it, he knewe it was not only a harde matter, but to some natures vnpossible. And he that maketh lawes, must haue regarde to the common possibilitie of men, if he will punish the litle, with profitable example, and not much without some profit. So was he maruelously well thought of, for the lawe that he made touching willes and testaments. For before, F men might not lawfully make their heires whom they would, but the goodes came to the childre or kynred of the testatour. But he leauing it at libertie, to dispose their goods where they

A they thought good, so they had no children of their owne: dyd therein preferre friendship before kynred, and good will and fauour before necessitie and constraint, and so made euery one lorde and master of his owne goodes. Yet he dyd not simply and a like allowe all sortes of giftes, howsoeuer they were made: but those only which were made by men of found memorie, or by those whose wittes sayled them not by extreme sicknes, or through drincks, medicines, poysonings, charmes, or other such violence and extraordinarie meanes, neither yet through the inticements and persuasions of women. As thincking very wisely, there was no difference at all betweene those that were evidently forced by constraint, and those that were compassed and wrought by subornation at length to doe a thing against their will, taking fraude in this case equall with violence, and pleasure with sorowe, as passions with madnes, which commonly haue as much force the one as the other, to drawe and drie men from reason. He made another lawe also, in which he appointed women their times to goe abroad into the fieldes, their mourning, their feastes and sacrifices, plucking from them all disorder and wilfull libertie, which they vsed before. For he dyd forbid that they should carie out of the cittie with them about three gownes, and to take vittells with them about the value of an halfe pennie, neither basket nor pannier about a cubite highe: and specially he dyd forbid them to goe in the night, other then in their coche, and that a torche should be caried before them. He dyd forbid them also at the buriall of the dead, to teare and spoyle them selues with blowes, to make lamentations in verses, to weepe at the funeralles of a straunger not being their kinsman, to sacrifice an ox on the graue of the dead, to burie about three C gownes with the corse, to goe to other mens graues, but at the very time of burying the corse: all which or the most parte of them, are forbidden by our lawes at this daye. Moreover, those lawes appointe a penaltie vpon such women as offend in the same, to be distrayned for, by certaine officers expressely named, to controll and reforme the abuses of women, as womanish perones and saynte harted, which suffer them selues to be ouercome with such passions and fondnes in their mourning. And perceyuing that the cittie of ATHENS beganne to replenish daylie more and more, by mens repaying thither from all partes, and by reason of the great assured safetie, and libertie that they founde there: and also considering howe the greatest parte of the Realme became in manner heathy, and was very barren, and that men trafficking the seas, are not wonte to bring any marchaundise to those, which can geue them nothing againe in exchange: he beganne to practise that his citizens should giue them selues vnto D craftes and occupations, and made a lawe, that the sonne should not be bounde to relieue his father being olde, onles he had set him in his youth to some occupation. It was a wise parte of Lycurgus (who dwelt in a cittie where was no resort of strangers, and had so great a territorie as could haue furnished twise as many people, as Euripides layeth, and moreover on all sides was enuironned with a great number of slaues of the ILOTES, whom it was needefull to keepe still in labour and worcke continually) to haue his citizens allwayes occupied in exercises of feates of armes, without making them to learne any other science, but discharged them of all other miserable occupations and handy craftes. But Solon framing his lawes vnto things, & not things vnto lawes, when he sawe the cuntry of ATTICA so leane and barren, E that it could hardly bring forth to susteine those that tilled the grounde only, and therefore much more impossible to keepe so great a multitude of idle people as were in ATHENS: thought it very requisite to set vp occupations, and to geue them countenance and estimation. Therefore he ordeined, that the counsaill of the Areopagites, should haue full power, and authoritie to enquier how euery man liued in the cittie, & also to punish such as they found idle people, and dyd not labour. But this was thought to seure and straight a lawe which he ordeined (as Heraclides Ponticus writeth) that the children borne of common harlots and strumpets should not be bounde to relieue their fathers. For he that maketh no accompt of matrimonie, plainly sheweth that he tooke not a wife to haue children, but only to satisfie his lust and pleasure: and so such an one hath his iust reward, and is disappointed of the reuerence that a father ought to haue of his children, since through his owne faulte the birth of his childre falleth out to his reproche. Yet to saye truly, in Solons laws touching women, there are many oburdinies, as they fall out ill fauoredly. For he maketh it lawfull for any man to kill an I ij adulterer taking him with the facke. But he that rauisheth or forcibly taketh away a free woman, is only condemned to paye a hundred siluer drachmes. And he that was the Pandor to procure her, should only paye twenty drachmes. Onleshe had bene a common strumpet or curtisan: for such doe iustly open access, to all that will hier them. Furthermore, he doth forbid any persone to sell his daughters or sisters, onles the father or brother had taken them, abusing them selues before marriage. Me thinketh it is farre from purpose and reason, with seueritie to punish a thing in one place, and our lightly to passe it ouer in another: or to set some light fine on ones head for a great fault, and after to discharge him, as it were but a matter of sporte. Onles they will excuse it thus, that money being very harde & scante at that time in Athens, those fines were then very great & grievous to paye. For in setting out the charges of offerings which should be made in sacrifices, he appointed a weather to be a conuenient offering, and he setteth a buiffell of come at a siluer drachme. More he ordeined, that they which wonne any of the games at Athens, should paye to the common treasure an hundred drachmes. And those that wone any of the games Olympicall, fise hūdrē drachmes. Also he appointed that he which brought a woulfe, should haue fise drachmes, & him one drachme for reward of a she woulfe. Whereofas Demetrius Phalerian writeth: the one was the price of an oxe, and the other of a mutton. For, touching the rates he ordeined in the sixteenth table of his lawes mete for burnt sacrifices, it is likely he dydrate them at a much higher price, then ordinarily they were worth: and yet notwithstanding, the price which he setteth, is very little in comparison of that which they are worth at this daye. Nowe it was a custome euer amongst the Athenians to kill their woulfes, because all their coutrie laye for pasture, & not for tillage. Some there be that saye, the tribes of the people of Athens haue not bene called after the names of the children of Ion, as the common opinion hath bene: but that they were called after their diuers trades & manners of liuing, which they tooke them selues vnto from the beginning. For, such as gaue them selues vnto the warres, were called Oplites: as who would saye, men of armes. Those that wrought in their occupations, were called Ergades: as much to saye, as men of occupation. The other two which were husbandmen, & followed the plough, were called Teleontes: as you would saye, labouring men. And those that kept beastes & cattell, were called Agiores: as much to saye, as heard men. Nowe, forasmuch as the whole prouince of Attica was very drye, and had great lacke of water, being not full of riuers, running streames, nor lakes, nor yet stored with any great nūber of springs, inso much as they are driuen there to vse (through the most parte of the countrie) water drawn out of welles made with mens handes: he made such an order, that where there was any well within the space of an Hippicon, that euery bodye within that circuite, might come and drawe water onely at that well, for his vse and necessitie. Hippicon is the distaunce of foure furlonges, which is halfe a mile: & those that dwelt further off, should goe seeke their water in other places where they would. But if they had digged tenne yardes deepe in their grounde, and could finde no water in the bottome, in this case, they might lawfully goe to their next neighbours well, and take a pot full of water containing fix gallons, twise a daye: iudging it great reason that necessitie should be holpen, but not that idleness should be cherished. He appointed also the spaces that should be kept & obserued by those, that would set or plant trees in their grounde, as being a man very skillfull in these matters. For he ordeined, that whosoever would plante any kynde of trees in his grounde, he should set them fise foote a fonder one from another: but for the figge tree and olyue tree specially, that they should in any case be nine foote a fonder, because these two trees doe spread out their branches farre off, & they cannot stand neere other trees, but they must needs hurte them very much. For besides that they drawe away the fame that doth nourish the other trees, they cast also a certaine moisture & steame vpon them, that is very hurtefull & incōmodious. More he ordeined, that whosoever would digge a pytte or hole in his grounde, he should digge it as farre of from his neighbours pytt, as the pytte he digged was in depth to the bottome. And he that would set vp a hūe of bees in his grounde, he should set them at the least three hundred foote from other hūes set about him before. And of the fruites of the earth, he was contented they should transpore and sell only oyle out of the Realme to straungers, but no other fruitie or graine. He ordeined that the go-

A uermour of the cittie should yerey proclaim open curses against those that should doe to the contrarie, or els he him selfe making default therein, should be fined at a hundred drachmes. This ordinance is in the first table of Solon lawes, and therefore we maye not altogether discredit those which saye, they did forbid in the olde time that men should carie figges out of the countrie of Attica, and that from thence it came that these picke thanckes, which bewraye & accuse them that transported figges, were called Sycophantes. He made another lawe also against the hurte that beastes might doe vnto men. Vv herein he ordeined, that if a dogge did bite any man, he that ought him should deliuer to him that was bitten, his dogge tyed to a logge of timber of foure cubites longe: & this was a very good deuise, to make men safe from dogges. But he was very straight in one lawe he made, that no straunger might be made denizen and free man of the cittie of Athens, onles he were a banished man for euer out of his countrie, or els that he should come & dwell there with all his familie, to exercise some crafte or science. Notwithstanding, they saye he made not this lawe so much to put straungers from there freedome there, as to drawe them thither, assuring them by this ordinance, they might come and be free of the cittie: and he thought moreover, that both the one & the other would be more faithfull to the common weale of Athens. The one of them, for that against their willes they were driuen to forsake their countrie: & the other sorte, for that aduisedly and willingly they were contented to forsake it. This also was another of Solons lawes, which he ordeined for those that should feast certē dayes at the towne house of the cittie, at other mens cost. For he would not allow, that one man should come often to feasts there. And if any man were invited thither to the feast, and dyd refuse to come: he dyd set a fine on his head, as reprocuing the miserable nigardlines of the one, and the presumptuous arrogancy of the other, to containe & despise common order. After he had made his lawes, he dyd stablish them to continue for the space of one hundred yeres, and they were written in tables of wood called Axones, which were made more long then broade, in the which they were grauen: whereof there remaine some monuments yet in our time, which are to be seene in the towne hall of the cittie of Athens. Aristotle sayeth, that these tables were called Cyrbes. And Cratinus also the Comicall poet sayeth in one place, of Solon & Dracon: that Cyrbes was a vessell or panne wherein they dyd frye miller or hirse. Howbeit others saye, that Cyrbes properly were the tables, which contained the ordinances of the sacrifices: and Axones were the other tables, that concerned the common weale. So, all the counsels & magistrates together dyd sweare, that they would kepe Solons lawes them selues, & also cause them to be obserued of others, thoroughly & particularly. Then euery one of the Thesmothetes (which were certaine officers attendaunt on the counsell, & had speciall charge to see the lawes obserued) dyd solēly sweare in the open market place, neere the stone where the proclamations are proclaimed: and euery of them, both promised, & vowed openly to keepe the same lawes, & that if any of them dyd in any one pointe breake the said ordinances, then they were content that such offender should paye to the temple of Apollo, at the citie of Delphes, an image of fine golde, that should waye as much as him self. Moreover Solon seeing the disorder of the moneths, & the moouing of the moone, which followed not the course of the sunne, & vied not to rise & fall when the sunne doth, but oftentimes in one daye, it doth both touche & passe the sunne: he was the first that called the change of the moone, Ene cai néa, as much to saye, as olde and newe moone. Allowing that which appeared before the coniunction, to be of the moneth past: & that which shewed it self after the coniunction, to be of the moneth following. And he was the first also (in my opinion) that vnderstoode Homer rightly, when he sayed: then beginneth the moneth when it endeth. The day following the change, he called Neomenia, as much to saye, as the newe moneth, or the newe moone. After the twenty day of the moneth which they called Teada, he reckoned not the rest of the moneth, as increasing, but as in the wane: & gathered it by seeing the light of the moone decreasing vntill the thirtiē day. Now after his lawes were come abroad, & proclaimed, there came some daylie vnto him, which either praised them, or misliked them: & prayed him either to take awaye, or to adde some thing vnto them. Many againe came & asked him, howe he vnderstoode some sentēce of his lawes: & requested him to declare his meaning, & how it should be taken. Wherefore considering howe it were to no purpose to refuse to doe it, and againe howe it would get him much enuie & ill will to yelde thereunto: he determined (happen what would) to winde him selfe out of these bryars, and to flye the gronings, complaints, and quarrells of his citizens. For he sayeth him selfe:

Full harde it is, all mindes content to haue, and specially in matters harde and graue.

So, to conuey him selfe a while out of the waye, he tooke vpon him to be master of a shippe in a certaine voyage, and asked licence for tenne yerres of the ATHENIANS to goe beyond sea, hoping by that time the ATHENIANS would be very well acquainted with his lawes. So went he to the seas, & the first place of his arriuall was in EGYPT, where he remained a while, as he him selfe sayeth. Euen there where Nylus, with his crooked crankes by Canoe, fall's into the sea bankes.

He went to his booke there, and dyd contere a certaine time with Psenophis Heliopolitan, and Sonchis Saitan, two of the wisest priestes at that time that were in EGYPT: whom when he heard rehearse the storie of the lles ATLANTIDES as Plato writeth, he proued to put the same in verse, & dyd send it abroad through GREECE. At his departure out of EGYPT he went into CYPRUS, where he had great curtesy & friendship of one of the princes of that countrie, called Philocyprus, who was lorde of a pretty litle cittie which Demophon (Thefeus sonne) caused to be built vpon the riuier of Clarie, & was of a goodly strong situation, but in a very leane and barren countrie. Whereupō Solon tolde him, it would doe better a great deale to remoue it out of that place, into a very fayre & pleasaunt valley that laye vnderneath it, and there to make it larger & statelier then it was: which was done according to his perswasio. And Solon selfe being C present at it, was made ouerfeer of the buildings, which he dyd helpe to deuise and order in good sorte, as well in respect of pleafure, as for force and defence: inso much as many people came from other places to dwell there. And herein many other lordes of the countrie dyd followe the example of this Philocyprus, who to honour Solon, called his cittie SOLES, which before was called ÆPIA. Solon in his Elegies maketh mention of this foundation, directing his wordes vnto Philocyprus, as followeth.

So graunt the goddess, that thou, and shine off spring maye chyme to great, and passing princely state: long time to liue, in Soles florishing.

And that they graunt, my shippe and me good gate when I from hence, by seas shall take my voyaye: that with her harpe, dame Venus doe vouchsafe to waite me still, vntill she maye conueye my selfe againe, into my countrey safe.

*Since I haue bene, she only meane and man,

And as for the meeting & talke betwixt him & king Cræsus, I know there are that by distace of time will proue it but a fable, & deuised of pleasure: but for my parte I will not reiect, nor cōdemne so famous an historie, receiued & approued by so many graue testimonies. Moreouer it is very agreeable to Solons maners & nature, & also not vnlike to his wisdom & magnanimitie: E although in all pointes it agreeth not with certaine tables (which they call Chronicles) where they haue busily noted the order and course of times which euen to this daye, many haue curiously sought to correct, & could yet neuer discusse it, nor accorde all contraries & manifest repugnances in the same. Solon at the desire & request of Cræsus, went to see him in the cittie of SARDIS. When Solon was come thither, he seemed to be in the selfe same taking that a man was once reported to be: who being borne & bred vp on the mayne lande, & had neuer seene the sea neither farre nor neere, did imagine euery riuier that he sawe had bene the sea. So Solon passing alongest Cræsus palace, & meeting by the waye many of the lordes of his countrie richly apparelled, & carying great traines of seruing men, & souldiers about them: thought euer that one of them had bene the King, vntill he was brought vnto Cræsus selfe. Who was F passing richly arrayed, what for precious stones & iuells, & for riche culled silkes, layed on with curious goldsmithes worke, & all to shewe him selfe to Solon in most stately, sumptuous, & magni-

A magnificent manner. Who perceiuing by Solons repaire to his presence, that he shewed no manner of signe, nor countenance of wounding, to see lo great a state before him, neither had geuen out any word neere or likely to that which Cræsus looked for in his owne imagination; but rather had deliuered speeches for men of iudgement and vnderstanding to know, how inwardly he much did milke Cræsus foolish vanitie & bale minde: then Cræsus commaunded all his treasuries to be opened where his golde & siluer laye, next that they should shewe him his riche & sumptuous wardropes, although that needed not for to see Cræsus selfe, it was enough to discerne his nature & condition. After he had seene all ouer & ouer, being brought againe vnto the presence of the King: Cræsus asked him, if euer he had seene any mā more happy than him selfe was: Solon answered him, I haue: & that was one Tellus a citizen of ATHENS, who was

B a maruelous honest man, & had left his children behind him in good estimatio, & well to liue, & lastly, was most happy at his death, by dying honorably in the field, in defence of his countrie. Cræsus hearing this answer, beganne to iudge him a man of litle witte, or of grosse vnderstand- ing, bicause he did not thinke that to haue store of gold & siluer, was the only ioye & felicitie of the world, & that he would preferre the life & death of a meane & priuate man as more happy, than all the riches & power of so mightie a King. Notwithstanding all this, Cræsus yet asked him again: What other man beside Tellus he had seene happier than him selfe: Solon answered him, that he had seene Cleobis & Biton, which were both brethern, & loued one another singularly well, & their mother in such sorte: that vpon a solemne festiual daye, when the should goe to the temple of Iuno in her coche drawn with oxen: bicause they taried too long ere

C they could be brought, they both willingly yoked them selues by the necks, & dree their mothers coche in stead of the oxen, which maruelously reioyced her, and she was thought most happy of all other, to haue borne two such sonnes. Afterwards when they had done sacrifice to the goddesse, & made good cheere at the feast of this sacrifice, they went to bed: but they rose not againe the next morning, for they were found dead without suffering hurt or sorowe, after they had receyued so much glorie & honour. Cræsus then could no longer bridle in his patience, but breaking out in chollier, sayed vnto him: why, dost thou reckon me than in no degree of happy men? Solon would neither flatter him, nor further increase his heate, but answered him thus: O King of LYDIANS, the godds haue geue vS GRECIANS all things in a meane; & amongst other things chiefly, a bale & popular wisdom, not princely nor noble: which,

D considering howe mans life is subiect to infinite chaunges, doth forbid vs to trust or glorie in these worldly riches. For time bringeth daylie misfortunes vnto man, which he neuer thought of, nor looked for. But when the goddes haue continued a mans good fortune to his end, then we thinke that man happy and blessed, and neuer before. Otherwise, if we should iudge a man happy that liueth, considering he is euer in daunger of chaunge during life: we should be much like to him, who iudgeth him the victorie before hande, that is still a fighting, & maye be ouercomen, hauing no surtie yet to carie it away. After Solon had spoken these words, he departed from the Kings presence, and returned backe againe; leaving king Cræsus offended, but nothing the wiser, nor amended. Nowe Æsop that wrote the fables, being at that time in the cittie of SARDIS, & sent for thither by the King, who entertained him very honorably: was ve-

E ry forie to see that the King had geuen Solon no better entertainment: for by waye of aduise he said vnto him, O Solon, either we must not come to princes at all, or els we must seeke to please & content them. But Solon turning it to the contrary, answered him: either we must not come to princes, or we must needs tell them truly, & counsell them for the best. So Cræsus made light accompt of Solon at that time. But after he had lost the battell against Cyrus, and that his cittie was taken, him selfe became prisoner, & was bounde fast to a gibbet, ouer a great stacke of wood, to be burnt in the sight of all the PERSIANS, & of Cyrus his enemy: he then cried out as lowde as he could, thrise together. O Solon, Cyrus being abashed, sent to aske him, whether this Solon he only cried vpon in his extreme miserie, was a god or man. Cræsus kept it not secret from him, but sayed he was one of the wise men of GREECE, whom I sent for to come vnto me on a certaine time, not to learne any thing of him which I stood in need of; but only that he might witnesse my felicitie, which then I dyd enioye: the losse whereof is now more hurtfull, than the enioying of the same was good or profitable. know it, that the riches I possessed then, were but words & opinion, all which are turned now to my bitter sorrow, and to present and remediless calamities. Which the wife GREGIAN considering then, and foreseeing a fate of by my doings at that time, the instant miserie I suffer now: gaue me warning I should make the end of my life, and that I should not to farre presume of my selfe, as puffed vp then with vaine glorie of opinion of happines, the ground thereof being so slippery, and of so little surtie. These wordes being reported vnto CYTUS, who was wiser than Craſus, & seeing Solons saying confirmed by so notable an example: he dyd not only deliuer Craſus from present perill of death, but euer after honoured him so long as he liued. Thus had Solon glorie, for sauing the honour of one of these Kings: & the life of the other, by his graue & wise counsaill. But during the time of his absence, great seditions rose at ATHENS amongst the inhabitants, who had gotten them severall heades amongst them: as those of B the vallie had made Lycurgus their head. The coast men, Megacles, the sonne of Alcemon. And those of the mountaines, Pisistratus: with whom all artificers & craftsmen living of their händ labour were ioynd, which were the flowtest against the riche. So that notwithstanding the citie kept Solons lawes and ordinaunces, yet was there not that man but gaped for a change, and desired to see things in another state: either parties hoping their condition would mende by chaunge, and that euery of them should be better than their aduersaries. The whole common weale broyling thus with troubles, Solon arrived at ATHENS, where euery mā did honour and reuerence him, howbeit he was no more able to speake alowde in open assembly to the people, nor to deale in matters as he had done before, because his age would not suffer him: & therefore he spake with euery one of the heades of the severall factions a parte, trying if he could agree and reconcile them together againe. Whereunto Pisistratus seemed to be more willing then any of the rest, for he was courteous, and maruelous fayer spoken, and shewed him selfe besides, very good and pittiefull to the poore, and temperate also to his enemies: further, if any good quality were lacking in him, he dyd so finely counterfeite it, that men imagined it was more in him, than in those that naturally had it in them in deede. As to be a quiet man, no medler, contented with his owne, aspiring no higher, and hating those which would attempt to chaunge the present state of the common weale, and would practise any innouation. By this arte and fine manner of his, he deceyued the poore common people. Howbeit Solon found him straight, and sawe the marke he shot at: but yet hated him not at that time, and fought still to winne him, and bring him to reason, saying oftentimes, both to him selfe, and to others. That who so could plucke out of his head the worme of ambition, by which he aspired to be the chiefeſt, and could heale him of his greedy desire to rule: there could not be a man of more vertue, or a better citizen than he would proue. About this time began Theſpis to set out his tragedies, which was a thing that much delighted the people for the rarenes thereof, being not many poets yet in number, to strue one against another for victorie, as afterwards there were. Solon being naturally desirous to heare and learne, and by reason of his age seeking to passe his time awaye in sportes, in musick, & making good cheere more then euer he dyd: went one daye to see Theſpis, who played a parte him selfe, as the olde facion of the Poets was, and after the playe was ended, he called him to him, and asked him: if he were not ashamed to lye so openly in the face of the worlde. Theſpis answered him, that it was not materiall to doe or saye any such things, considering all was but in sporte. Then Solon beating the grounde with his staffe he had in his hande: but if we commend lying in sporte (& he) we shall finde it afterwards in good earnest, in all our bargaines & dealings. Shortly after Pisistratus hauing wounded him selfe, and bloudied all his bodie ouer, caused his men to carie him in his coche into the market place, where he put the people in an vtper, & tolde them that they were his enemies that thus traitorously had hādled & arraigned him, for that he stood with them about the gouerning of the cōmon weale: inso much as many of the were maruelously offended, & mutined by & by, crying out it was shamefully done. Then Solon drawing neere sayed vnto him, O thou sonne of Hippocrates, thou doest ill fauoredly counterfeite the persone of Homers Vlyſſes: for thou hast whipped thy self to deceiue thy citizeis, as he did teare & scratch him self to deceiue his F enemies. Notwithstanding this, the common people were still in vtper, being ready to take armes for Pisistratus: and there was a generall counsell assembled, in the which one Ariston spake,

A spake, that they should graunte fiftie men, to cary holberds and mafes before Pisistratus for garde of his persone. But Solon going vp into the pulpit for orations, flowtely inuayed against it: and perswaded the people with many reasons, like vnto these he wrote afterwards in verse.

Each one of you (6 men) in private attes, can playe the foxe, for slye and subtil craft: But when you come, yf ore (in all your factes) then are you blinde, dull witted and bedast.
For pleasant speache, and painted flatterie, beguile you still, the which you neuer slye.

But in the ende, seeing the poore people dyd tumult still, taking Pisistratus parte, and that the riche fled there and there, he went his waye all so, saying: he had shewed him selfe wiser than some, and hardier than other. Meaning, wiser than those which sawe not Pisistratus reache and letche: and hardier than they which knewe very well he dyd aspire to be King, and yet neuertheles durst not resist him. The people went on with the motion of Ariston, and authorized the same, touching the graunte of halberders: limiting no number, but suffered him to haue about him and to assemble, as many as he would, vntill such time, as he had gotten possession of the castell. Then the citie was maruelously affrayed and amazed: and presently Megacles, and all those which were of the house of the Alcemonides dyd slye Solon, who for yeares was now at his last cast, and had no man to sticke vnto him: went notwithstanding into the market place, and spake to the citizeis whom he found there, and rebuked their beastliness, and sayne cowardly hartes, and encouraged them not to lose their libertie. He spake at that time notably, and worthie memorie, which euer after was remembered. Before sayed he; you might more easely haue stayed this present tyrannie: but now that it is already facioned, you shall winne more glorie, vtterly to suppress it. But for all his goodly reasons, he found no man that would hearken to him, they were all so amazed. Wherefore he hid him home againe, and tooke his weapons out of his house, and layed them before his gate in the middest of the streete, saying. For my parte, I haue done what I can possibly, to helpe and defend the lawes and liberties of my cōuntry. So from that time he beneuole him selfe vnto his ease, and neuer after delt any more in matters of state, or common weale. His friends dyd counsell him to slye: but all they could not perswade him to it. For he kept his house, and gaue him selfe D to make verses: in which he fore reproued the ATHENIANS faults, laying:

rie & conscience.

If presently, your burden heavy be:
yet murmur not against the gods therefore.
The fault is yours, as you your selues may see, which graunted haue of mightie mars the lore, to such as noure, by your direction doe holde your necks, in this subiection.

His friends hereupon dyd warne him, to beware of such speaches, and to take hede what he sayed: least if it came vnto the tyrannes eares, he might put him to death for it. And further, they asked him wherein he trusted, that he spake so boldly. He answered them, in my age. E Howbeit Pisistratus after he had obtained his purpose, sending for him vpon his worde and faith, dyd honour and entertaine him so well, that Solon in the ende became one of his counsaill, and approued many things which he dyd. For Pisistratus him selfe dyd straightly keepe, and caused his friends to keepe Solons lawes. Inso much as when he was called by proces into the court of the Arepagites for a murder, euen at that time when he was a tyrant: he presented him selfe very modestly to aunswer his accusation, and to purge him selfe thereof. But his accuser let fall the matter, and followed it no further. Pisistratus him selfe also dyd make newe lawes: as this. That he that had bene maymed, and made lame of any member in the warres, (should be maintained all his life long, at the common charges of the citie. The selfe same was before decreed by Thersippus (as Heraclides writeth) by Solons persuation: who dyd F ferre it to the counsell. Pisistratus afterwards tooke holde of the motion, and from thence forth made it a generall lawe. Theophrastus sayeth also, it was Pisistratus, and not Solon, that made the lawe for idlenes: which was the only cause that the countrie of ATTICA became A more fruitefull, being better manured: and the cittie of ATHENS waxed more quiet. But Solon hauing begonne to write the storie of the Iles ATLANTIDES in verse (which he had learned of the wise men of the cittie of SAIS in EGYPT, and was very necessary for the ATHENIANS) grewe weariye, and gaue it ouer in mid waye: not for any matters or busines that troubled him, as Plato sayed, but only for his age, and bicause he feared the tediousnes of the worke. For otherwife he had leysure enough, as appeareth by his verses where he sayeth:

I growe olde, and yet I learne still.

And in another place where he sayeth,

*Norue Venus yeldes me foruete delights, and Bacchus lends me comfort still:
the muses eke yefreshe my brightnes, and much relieue my vveariy will.*

These be the pointes of perfect ease, which all mens mindes of times doe please.

Plato afterwards for beawtifying of the storie and fables of the Iles ATLANTIDES, was desirous to dilate them out at length, as if he would by waye of speache haue broken vp a field or layelande of his owne, or that this giste had descended to him of right from Solon. He beganne to raise vp a stately fronte vnto the same, and enclosed it with high walles, and large squared courtes at the entrie thereof: such was it, as neuer any other worke, fable, or poetical inuention had euer so notable, or the like. But bicause he beganne a litle to late, he ended his life before his worke, leauing the readers more sorowfull for that was left vnwritten, than they tooke pleasure in that they founde written. For euen as in the cittie of ATHENS, the temple of Jupiter Olympian only remained vnperfect: so the wisdom of Plato (amongest many goodly matters of his that haue come abroad) left none of them vnperfect, but the only tale of the Iles ATLANTIDES. Solon liued long time after Pisistratus had vsurped the tyrannie, as Heracles Ponticus writeth. Howbeit Phanias Ephesian writeth, that he liued not aboue two yeres after. For Pisistratus vsurped tyrannicall power in the yere that Comius was chief gouernour in ATHENS. And Phanias writeth, that Solon dyed in the yere that Hegesistratus was gouernour, which was the next yere after that. And where some saye, the ashes of his bodie were after his death strawed abroad through the Ile of SALAMINA: that seemeth to be but a fable, and altogether vntrue. Neuertheles it hath bene written by many notable authors, and amongst others, by Aristotle the philosopher.

The ende of Solons life.

Valerius Publicola.

NO WE haue declared what Solon was, we haue thought good to compare him with Publicola, to whom the ROMAINS people for an honour gaue that surname: for he was called before Publius Valerius, The house of P. Valerius: descended from that auncient Valerius, who was one of the chiefeft workers and meanes, to bring the ROMAINS and the SABYNES that were mortall enemies, to ioyne together as one people. For it was he that most moued the two Kings to agree, and ioyne together. Publicola being descended of him, whilest the Kings dyd rule yet at ROME, was in very great estimation, as well for his eloquence, as for his riches: vsing the one rightly and freely, for the maintenaunce of iustice, and the other liberally and curteously, for the relief of the poore. So that it was manifest, if the Realme came to be conuerted into a publicke state, he should be one of the chiefeft men of the same. It chaunced that king Tarquine furnished the provde, being come to the crowne by no good lawfull meane, but contrarylie by indirect and wicked wayes, and behauing him selfe not like a King, but like a cruell tyrant: the people much hated and detested him, by reason of the death of Lucretia (which killed her selfe for that he was forcibly rauished by him) & so the whole cittie rose and rebelled against him. Lucius Brutus taking vpon him to be the head and captaine of this insurrection and rebellion, dyd ioyne first with this Valerius: who dyd greatly fauour and assist his enterpryse, and did helpe him to driue out king Tarquine with all his house & familie. Nowe whilest they were thinking that the people would chuse some one alone to be chief ruler ouer them, in stead of a King: Valerius kept him selfe quiet, as yielding willingly vnto Brutus the first place, who was meetest for it, hauing bene the chief authour and worcker of their recovered libertie. But when they sawe the name of Monarchie (as much to saye, as fouerantie alone) was displeasaut to the people, and that they would like better to haue the rule deuided vnto two, and how for this cause they would rather choose two Consuls: Valerius then began to hope, he should be the seconde person with Brutus. Howbeit this hope fayled him. For against Brutus will, Tarquinius Collatinus (the husband of Lucretia) was chosen Consul with him: not bicause he was a man of greater vertue, or of better estimation than Valerius. But the noble men of the citie fearing the practises of the Kings abroad, which fought by all the fayer & flattering meanes they could to returne againe into the citie: dyd determine to make such an one Consul, whom occasion forced to be their hard and heauy enemy, perswading them felues that Tarquinius Collatinus would for no respect yeld vnto them. Valerius tooke this matter greuouly, but they had a mistrust in him, as if he would not doe any thing he could, for the benefit of his countrie: notwithstanding he had neuer any priuate iniurie offered him by the tyrannes. Wherefore, he repaired no more vnto the Senate to pleade for priuate men, and wholly gaue vp to medle in matters of state: inso much as he gaue many occasion to thincke of his absence, and it troubled some men much, who feared least vpon this his misliking and withdrawing, he would fall to the Kings side, and so bring all the citie in an vpror, considering it stood then but in very tickle termes. But when Brutus, who stood in iealousie of some, would by othe be assured of the Senate, & had appointed them a daye solemnely to take their othes vpon the sacrifices: Valerius then with a good cheerefull countenance came into the market place, and was the first that tooke his othe he would leaue nothing vndone, that might preiudice the Tarquines, but with all his able power he would fight against them, and defend the libertie of the citie. This othe of his maruelously reioyced the Senate, & gaue great assurance also to the Consuls, but specially, because his dedes dyd shortly after performe his wordes. For there came ambassadours to Rome which brought letters from king Tarquine, full of siveete & lowly speeches to winne the fauour of the people, with commission to vie all the mildest meanes they could, to dulce and soften the hardened hartes of the multitude: who declared how the King had left all pryde and crueltie, & ment to aske nought but reasonable things. The Consuls thought best to geue them open audience, and to suffer them to speake to the people. But Valerius was against it, declaring it might perill the state much, and deliuer occasion of new sturre vnto a multitude of poore people, which were more affrayed of warres, then of tyrannie. After that, there came other ambassadours also, which sayed that Tarquine would from thenceforth for euer geue ouer and renounce his title to the Kingdome, and to make any more warres, but besought them only, that they would at the least deliuer him and his friends their money and goods, that they might haue wherewithall to keepe them in their banishment. Many came on a pace, and were very ready to yeld to this request, and specially Collatinus, one of the Consuls who dyd fauour their motion. But Brutus that was a fast and resolute man, and very fierce in his harte, ranne immediately into the market place, crying out that his fellowe Consul was a traytour, and contented to graunt the tyrannes matter, and meanes to make warre vpon the citie, where in deede they deserued not so much, as to be relieved in their exile. Hereupon the people assembled together, and the first that spake in this assembly, was a priuate man called Gaius Minutius, who speaking vnto Brutus, & to the whole assembly, sayed vnto them. O noble Consul & Senate, handle so the matter, that the tyrannes goods be rather in your custodie to make warre with them, than in theirs, to bring warre vpon your felues. Notwithstading, the ROMAINES were of opinion, that hauing gotten the liberty, for which they fought with the tyrannes: they should not disapioint the offered peace, with keeping backe their goodes, but rather they should throwe their goods out after them. Howbeit this was the least parte of Tarquines intent, to seeke his goodes againe: but vnder pretence of that demand, he secretly corrupted the people, and practised treason, which his ambassadours followed, pretending only to get the Kings goodes and his fauourers together, sayng, that they had already solde some parte, and some parte they kept, and sent them daylie. So as by delaying the time in this sorte with such pretences, they had corrupted two of the best and auncientest houses of the citie: to wit, the familie of the Aquilians, whereof there were three Senatours: and the familie of the Vitellians, whereof there were two Senatours: all which by their mothers, were Consul Collatinus nephewes. The Vitellians also were allied vnto Brutus, for he had married their owne sister, & had many children by her. Of the which the Vitellians had drawn to their stringe, two of the eldest of them, because they familiarly frequented together, being cosin germanes: whom they had intited to be of their conspiracie, allyng them with the house of the Tarquines, which was of great power, and through the which they might perswade them felues to rise to great honour & preferment by meanes of the Kings, rather than to trust

A to trust to their fathers willfull hardnes. For they called his seueritie to the wicked, hardnes for that he would neuer pardon any. Furthermore Brutus had sayned him selfe mad, and a foole of long time for safety of his life, because the tyrannes should not put him to death: so that the name of Brutus only remained. After these two young men had geuen their consent to be of the confederacie, and had spoken with the Aquilians: they all thought good to be bounde one to another, with a great and horrible othe, drincking the bloude of a man, and shaking hands in his bowells, whom they would sacrifice. This matter agreed vpon betwene them, they met together to put their sacrifice in execution, in the house of the Aquilians. They had firely pickt out a darcke place in the house to doe this sacrifice in, & where almost no bodie came: yet it happened by chaunce, that one of the seruants of the house called Vindicius, had hidden him selfe there, vnknowing to the traytours, and of no set purpose, to spye and see what they dyd, or that he had any manner of inkling thereof before: but falling by chaunce vpon the matter, euen as the traytours came into that place with a countenance to doe some secret thing of importunance, fearing to be seene, he kept him selfe close, and laye behinde a coffer that was there, so that he sawe all that was done, and what they sayed and determined. The conclusion of their counsell in the ende was this, that they would kill both the Consuls: and they wrote letters to Tarquinius aduertising the same, which they gaue vnto his ambassadours, being lodged in the house of the Aquilians, & were present at this conclusion. With this determination they departed from thence, and Vindicius came out also as secretly as he could, being maruelously troubled in minde, & at a maze howe to deale in this matter.

C For he thought it dangerous (as it was in deede) to goe and accuse the two sonnes vnto the father (which was Brutus) of so wicked and detestable a treason, and the nephewes vnto their vncle, which was Collatinus. On the other side also, he thought this was a secret, not to be imparted to any priuate persone, and not possible for him to conceale it, that was bounde in duety to reueale it. So he resolu'd at the last to goe to Valerius to bewraye this treason, of a speciall affection to this man, by reason of his gentle and courteous vsing of men, geuing easy acceffe and audience vnto any that came to speake with him, and specially for that he disdain'd not to heare poore mens causes. Vindicius being gone to speake with him, and hauing tolde him the whole conspiracy before his brother Marcus Valerius, and his wife, he was abashed and fearefull withall: whereupon he stayed him least he should slippe awaye, and locked him in a chamber, charging his wife to watche the doore, that no bodie went in nor out vnto him. And willed his brother also, that he should goe and beset the Kings palace round about, to intercept these letters if it were possible, and to see that none of their seruants fled. Valerius selfe being followed (according to his manner) with a great traine of his friendes and people that wayted on him, went straight vnto the house of the Aquilians, who by chaunce were from home at that time: and entring in at the gate, without let or trouble of any man, he founde the letters in the chamber, where king Tarquines ambassadours laye. Whilest he was thus occupied, the Aquilians hauing intelligence thereof, ranne home immediately, and founde Valerius coming out at their gate. So they would haue taken those letters from him by force, and strong hande. But Valerius and his company dyd resist them, and moreouer huddled them with their gownes ouer their heads, and by force brought them (doe what they could) into the market place. The like was done also in the Kings palace, where Marcus Valerius founde other letters alio wrapt vp in certaine fardells for their more safe cariage, and brought away with him by force into the market place, all the Kings seruants he founde there. There the Consuls hauing caused silence to be made, Valerius sent home to his house for this bond-man Vindicius, to be brought before the Consuls: then the traytours were openly accused, and their letters redde, and they had not the face to answer one worde. All that were present, being amazed, honged downe their heades, and behelde the grounde, and not a man durst once open his mouth to speake, excepting a fewe, who to grauise Brutus, beganne to say that they should banish them: and Collatinus also gaue them some hope, because he fell to weeping.

F and Valerius in like manner for that he held his peace. But Brutus calling his sonnes by their names: come on (sayed he) Titus, and thou Valerius, why doe you not answer to that you are accused of? and hauing spoken thrifye vnto them to answer, when he sawe they stood mute, and sayd nothing: he turned him to the sergeants, and sayd vnto them. They are now A in your hands, doe iustice. So soone as he had spoken these wordes, the sergeants layd holde immediately vpon the two young men, and tearing their clothes of their backs, bounde their hands behinde them, and then whipped them with rodde: which was such a pittiefull fight to all the people, that they could not finde in their hartes to behold it, but turned them selues another waye, because they would not see it. But contrariwise, they saye that their owne father had neuer his eye of them, neither dyd chaunge his austere and fierce countenance, with any pittie or naturall affection towards them, but stedfastly dyd beholde the punishment of his owne children, vntill they were layd flat on the grounde, and both their heads stricken of with an axe before him. When they were executed, Brutus rose from the benche, and left the execution of the rest vnto his fellowe Consul. This was such an acte, as men cannot sufficiently praise, nor reprove enough. For either it was his excellent vertue, that made his minde so quiet, or els the greatnes of his miserie that rooke awaye the feeling of his sorowe: whereof neither the one nor the other was any small matter, but passing the common nature of man, that hath in it both diuinenes, and sometime beastly brutishnes. But it is better the iudgement of men should commend his fame, then that the affection of men by their iudgements should diminish his vertue. For the Romaines holde opinion, it was not so great an acte done of Romulus first to build Rome: as it was for Brutus to recouer Rome, and the best libertie thereof, and to renewe the auncient gouernment of the same. When Brutus was gone, all the people in the market place remained as they had bene in a maze, full of feare and wonder, and a great while without speaking to see what was done. The Aquilians straight grew bold, C for that they sawe the other Consul Collatinus proceede gently, and mildly against them: and so made petition they might haue time geuen them to answer to the articles they were accused of, and that they might haue their slaue and bondman Vindicius deliuered into their hands, because there was no reason he should remaine with their accusers. The Consul seemed willing to yeld thereto, and was ready to breake vp the assembly thereupon. But Valerius sayd, he would not deliuer Vindicius (who was among the assembly that attended vpon his person) and stayed the people besides for departing awaye, least they should negligently let those escape that had so wickedly sought to betraye their countrie. Vntill he him selfe had layd hands vpon them, calling vpon Brutus to assist him, with open exclamation against Collatinus, that he dyd not behaue him selfe like a iust and true man, seeing his fellowe Brutus D was forced for iustice sake to see his owne sonnes put to death: and he in contrary manner, to please a fewe women, sought to let goe manifest traitours, and open enemies to their coun-trie. The Consul being offended herewith, commaunded they should bring awaye the bond-man Vindicius. So the sergeants making waye through the prease, layd hands vpon him to bring him awaye with them, and beganne to strike at them which offered to resist them. But Valerius friends stept out before them, and put them by. The people shewt straight, & cried out for Brutus: who with this noyse returned againe into the market place, and after silence made him, he spake in this wise. For mine own children, I alone haue bene their iusticiud, to see them haue the law according to their deservings: the rest I haue left freely to the iud-gment of the people. Wherefore (sayd he) if any man be disposed to speake, let him stand E vp, and persuaide the people as he thinketh best. Then there needed no more wordes, but only to hearken what the people cried: who with one voyce & consent condemned them, & cried execution, & accordingly they had their heades stricken of. Now was Consul Collatinus long before had in some suspicion, as allied to the Kings, and disliked for his surname, because he was called Tarquinius: who perceyving him selfe in this case much hated and mistrusted of the people, voluntarily yelded vp his Consulshippe, and departed the citie. The people assembling then them selues, to place a successour in his roome: they chose Valerius in his roome, without the contradiction of any, for his faithfull traillaill and diligence bestowed in this great matter. Then Valerius iudging that Vindicius the bondman had well deserved al-some recompence, caused him not only to be manumitted by the whole graunte of the people, F but made him a free man of the citie besides: and he was the first bondman manumitted, that was made citizen of Rome, with permission also to geue his voyce in all elections of officers,

A in any company or tribe he would be enrolled in. Long time after that, and very lately, Appius to currie fauour with the common people, made it lawfull for bondmen manumitted, to geue their voyces also in elections, as other citizens dyd: and vnto this daye the perfect manumifing and freeing of bondmen, is called Vindicta, after the name of this Vindicius, that was then made a free man. These things thus passed ouer, & the goodes of the Kings were geuen to the spoyle of the people, and their palaces were rased and ouerthrowen. Nowe amongst other lands, the goodliest parte of the field of Mars was belonging vnto king Tarquinius: the same they consecrated forthwith vnto the god Mars, & not long before they had cut downe the wheat thereof. The sheaues being yet in shocks in the field, they thought they might not grinde the wheate, nor make any commoditie of the profit thereof: wherefore they threwe both corne & B sheaues into the riuier, & trees also which they had hewen downe & rooted vp, to the end that the field being dedicated to the god Mars, should be left bare, without bearing any fruite at all. These sheaues thus throwe into the riuier, were caried down by the streame not farre from thence, vnto a forde and shallowe place of the water, where they first dyd staye, and dyd let the other which came after, that it could goe no further: there these heapes gathered together, and laye so close one to another, that they beganne to sincke and settle fast in the water.
Afterwards the streame of the riuier brought downe continually such mudde & grauell, that it euer increased the heape of corne more and more in suche sorte, that the force of the water could no more remoue it from thence, but rather softly pressing and driuing it together, dyd firme and harden it, and made it growe so to lande. Thus the heape rising still in greatnes and C firmenes, by reason that all that came downe the riuier there, it grew in the ende, and by time to spread so farre, that at this daye it is called Truiculus in Rome: in which are many goodly temples of diuers goddesses, and sundry walks about it, and they call it in Latine, Inter duos pontes: in our tongue, betwene the two bridges. Yet some write, that this thing fell not out at that time when the field of the Tarquines was consecrated vnto Mars: but that it happened afterwarde, when one of the Veitall Nunnes, called Tarquinius, gaue a field of hers vnto the people, which was hard adioyning vnto Tarquines field. For which liberalitye and bounty of hers, they dyd graunte her in recompence many priuiledges, and dyd her great honour besides. As amongst others, it was ordeined, that her word & wimes should stand good, & be allowed, in matters iudiciall: which priuiledge, neuer woman besides her self dyd enioye.
D By speciall grace of the people also, it was graunted her, that she might marie if she thought it good: but yet she would not accept the benefit of that offer. Thus you heare the reporte how this thing happened. Tarquinius then being past hope of euer entering into his Kingdome again, went yet vnto the Thyrcans for succour, which were very glad of him: and so they leaued a great armie together, hoping to haue put him in his Kingdome againe. The Consuls also hearing thereof, went out with their armie against him. Both the armies presented them selues in battell raye, one against another, in the holy places consecrated to the goddesses: wheof the one was called the wodde Ardea, and the other the meadowe Aesimia. And as both armies beganne to geue charge vpon eche other, Arms the eldest sonne of king Tarquinius, and the Consul Brutus encountered together, not by chaunce, but sought for of set purpose to exe-E cute the deadly fode and malice they dyd beare eache other. The one, as against a tyrant and enemie of the libertie of his countrie: the other, as against him that had bene chief author & worker of their exile and expulsion. So they set spurres to their horses, so soone as they had spied eche other, with more fury then reason, and fought so desperately together, that they both fell starke dead to the ground. The first onfet of the battell being so cruell, the end thereof was no lesse bloody: vntill both the armies hauing receyued and done like damage to eche other, were parted by a maruelous great tempest that fell vpon them. Nowe was Valerius marueulously perplexed, for that he knewe not which of them wanne the field that daye: seeing his souldiers as scrowfull for the great losse of their men lying dead before them, as they were glad of the slaughter and victorie of their enemies. For, to viewe the multitude of the slaine F bodies of either side, the number was so equal in fight, that it was very hard to iudge, of which side fell out the greatest slaughter: so that both the one and the other viewing by the eye the remainie of their campe, were persuaied in their opinion, that they had rather lost then wone, coniecturing a farre of the fall of their enemies. The night being come, such things fell out as A may be looked for after so terrible a battell. For when both camps were all layed to rest, they saye the wodde wherein they laye incamped, quaked and trembled: and they heard a voyce saye, that onely one man more was slaine on the THYSCANS side, than on the ROMAINES parte. Out of doubt this was some voyce fro heauen: for the ROMAINES thereupon gaue a shrill shout, as those whose hartes receyued a newe quickening spirite or corage. The THYSCANS on the contrarie parte were so affrayed, that the most parte of them stole out of the campe, & & scattered here and there: & there remained behind about the number of fise thousand men, whom the ROMAINES tooke prisoners every one, and had the spoile of their campe. The car-kasses were viewed afterwards, & they found that there were slaine in that battell, eleuen thousand and three hundred of the THYSCANS: and of the ROMAINES, so many sauing one. This battell was fought (as they saye) the last daye of Februarie, and the Consul Valerius triumphed, being the first of the Consuls that euer entered into ROME triumphing vpon a charret drawn with foure horses, which sight the people found honorable & goodly to beholde, & were not offended withall (as some seeme to reporte) nor yet dyd enuy him for that he beganne it. For if it had bene so, that custome had not bene followed with so good acceptatio, nor had continued to many yerres as it dyd afterwards. They much commended also the honour he dyd to his fellowe Consul Brutus, in setting out his funerall & obsequies, at the which he made a funerall oration in his praise. They did so like & please the ROMAINES, that they haue euer since continued that custome at the buriall of any noble man, or great personage, that he is openly praised at his buriall, by the worthiest man that lieth among them. They reporte this funerall oration is farre more auncient then the first, that was made in GRECE in the like cases: onles they will confirme that which the orator Anaximenes hath written, that the manner of praising the dead at their funeralls, was first of all intromitted by Solon. But they dyd most enuy Valerius, and beare him grudge, because Brutus (whom the people did acknowledge for father of their liber-tie) would neuer be alone in office, but had procured twise, that they should appoint Valerius fellowe Consul with him. This man in contrariwise (saye the people) taking vpon him alone the rule & soueraintie, sheweth plainly he will not be Brutus successor in his Consulshipp, but Tarquinius self in the Kingdome. For to great purpose was it to praise Brutus in wordes, & to followe Tarquinius in deedes: hauing borne before him selfe only all the mafes, the axes and the roddes, when he cometh abroad out of his owne house, which is farre greater, and more D stately, then the Kings palace which he him self ouerthrowe. And to saye truly, Valerius dwelt in a house a litle to sumptuously build & seated, vpon the hāging of the hill called mount Velia: & because it stood highe, it ouerlooked all the market place, so that any man might easily see from thence what was done there. Furthermore, it was very ill to come to it: but when he came out of his house, it was a maruelous pompe and state to see him come downe from so highe a place, & with a traine after him, that caried the maiestie of a Kings courte. But herein

ling weighty causes, to haue his eares open to heare, and willingly to receyue free speache in steade of flatteries, & playne trothe in place of lyes. For, being enformed by some of his friēds how the people misliked & complained of it, he stood not in his owne conceit, neither was E angrie with them: but forthwith fet a worlde of workmen vpon it, early in the morning before breake of daye, & comāunded them to plucke down his house, & to raise it to the ground.
Insomuch as the next day following, whē the ROMAINES were gathered together in the market place, & sawe this great sodaine ruine, they much commended the noble acte & minde of Valerius, in doing that he dyd: but so were they angrie, and forie both, to see so fayer and stately a buylt house (which was an ornament to the citie) ouerthrowen vpon a sodaine. Much like in comparisō to a man, whom through spite and enuie they had vniuſtly put to death: and to see their chief magistrate also like a stranger and a vacabonde, compelled to seeke his lodging in another mans house. For his friends receyued him into their houses, vntill such time as the people had geuen him a place, where they dyd build him a newe house, farre F more orderly, and nothing so stately and curious as the first was, and it was in the same place, where the temple called Vicus Publicus standeth at this daye. Now because he would not only reforme

A reforme his persone, but the office of his Consulshipp, & also would frame him selfe to the good acceptance and liking of the people: where before he seemed vnto them to be fearefull, he put awaye the carying of the axes from the roddes, which the sergeants vsed to beare before the Consul. Moreover when he came into the market place, where the people were assembled, he caused the roddes to be borne downewards, as in token of reuerence of the soueraigne maiestie of the people: which all the magistrates obserue yet at this daye. Nowe in all this humble shewe and lowlines of his, he dyd not so much imbase his dignitie and greatnes, which the common people thought him to haue at the first: as he dyd thereby cut of enuie from him, winning againe as much true authoritie, as in semblance he would seeme to haue lost. For this made the people willing to obey, and readier to submit them B selues vnto him: in somuch as vpon this occasion he was surnamed Publicola, as much to saye, as the people pleaser. Which surname he kept euer after, and we from henceforth also writ-ting the rest of his life, will vse no other name: for he was contented to suffer any man that would, to offer him selfe to aske the Consulshipp in Brutus place. But he yet not knowing what kynde of man they would ioine fellowe Consul with him, and fearing least through enuie or ignorance, the party might thwart his purpose and meaning: employed his sole power and authoritie whilst he ruled alone, vpon highe and noble attempts. For first of all he supplied vnto the number of Senators that were greatly decayed, because king Tarquinius had put some of them to death not long before, and other also had bene lately slaine in the warres: in whose places he had chosen newe Senatours, to the number of a hundred three C score and foure. After that, he made newe decrees and lawes, which greatly dyd aduance the authoritie of the people. The first lawe gaue libertie to all offenders, condemned by iudge-ment of the Consuls, to appeale vnto the people. The second, that no man vpon payne of death should take vpon him the exercise of any office, vnles he had come vnto it by the gifte of the people. The third was, and all in fauour of the poore, that the poore citizens of ROME should paye no more custome, nor any impost whatsoever. This made every man the more willing to geue him selfe to some craft or occupation, when he sawe his trauaill should not be taxed, nor taken from him. As for the law that he made against those that disobeyed the Consuls, it was founde to be so fauorable to the communaltie, as they thought it was rather made for the poore, than for the riche & great men. For the offenders & breakers of that lawe, were con-D demned to paye for a penaltie, the value of fise oxen, and two muttons. The price of a mutton was then, tenne oboles, and of an ox, a hundred oboles. For in those dayes, the ROMAINES had no store of coined mony, otherwise, they lacked no sheepe, nor other rother beaſts. Hereof it came, that to this daye they call their riches or substance, Peculium, because Pecus signifieth sheepe and muttons. And in the olde time the stampe vpon their money was an ox, & a mutton, or a hogge: & some of them called their children Bubulci, which signifieth cowheards: others Caprarij, to saye goateheards: and others Porchj, as you would saye, swineheards. Nowe though in all his other lawes, he was very fauorable & temperate toward the people: yet in that moderation, sometimes he dyd set grieuous paynes & punishments. For he made it law-full to kill any man without any accusation, that dyd aspire to the Kingdome, & he dyd let the E murderer free of all punishment: so he brought forth manifest prooffe, that the party slaine, had practised to make him selfe King. As being impossible a man should pretend to greata matter, and no man should finde it: and contrariwise being possible, albeit he were spied, that otherwise he might attempt it, by making him selfe so strong, that he needed not passe for the law. In this case he gaue every man libertie by such acte or meane, to prevent him if he could of discretion: who by strength otherwise sought to aspire to reigne. They greatly commended him also for the lawe that he made touching the treasure. For being very necessarie that euerie priuate citizen should according to his abilitie, be contributor to the charges and maintenance of the warres: he him self would neither take such collection into his charge, nor suffer any man of his to medle with the same, nor yet that it should be layed in any priuate F mans house, but he dyd ordeine that Saturnes temple should be the treasure thereof. This order they keepe to this present daye. Furthermore, he graunted the people to chuse two young men Questores of the same, as you would saye the treasurers, to take the charge of this money:

and the two firſt which were choſen, were Publius Venerius, and Marcus Minimius, who gathered great ſummes of money together. For numbring the people by the polle, there were found a hundred and thirtie thouſand perſones which had payed ſubſidie, not reckoning in this accompt, orphanes, nor widowes, which were excepted from all payments. After he had eſtabliſhed all theſe things, he cauſed Lucretius (the father of Lucretia) to be choſen fellowe Conſul with him, vnto whom, for that he was his auncient, he gaue the vpper hande, and commaunded they ſhould carie before him the roddeſ, which were the ſignes of the chief magiſtrate: and euer ſince they haue geuen this honour vnto age. But Lucretius dying not long after his election, they choſe againe in his place Marcus Horatiuſe, who held out the Conſulſhippe with Publicola the reſt of the yere. Nowe about that time king Tarquine remained in the cōitrie of Thyſcane, where he prepared a ſecōde armie againſt the Romaines, & there fell out a marvelous ſtraunge thing thereupon. For when he raigned king of Rome, he had almoſt made an ende of the building of the temple of Iupiter Capitolin, and was determined (whether by any oracle receyued, or vpon any fantaſy it is not knowne) to ſet vp a coche of earth baked by a potter, in the higheſt place of the temple, and he put it out to be done by certaine Thyſcan workemen of the citie of Vebes: but whileſt they were in hand with the worcke, he was driuen out of his Realme. When the workemen had formed this coche, and that they had put it into the founnes to bake it, it fell out contrarie to the nature of the earth, and the common order of their worcke put into the founnes. For the earth dyd not ſhut and cloſe together in the fire, nor dried vp all the moiſture thereof: but rather to the contrarie it dyd ſwell to ſuch a bignes, and grew ſo harde and ſtrong withall, that they were driuen to breake vp the head and walles of the founnes to get it out. The ſoothſayers dyd expounde this, that it was a celeſtiall token from aboue, and promiſed great proſperitie and increaſe of power vnto thoſe, that ſhould enioye this coche. Whereupon the Vebians reſolued not to deliuer it vnto the Romaines that demaunded it, but answered that it dyd belong vnto king Tarquine, and not vnto thoſe that had baniſhed him. Not many dayes after, there was a ſolemne feaſt of games for running of horſes in the citie of Vebes, where they dyd alſo many other notable actes, worthy ſight according to their cuſtome. But after the game was played, he that had wonne the bell, being crowned in token of victorie as they dyd vſe at that time, brought his coche and horſes fayer and ſoftely out of the ſhowe place: and ſodainly the horſe being affrayed vpon no preſent cauſe or occaſion ſcene, whether it was by chaunce, or by ſome ſecret working from aboue, ranne as they had bene mad with their coche to the citie of Rome. The coche driuer dyd what he could poſſible at the firſt to ſtaye them, by holding in the raynes, by clapping them on the backs, and ſpeaking gently to them: but in the ende, perceyuing he could doe no good, and that they would haue their ſwinge, he gaue place to their furie, & they neuer linne ronning, till they brought him neere to the Capitoll, where they ouerthrew him and his coche, not farre from the gate called at this preſent, Ratumena. The Vebians wounding much at this matter, and being affrayed withall: were contented the workmen ſhould deliuer their coche made of earth vnto the Romaines. Now concerning Iupiter Capitolins temple, king Tarquine the firſt (which was the ſonne of Demarſtus) vowed in the warres that he made againſt the Sabynes, that he would buyld it. And E Tarquine the provde, being the ſonne of him that made this vowe dyd buyld it: howbeit he dyd not conſecrate it, becauſe he was driuen out of his Kingdome before he had finiſhed it. When this temple was built and thoroughly finiſhed, & ſet forth with all his ornaments: Publicola was marvelouſly deſirous to haue the honour of the dedication thereof. But the noble men and Senatours enuying his glorie, being very angrie that he could not content him ſelfe with all thoſe honours that he had receyued in peace, for the good lawes he had made, and in warres for the victories he had obtained & well deſerued, but further that he would ſeek the honour of this dedication, which nothing dyd pertaine vnto him: they then dyd egge Horatiuſe, & perſuaded him to make ſure for the ſame. Occaſion fell out at that time, that Publicola muſt haue the leading of the Romaine armie into the field: in the meane time, while Publicola was abſent, it was procured that the people gaue their voyces to Horatiuſe, to conſecrate the temple, knowing they could not ſo well haue brought it to paſſe he being preſent. Other ſaye,

A ſaye, the Conſuls drew lots betweene them, and that it lighted vpon Publicola to leade the armie againſt his will, and vpon Horatiuſe to conſecrate this temple, which maye be coniectured by the thing that fortune in the dedication thereof. For all the people being aſſembled together in the Capitoll with great ſilence, on the fifteenth daye of the moneth of September, which is about the newe moone of the moneth which the Grecians call Metagition: Horatiuſe hauing done all the ceremonies needefull in ſuche a caſe, and holding then the doores of the temple, as the vſe was euen to vter the ſolemne wordes of dedication: Marcus Valerius, the brother of Publicola, hauing ſtoode a long time there at the temple doore, to take an oportunitie to ſpeake, beganne to ſay alowde in this wiſe. My lorde Conſul, your ſonne is dead of a ſickneſſe in the campe. This made all the aſſembly ſorie to heare it, but it nothing amaſed B Horatiuſe, who ſpake only this muche. Caſt his bodie then where you will for me, the thought is taken. So he continued on to ende his conſecration. This was but a deuile and nothing true, of Marcus Valerius, only to make Horatiuſe leaue of his conſecration. Horatiuſe in this ſhewed him ſelfe a marvelous reſolute man, were it that he ſtreight founde his deuile, or that he beleeued it to be true: for the ſodainenes of the matter nothing altered him. The very like matter fell out in conſecrating of the ſecond temple. For this firſt which Tarquine had built and Horatiuſe conſecrated, was conſumed by fyre in the ciuill warres: and the ſecond was built vp againe by Sylla, who made no dedication of it. For Catulus ſet vp the ſuperſcription of the dedication, becauſe Sylla dyed before he could dedicate it. The ſecond temple was burnt againe not long after the troubles and tumultes which were at Rome, by Vitellius the Emperour. The third in like manner was reedified and built againe by Velpſian, from the ground to the toppe. But this good happe he had aboute other: to ſee his worke perſited and finiſhed before his death, and not ouerthrowen as it was immediately after his death. Wherein he dyd farre paſſe the happines of Sylla, who dyed before he could dedicate that he had built: and thother deſealed before he ſawe his worcke ouerthrowen. For all the Capitoll was burnt to the ground incontinently after his death. It is reported the only foundations of the firſt temple, coſt Tarquinius ſortie thouſand Pondos of ſiluer. And to gyld only the temple which we ſee now in our time, they ſaye all the goodes and ſubſtance that the richeſt citizen of Rome then had, will come nothing neere vnto it: for it coſt aboue twelue thouſand talents. The pillars of this temple are cut out of a quarrie of marbell, called pentlike marbell, and they were ſquared parpine, as thicke as long: theſe I ſawe at Athenes. But afterwarde they were cut againe, and poliſhed in Rome, by which doing they got not ſo much grace, as they loſt proportion: for they were made to ſlender, and left naked of their firſt beawtie. Nowe he that would wonder at the ſtarely buildyng of the Capitoll, if he came afterwarde vnto the palace Domitian, and dyd but ſee ſome galerie, porche, hall, or hotte houſe, or his concubines chambers: he would ſaye (in my opiſion) as the poet Epicharmus layed of a prodigall man.

It is a fault, and folly both in thee to laſhe out gifts, and prodigall reuerdars: For ſande delights, without all rule that be,

E So might they iuſtly ſaye of Domitian. Thou art not liberall, nor deuoute vnto the goddeſ: but it is a vice thou haſt to loue to buyld, and deſireſt (as they ſaye of olde Midus) that all about thee were turned to gold, and precious ſtones. And thus much for this matter. Tarquine after that great foughten battell wherein he loſt his ſonne (that was ſlaine by Brutus in fighting together hande to hande) went to the citie of Clusivm, vnto king Clarius Porſena: the mightieſt prince that raigned at that time in all Italye, and was both noble and a courteous prince. Porſena promiſed him ayde: & firſt of all he ſent to Rome to ſummonne the citizens to receiue their King againe. But the Romaines reſuſing the ſummonnes, he ſent forthwith an Heraulde to proclaime open warres againſt them, and to tell them where, and when he would meete them: and then marched thitherwarde immediately with a great armie. Publicola now being abſent, was choſen Conſul the ſecond time, and Titus Lucretius with him. When he was returned home againe to ROME, because he would exceede king Porfena in greatnes of minde, he began to buyld a citie called Sigilvria, euen when the King with all his armie was not farre frō ROME: & hauing walled it about to his maruelous charge, he sent thither feuen hundred citizens to dwell there, to shewe that he made litle account of this warre. Howbeit Porfena at his coming dyd geue suche a lustie assault to the mount Laniculum, that they draue out the fouldiers which kept the fame: who flying towards ROME, were pursued so harde with the enemies, that with them they had entered the towne, had not Publicola made a faly out to resist them. Who beganne a hotte skirmish harde by the riuier of Tyber, & there fought to haue stayed the enemies to follow any further: which being the greater number, dyd ouerlaye the ROMAINES, & dyd hurte Publicola very sore in this skirmish, so as he was caried away into the citie in his fouldiers armes. And eue so was the other Cōsul Lucetius hurte in like case: which so discouraged & frayed the ROMAINES, that they all tooke the to their legges, & fled towards the citie. The enemies pursued them at their heeles as farre as the woden bridge: so that the citie was in maruelous hazarde of taking vpon the sodaine. But Horatius Cocles, & Herminius, and Lucretius, two other of the chieftest noble young men of the citie, stood with them to the defence of the bridge, & made head againt the enemy. This Horatius was furnamed Cocles (as much to saye, as one eye) because he had lost one of them in the warres. Howbeit other writers saye, it was because of his flat nose which was so foncke into his head, that they sawe nothing to parte his eyes, but that the eye browes dyd meete together by reason whereof the people thinking to furname him Cyclops, by corruption of the tongue they called him (as they saye) Cocles. But howsoeuer it was, this Horatius Cocles had the courage to shew his face againt the enemy, & to kepe the bridge, vntill such time as they had cut & broken it vp behind him. When he saw they had done that, armed as he was, & hurte in the hippe with a pike of the THYSCANS, he leaped into the riuier of Tyber, and saued him selfe by swimming vnto the other side. Publicola wounding at this manly acte of his, perswaded the ROMAINES straight, euery one according to his abilitie, to giue him so much as he spent in a daye: & afterwards also he caused the common treasury to geue him as much lande as he could compass about with his plowe in a daye. Furthermore he made his image of bras to be set vp in the temple of Vulcan, comforting by this honour his wounded hippe, whereof he was lame euer after. Nowe whilst king Porfena was hotely bent, very straightly to besiege ROME, there beganne a famine among the ROMAINES: & to encrease the danger, there came a newe armie out of THYSCANE, which ouerranne, burnt, and made waste, all the territorie of ROME. Whereupon Publicola being chosen Consul, then the third time, thought he should neede to doe no more to resist Porfena brauely, but to be quiet only, & to looke well to the safe keeping of the citie. Howbeit spying his opportunity, he secretly stole out of ROME with a power, & did set vpon the THYSCANS that destroyed the countrie about: & ouerthrew & slue of them, siue thousand men. As for the historie of Mutius, many doe diuersely reporte it: but I will write it in such sorte, as I thincke shall best agree with the trothe. This Mutius was a worthie man in all respects, but specially for the warres. He deuising howe he might come to kill king Porfena, disguised him selfe in THYSCANS apparel, and speaking Thulcan very perfectly, went into his campe, and came to the Kings chayer, in the which he gaue audience: and not knowing him perfectly, he durst not aske which was he, least he should be discovered: and not knowing him, & examined him. And a panne full of fire being brought for the King that entended to doe sacrifice vnto the goddess, Mutius held out his right hand ouer the fire, and boldly looking the King full in his face, whilst the flesh of his hand dyd frye off, he neuer changed hewe nor countenance: the King wondering to see so straunge a sight, called to them to withdraw the fire, and he him selfe dyd deliuer him his sworde againe. Mutius tooke it of him with his left hand, whereupon they saye afterwards, he had geuen him the surname of Scuola, as much to saye, as left handed, and told him in taking of it. Thou couldest not Porfena for feare haue ouercome me, but nowe through curesy thou hast wonne me. Therefore for goodwill I will reueale that vnto thee, which no force, nor extremitie could haue made me vtter. There are three hundred ROMAINES dispersed through thy campe, all which are prepared with like

The noble acte of Mutius Scuola.

How Mutius came by the name of Scuola.

A like mindes to followe that I haue begonne, only gaping for opportunitie to put it in practise. The lot fell on me to be the first to breake the life of this enterprife: & yet I am not sorie my hande sayled, to kill so worthe a man, that deserueth rather to be a friend, then an enemy vnto the ROMAINES. Porfena hearing this, did beleue it, & euer after he gaue the more willing eare to those that treated with him of peace: not so much (in my opinion) for that he feared the three hundred lying in waite to kill him, as for the admiration of the ROMAINES noble minde and great courage. All other writers call this man, Mutius Scuola: howbeit Athenodorus, surname d Sandon, in a booke he wrote vnto Octavian, Augustus sister, sayeth that he was also called Opfig omus. But Publicola taking king Porfena not to be so daingerous an enemy to ROME, as he should be a profitable friēd & allie to the same: let him vnderstand, that he was cōfited to make him iudge of the controuersie betweene them & Tarquine. Whom he dyd many times prouoke to come & haue his cause heard before king Porfena, where he would iustifie to his face, that he was the naughtiest & most wicked man of the world, & that he was iustly driuen out of his countrie. Tarquine sharply answered, that he would make no man his iudge, and Porfena least of all other, for that hauing promised him to put him againe in his Kingdom, he was now gone from his worde, and had chaunged his minde. Porfena was very angrie with this answer, judging this a manifest token that his cause was ill. Wherefore Porfena being solicited againe by his owne sonne Aruns, who loued the ROMAINES, dyd easely graunte them peace vpon condition: that they should redeliuer backe againe to him the lands they had gotten before within the countrie of THYSCAN, with the prisoners also which they had taken in this warre, & in lieu thereof he offered to deliuer to them againe the ROMAINES, that had fled from them vnto him. To confirme this peace, the ROMAINES deliuered him hostages, tenne of the noblest mens sonnes of the citie, & so many of their daughters: emōg which, was Valeria, Publicolae owne daughter. Peace being thus concluded, Porfena brake his armie, & withdrew his strength, trusting to the peace cōcluded. The ROMAINES daughters deliuered for hostages, came downe to the riuers side to washe them, in a quiet place where the streame ranne but gently, without any force or swiftnes at all. When they were there, and faw they had no garde about them, nor any came that waye, nor yet any botes going vp nor down the streame: they had a desire to swime ouer the riuier, which rāne with a swift streame, & was maruelous deepe. Some saye, that one Clelia swamme the riuier vpon her horse backe, & that she did imbolden & incourage the other to swimme hard by her horse side: & recovering the other bancke, and being past all danger, they went & presented them selues before Publicola the Consul. Who neither commended them, nor liked the parte they had played, but was maruelous sorie, fearing least men would iudge him lesse carefull to keepe his faith, then was king Porfena: & that he might suspect the boldnes of these maidens, was but a crafty slight deuised of the ROMAINES. Therefore he tooke them all againe, & sent them immediatly vnto king Porfena. Whereof Tarquine hauing intelligence, he layed an ambuise for them, that had the conduction of them. Who so loone as they were paste the riuier, did shew them selues, & brake vpon the ROMAINES: they being farre fewer in number than the other, did yet very stoutly defend them selues. Now whilst they were in earnest fight together, Valeria Publicolae daughter, and three of her fathers seruants, escaped through the midst of them, and saued them selues. The residue of the virgines remained in the midst among their swordes, in great danger of their liues. Aruns king Porfena sonne aduertised hereof, ranne thither incōtinently to the rescue: but when he came, the enemies fled, and the ROMAINES held on their iorney to redeliuer their hostages. Porfena seeing them againe, asked which of them it was that beganne first to passe the riuier, and had encouraged the other to followe her. One pointed him vnto her, and told him her name was Clelia. He looked vpon her very earnestly, and with a pleasant countenance, and commanded they should bring him one of his best horse in the stable, and the richest furniture he had for the same, and so he gaue it vnto her. Those which holde opinion that none but Clelia passed the riuier a horse backe, doe alledge this to proue F their opinion true. Other doe denie it, saying that this THYSCAN king, did onely honour her noble courage. Howsoeuer it was, they see her image a horse backe in the holy streete, as they goe to the palace: & some saye it is the statue of Valeria, other of Clelia. After Porfena had made peace with the R O M A I N E S , in breaking vp his campe, he ſhewed his noble A minde vnto them in many other things , and ſpecially in that he commaunded his ſouldiers they ſhould carie nothing but their armour and weapon only , leauing his campe full of corne, vitrells, and other kynde of goodes. From whence this cuſtome came, that at this daye when they make open ſale of any thing belonging to the common weale, the ſergeant or common crier crieth, that they are king *Porſena*s goodes, and taken of thankfullnes and perpetuall memorie of his bowntie and liberalltie towards them. Further, *Porſena*s image ſtandeth adioyning to the palace where the Senate is vied to be kept, which is made of great antique worke. Afterwardes the S A B Y N E S inuading the R O M A I N E S territorie with a great force, *Marcus Valerius Publicola*s brother, was then choſen Conſul, with one Poſthumius Tubertus. Howbeit all matters of weight and importance paſſed by *Publicola*s counſell and au-thoritie, who was preſent at any thing that was done: and by whoſe meanes Marcus his brother, wanne two great battells, in the laſt whereof he ſleweth thirteene thouſand of his enemies, not loſing one of his owne men . For which his victories , beſides the honour of triumphe he had, the people alſo at their owne charges , built him a houſe , in the ſtreete of mounte Palatine, and granted him morcouer that his doore ſhould open outwards into the ſtreete, where all others mens doores dyd open inwards into their houſe : ſignifying by graunte of this honour and priuiledge, that he ſhould alwayes haue benefit by the common weale . It is reported that the G R E C I A N S doores of their houſes in olde time, dyd all open outwards after that facion, & they doe cōiecture it by the comedies that are played. Where thoſe that would goe out of their houſes , dyd firſt knocke at their doores , and make a noyſe within the houſe , leaſt in opening their doore vpon a ſodaine, they might ouerthrowe or hurte him that taried at the ſtreete doore, or paſſed by the waye : who hearing the noyſe, had warning ſtraight to a-uoyde the danger. The next yere after that, Publicola was choſen Conſul the fourth time, bicauſe they ſtoode in great doubt that the S A B Y N E S and L A T I N E S would ioyn together to make warres vpon them: beſides all this, there was a certaine ſuperſtitious feare ranne through the cittie, of ſome ill happe toward it, becauſe moſt parte of the women with childe were deli-uered of vnperfect children, lacking ſome one limme or other, & all of them came before their time. Wherefore Publicola looking in ſome of Syllas books, made priuate ſacrifice vnto Pluto, & did ſet vp againe ſome feaſtes & ſolemne games that were left off, & had bene commaunded before time to be kept by the oracle of Apollo. Theſe meanes hauing a litle reioyced the cittie D with good hope, becauſe they thought that the anger of the goddes had bene appeaſed: Publi-cola then begane to prouide for the daungers that they were threatned withall by men, for that newes was brought him that their enemies were vp in all places, & made great preparation to inuaide them. Nowe there was at that time amongſt the S A B Y N E S , a great riche man called Appius Claudius, very ſtrong and aſtute of bodie, & otherwiſe a man of great reputation & eloquence, aboue all the reſt of his countrie men : but notwithstanding, he was much enuided, and could not auoyde it, being a thing common to great men. He went about to ſtaye thoſe intended warres againſt the R O M A I N E S . Whereupon, many which before tooke occaſion to mur-mure againſt him , dyd nowe much more increaſe the ſame: with ſaying he ſought to maintaine the power of the R O M A I N E S , that afterwards by their ayde he might make him ſelfe ty-ranne & King of the countrie. The common people gaue eaſy eare vnto ſuch ſpeeches, & Appius perceyuing well enough how the ſouldiers hated him deadly, he feared they would complaine, & accuſe him. Wherefore being well backed & ſtoode to by his kynſemen, friends, and followers, he practiſed to make a ſturre among the S A B Y N E S , which was the cauſe of ſtaying the warres againſt the R O M A I N E S . Publicola, alſo for his parte was very diligēt, not only to vn-derſtand the originall cauſe of his ſedition, but to feede on further & increaſe the ſame, hauing gotten men meete for the purpoſe, which caried Appius ſuch a meſſage from him. That Publi-cola knewe very well he was a iuſt man, and one that would not be reuenged of his citizens, to the generall hurte of his countrie, although the iniuries he receyued at their hands, deliuered him iuſt occaſion to doe it : neuertheleſ if he had any deſire to prouide for his F ſafety and to repaire to R O M E , leauing them which cauſeles wiſhed him ſo muche euill, they would both openly and priuately receyue him with that due honour which his ver-tue

A true deſerued and the worthines of the R O M A I N E people required . Clauius hauing long and many times conſidered this matter with him ſelfe, reſolued that it was the beſt waye he could take, making vertue of neceſſitie : & therefore being determined to doe it, he dyd procure his friends to doe as he dyd, & they got other alſo vnto them, ſo that he brought away with him out of the countrie of the S A B Y N E S , ſiue thouſand families with their wiues and children (of the quieteſt and moſt peaceable people among the S A B Y N E S) to dwell at R O M E . Publicola being aduertiſed thereof before they came, dyd receyue them at their coming to R O M E with great ioye, and all manner of good curteous entertainment. For at their firſt coming, he made them all and their families free citizens, & aſſigned vnto euery perſone of them two iugera of lande, (which cōteined one acre, one roud, eleuen pole, & 69 . partes of a pole) by the riuier of Tyber :
B & vnto Appius ſelfe he gaue him 25 . iugera (to wit, 16 . acres & 4 . pole, 16 . acres & a halfe, 4 . pole & 76 . partes of a pole) & receiued him into the nūber of the Senatours . And thus came he firſt vnto the government of the common weale in R O M E , where he did ſo wiſely beſeue him ſelfe, that in the end he came to be the chiefeſt man of dignitie & authoritie in R O M E , ſo long as he liued. After his death, he left behind him the familie of the Claudians, deſcēding frō him: which for honour, and worthines, gaue no place to the nobleſt familie in R O M E . But nowe the ſedition amongſt the S A B Y N E S being pacified, by the departure of thoſe that were gone to R O M E : the ſeditious gouernours would not ſuffer thoſe that remained to liue in peace , but full cried out, it were to much ſhame for them, that Clauius being a fugitiue , and become an emie, ſhould honour their enemies abroad, that being preſent durſt not ſhewe ſo much at C home, and that the R O M A I N E S ſhould ſcape vnreunged, who had done them ſuch apparant wrongs . So they raiſed great force and power, and went and encamped with their armie neere the cittie of F I D E N E S , and layed an ambuſhe harde by R O M E , in certain hidden and hollow places, where they put a two thouſand choyce footemen, very well armed, and dyd appoint the next morning to ſend certaine light horſe men to runne and praye to R O M E gates: commaunding them, that when the R O M A I N E S came out of the cittie to charge them, they ſhould ſeeme leiſurely to retire, vntill they had drawn them within daunger of their ambuſh.
Publicola receyuing full intelligence of all their intention, by a traytour that fled from them vnto him, made due preparation to encounter with their priue ambuſhe, and ſo deuided his armie in two partes: for he gaue his ſonne in lawe Poſthumius Balbus, three thouſand footemen, whom he ſent away by night, commaunding them the ſame night to take the hilles, in the D bottome whereof the S A B Y N E S were layed in ambuſhe. Lucretius, fellowe Conſull with Publi-cola, hauing the lighteſt and luſtieſt men of the cittie, was appointed to make head againſt the vaſt curriers of the S A B Y N E S , that minded to approche the gates. And Publicola with the reſt of the armie, marched a great compaſſe about to incloſe his enemies behinde. The next morning betimes, by chaunce it was a thick miſte, & at that preſent time Poſthumius coming down from the hilles, with great ſhowtes, charged them that laye in ambuſh. Lucretius on the other ſide, ſet vpon the light horſemen of the S A B Y N E S : & Publicola fell vpon their campe. So that of all ſides the S A B Y N E S enterpriſe had very ill ſucceſſe, for they had the worſt in euery place, & the R O M A I N E S killed them flying, without any turning againe to make reſiſtance. Thus the E place which gaue them hope of beſt ſafety, turned moſt to their deadly ouerthrowe. For e-uery one of their companies ſuppoſing the other had bene whole & vnbroken, when a charge was geuen vpon them, dyd ſtraight breake, & neuer a company of them turned head toward their enemy. For they that were in the campe, ranne toward them which laye in ambuſhe: & thoſe which were in ambuſhe on the contrarie ſide, ranne towards them that were in cape.
So that in flying, the one met with the other, and founde rhoſe, towards whom they were flying to haue bene ſafe , to ſtand in as much neede of helpe as them ſelues . That which ſaued ſome that were not ſlaine, was the cittie of F I D E N E S , which was neere the campe, and ſpecially ſaued thoſe which fled thither . But ſuch as came thorte of the cittie , and could not in time recouer it , were all ſlaine in the field, or taken priſoners . As for the glorie of this honorable victorie, albeit the R O M A I N E S were wonte to aſcribe all ſuche great notable matters to the ſpeciall prouidence and grace of the goddes, yet at that time notwithstanding they dyd iudge , that this happy ſucceſſe fell out by the wiſe foreſight and valiantnes of the captaine. For every man that had serued in this iorney, had no other talke in his mouth, but that Publicola had deliuered their enemies into their handes, lame, and blinde, and as a man might save, bounde hande and feete to kill them at their pleasure. The people were maruelously enriched by this victorie, aswell for the spoile, as for the ranfome of the prisoners that they had gotten. Nowe Publicola after he had triumphed, and left the gouernment of the cittie to those, which were chosen Consuls for the yere following: dyed incontinently, hauing liued as honorably and vertuously all the dayes of his life, as any man liuing might doe. The people then tooke order for his funeralles, that the charges thereof should be defrayed by the cittie, as if they had neuer done him any honour in his life, and that they had bene still debtors vnto him for the noble seruice he had done vnto the state and common weale whilst he liued. Therefore towards his funeralle charges, euery citizen gaue a peece of money called a Quatrine. The women also for their parte, to honour his funeralles, agreed among them selues to mourne a whole yere in blackes for him, which was a great and honorable memoriall. He was buried also by expresse order of the people, within the cittie, in the freate called Velia: and they graunted priuiledge also vnto all his posteritie, to be buried in the selfe same place. Howbeit they doe no more burie any of his there. But when any dye, they bring the corse vnto this place, and one holding a torch burning in his hande, doth put it vnder the place, and take it straight awaye againe, to shewe that they haue libertie to burie him there, but that they willingly refuse this honour: and this done, they carie the corse awaye againe.

THE COMPARISON OF Solon with Publicola.

NOWE presently to compare these two personages together, it seemeth they both had one vertue in them: which is not founde in any other of their liues which we haue written of before. And the same is, that the one hath bene a witnes, and the other a follower of him, to whom he was like. So as the sentence that Solon spake to king Crasus, touching Tellus felicitie & happines, might haue better bene applied vnto Publicola, than to Tellus: whom he iudged to be very happy, bicause he dyed honorably, he had liued vertuously, and had left behinde him goodly children. And yet Solon speaketh nothing of his excellencie, or vertue, in any of his poemes: neither dyd he euer beare any honorable office in all his time, nor yet left any children that caried any great fame or renowne after his death. Whereas Publicola so long as he liued, was alwayes the chief man amongst the ROMAINES, of credit and authoritie: and afterwards since his death, certaine of the noblest families, and most auncient houses of ROME, in these our dayes, as the Publicoles, the Metellus, and happie.

A & the VALERIANES, for six hundred yeres continuance, doe refferre the glorie of the nobilitie & auncientie of their house vnto him. Furthermore, Tellus was slaine by his enemies, fighting valliantly like a worthy honest man. But Publicola died after he had slaine his enemies: which is farre more great good happe, then to be slaine. For after he as generally had honorably serued his country in the warres, & had left them conquerors, hauing in his life time receyued all honourous & triumphes due vnto his seruice: he attained to that happy end of life, which Solon accomplished & esteemed most happy & blessed. Also in wishing manner, he would his end should be lamented to his praye, in a place where he confuteth Ammermus, about the continuance of mans life, by saying:

Let not my death without lamenting passe, but rather let my friends be vrvaile the same: Vt those grieuous seares, and cries of out alas, maye ofte resound the Echo of my name.

If that be good happe, then most happy maketh he Publicola: for at his death, not only his friends and kinsfolkes, but the whole cittie also, and many a thousand persone besides, dyd bitterly bewaile the losse of him. For all the women of ROME dyd mourne for him in blackes, and dyd most pittiefully lament his death, as euery one of them had lost father, brother, or husband.

True it is, that I couet goodes to haue:

but yet I got, as maye me not deprave.

Solon sayeth this, bicause vengeance followed ill gotten good. And Publicola tooke great heede, not only to get his goodes most iustly, but had regarde that those which he had, he spent most honestly in helping the needie. So that if Solon was iustly reputed the wisest man, we must needs confesse also that Publicola was the happiest. For what the one desired for the greatest and most perfect good, a man can haue in this worlde: the other hath wonne it, kept it, and vied it all his life time, vntill the hower of his death. And thus hath Solon honoured Publicola, and Publicola hath done like vnto Solon, shewing him self a perfect example and looking glasse, where men maye see howe to gouerne a popular state: when he made his Consulshippe voyde of all pride & itately shewe, and became him self affable, curteous, and beloued of euery bodie. So tooke he profit by many of his lawes. As when he ordeined, that the people only should haue authoritie to choose and create, all common officers and magistrates, and that they might appeale from any iudge to the people: as Solon when he suffered them to appeale vnto the iudges of the people. In deede Publicola dyd not create any newe Senate, as Solon dyd: but he dyd augment the first number, with as many persones almost as there were before. He dyd also first erect the office of Quaestores, for keeping of all fines, taxes, and other collections of money. Bicause the chiefeest magistrate, if he were an honest man, should not for so light an occasion be taken, from the care of better and more weightie affayres: and if he were wickedly geuen and ill disposed, that he should haue no such meane or occasion to worke his wicked will, by hauing the treasure of the cittie in his handes, and to commaund what he lyst. Moreover in hating the tyrānes, Publicola therein was farre more sharpe & terrible. For Solon in his lawes punished him that went about to make him selfe tyranne, yet after he was conuicted thereof by lawe: but Publicola ordeined that they should kill him, before the lawe dyd passe on him, that sought to be King. And where Solon iustly, and truly vauntech him self, that being offered to be King & Lord of ATHENS, and that with the whole consent of the citizens: yet he dyd notwithstanding refuse it. This vaunte and glorie is as due vnto Publicola: who finding the dignitie of a Consul tyrannicall, he brought it to be more lowly and fauorable to the people, not taking vpon him all the authoritie he might lawfully haue done. And it seemeth that Solon knewe before him, what was the true and direct waye to gouerne a common weale vprightly. For he sayeth in one place:

Both great and small of pouer, she better vwill obeye: if vve to litle or to much, vpon them doe not laye.

F The discharging of dettes was proper to Solon, which was a full confirmation of libertie. For litle preuaileth lawe to make equalitie among citizens, when dettes doe hinder the poore people to enioye the benefit thereof. And where it seemeth that they haue most liber-tie, as in that they may be chosen iudges and officers to speake their opinion in the counsell, and geue their voyces also: there in deede are they most bounde and subiect, bicause they doe but obeye the rich, in all they doe commaund. But yet in this acte there is a thinge more wonderfull, and worthie to be noted. That commonly discharging of dettes, was wont to breede great tumultes, and seditions in common weales. And Solon hauing vsed it in a very good time (as the phisitian ventring a daungerous medecine) dyd appease the sedition already begonne, and did vterly quenche through his glorie, and the common opinion they had of his wisdom and vertue, all the infamie and accusation that might haue growen of that acte. As for their first entrie into the gouernment, Solons beginning was farre more noble. For he went before, and followed not another: and him selfe alone without any others helpe, dyd put in execution the best, and more parte of all his notable and goodly lawes. Yet was Publicolaes ende and death much more glorious and happie. For Solon before he dyed, sawe all his common wealthe ouerthrowen: but Publicolaes common weale continued whole as he left it, vntill the broyle of ciuill warres beganne againe among them. Solon, after he had made his lawes, and written them in woddien tables, leauing them without defence of any man, went his waye immediately out of the citie of ATHENS. Publicola abiding continually in ROME gouerning the state, dyd thoroughly stablishe & confirme the lawes he made. Furthermore Solon hauing wisely forseeke Pisistratus practises, aspiring to make him selfe King: he could neuer let him for all that, but was him selfe overcome and oppressed with the tyrannie he sawe established in his owne sight, and in disight of him. Where Publicola ouerthrowe and dyd put downe a mightie Kingdome, that had continued of long time, and was thoroughly established: his vertue and desire being equall with Solons, & hauing had besides fortune fauorable, and sufficient power to execute, his vertuous and well disposed minde. But as for warres and marshall deedes, there is no comparison to be made betweene them. For Daimachus Plateian, doth not attribute the warres of the MEGARIANS vnto Solon, as we haue written it: where Publicola being generall of an armie, and fighting him selfe in person, hath wonne many great battells. And as for matters of peace and ciuill gouernment, Solon neuer durst present him selfe openly to persuaide the enterprise of SALAMINA, but vnder a counterfeit madnes, and as a foole to make sporte. Where Publicola taking his aduantage from the beginning, shewed him selfe without dissimulation, an open enemy to Tarquine, and afterwarde he reuealed all the whole conspiracie. And when he had bene the only cause and autor of punishing the traitours, he dyd not only driue out of ROME the tyrannes selues in person, but tooke from them also all hope of returne againe. Who hauing allwayes thus nobly & vallyantly behaued him self, without shrinking backe, or flying from ought that required force, a manly corage, or open resistance: dyd yet shewe him selfe discrete, where wisdom was requisite, or reason and persuation needefull. As when he conningly wanne king Porfena, who was a dredfull enemy vnto him, and inuincible by force: whom he handled in such good sorte, that he made him his friend. Peraduenture some might stand in this and saye: that Solon recouered the Ile of SALAMINA vnto the ATHENIANS, which they would haue lost. Publicola to the contrarie, restored the lands vnto Porfena againe, which the ROMAINES had conquered before, within the countie of THYSCAN. But the times in which these things were done, are allwayes to be considered of. For a wise gouernour of a Realme, and politike man, doth gouerne diuersely according to the occasions offered, taking euery thing in his time wherein he will deale. And many times, in letting goe one thing, he saue the whole: and in losing a litle, he gayneth much. As Publicola dyd: who losing a litle pece of another mans countie which they had vsurped, saued by that meanes all that was assuredly his owne. And whereas the ROMAINES thought he should doe very much for them, to saue their citie only: he got them moreover, all the goodes that were in their enemies cape, which dyd besiege them. And in making his enemy iudge of his quarrell, he wane the victorie: winning that moreover, which he would gladly haue geuen to haue overcome, and haue sentence passe of his side. For the King their enemy dyd not only make peace with them, but dyd also leaue them all his furniture, prouision, and munition for the warres: euen for the vertue, manhood, and iustice, which the great wisdom of this Consul persuaied Porfena to beleue to be, in all the other ROMAINES.

The ende of Publicolaes life.

Themistocles.

THEMISTOCLES parentage dyd litle aduance his glorie: for his father Neocles was of small reputation in ATHENS, being of the hundred of Phreax, & tribe of Leontis: of his mother an allien or stranger: as these verses doe witnesse, Abrotonon I am, borne in Thracia, and yet this highe good happe I haue, shat into Grecia: I haue brought forth a sonne, Themistocles by name, the glorie of the Greekishe bloods, and man of greatest fame.

Howbeit Phanias writeth, that his mother was not a THRACIAN, but borne in the countie of CARIA: and they doe not call her Abrotonon, but Euterpe. And

B Neantes sayeth furthermore, that she was of HALICARNASSYS, the chiefe citie of all the Realme of CARIA. For which cause when the strangers dyd assemble at Cynsargos (a place of exercise without the gate dedicated to Hercules, which was not a right god, but noted an allien, in that his mother was a mortall woman:) Themistocles persuaied diuers youthe of the most honourable houes, to goe down with him, & to annointe them selues at Cynsargos, conningly thereby taking away the difference betwene the right & allien sorte. But setting a parte all these circumstaunces, he was no doubt allied vnto the house of the Lycomedians: for Themistocles caused the chappell of this familie, which is in the village of PHLYE, being once burnt by the barbarous people, to be buylt vp againe at his owne charges: and as Simonides sayeth, he dyd set it forth and enriche it with pictures. Moreover euery man doth confesse it, that euen from his childhood they dyd perceyue he was geuen to be very whotte headed, stirring, wise, and of good spirite, and enterprising of him selfe to doe great things, and borne to rule weighty causes. For at such dayes and howers as he was taken from his booke, and had leaue to playe, he neuer played, nor would neuer be idle, as other children were: but they allwayes founde him conning some oration without booke, or making it alone by him selfe, and the ground of his matter was euer comonly, either to defend, or accuse some of his companions. Whereupon his schoolemaster obseruing him, ofte sayed vnto him: suer some great matter hangeth ouer thy head my boye, for it cannot be chosen but that one daye thou shalt doe some notable

good thing, or some extreme mischief. Therefore when they went about to teache him any thing, only to checke his nature, or to facion him with good manner and ciuillitie, or to studie any matter for pleasure or honest pastime: he would slowly and carelessly learne of them. But if they deliuered him any matter of wit, and things of weight concerning state: they sawe he would beate at it maruelously, and would vnderstande more then any could of his age and carriage, trusting altogether to his naturall mother wit. This was the cause, that being mocked afterwards by some that had studied humanitie, and other liberrall sciences, he was driven for reuenge and his owne defence, to answer with great and stowte wordes, saying, that in deede he could no skill to tune a harpe, nor a violl, nor to playe of a psalterion: but if they dyd put a citty into his handes that was of small name, weake, and litle, he knewe wayes enough how to make it noble, stronge, and great. Neuertheles, Stesimbrotus writeth, how he went to Anaxagoras schoole, and that vnder Melissus he studied naturall philosophie. But herein he was greatly deceaued, for that he tooke no great heide vnto the time. For Melissus was captaine of the SAMIANs against Pericles, at what time he dyd laye seige vnto the citty of SAMOS. Now this is true, Pericles was much younger then Themistocles, and Anaxagoras dwelt with Pericles in his owne house. Therefore we haue better reason and occasion to beleue those that write, Themistocles dyd determine to followe Mnesiphilus Phrearian. For he was no professed O-rator, nor naturall philosopher, as they termed it in that time: but made profession of that which then they called wisdom. Which was no other thing, but a certain knowledge to handle great causes, and an endeavour to haue a good wit and iudgment in matters of state and gouernment: which profession beginning in Solon, dyd continue, and was taken vp from man to man, as a secte of philosophie. But those that came sithence, haue mingled it with arte of speache, and by litle and litle haue translated the exercise of deedes, vnto bare and curious wordes: whereupon they were called Sophisters, as who would saye, counterfeite wise men. Notwithstanding, when Themistocles beganne to medle with the gouernment of the common weale, he followed much Mnesiphilus. In the first parte of his youth, his behauiour and doings were very light and vnconstant, as one caried away with a raile head, and without any order or discretion: by reason whereof his manners & conditions seemed maruelously to chaunge, and oftentimes fell into very ill fauored euents, as him self dyd afterwards confesse by saying: that a ragged colte oftymes proues a good horse, specially if he be well ridden, and broken as he should be. Other tales which some will seeme to adde to this, are in my opinion but fables. As that his father dyd disinherite him, and that his mother for very care and sorowe the tooke to see the lewde life of her sonne, dyd kill her self. For there are that write to the contrary, that his father being desirous to take him from dealing in gouernment, dyd goe and shewe him all alongest the sea shore, the shippewracks and ribbes of olde gallyes cast here and there, whereof no reckoning was made, and sayed to him: thus the people vie their gouernours, when they can serue no longer. Howsoeuer it was, it is most true that Themistocles earnestly gaue him self to state, and was sodainly taken with desire of glorie. For euen at his first entrie, because he would set foote before the proudest, he tooke at pyke against the greatest and mightiest persones, that bare the swaye and gouernment, and specially against Aristides, Lyfmachus sonne, who euer encountered him, and was still his aduerfarye opposit. Yet it seemeth the euil will he conceyued toward him, came of a very light cause. For they both loued Stesilaus, that was borne in the citty of TEOS, as Ariston the philosopher writeth. And after this ialousie was kindled betweene them, they alwayes tooke contrary parte one against another, not only in their priuate likings, but also in the gouernment of the common weale. Yet I am perswaded, that the difference of their manners & conditions, did much encrease the grudge and discord betwext them. For Aristides being by nature a very good man, a iust dealer, & honest of life, and one that in all his doings would neuer flatter the people, nor serue his owne glorie, but rather to the contrary would doe, would saye, & counsaill alwayes for the most benefit & comoditie of the common weale: was oftentimes enforced to resist Themistocles, & disaappoint his ambition, being euer buslie mouing the people, to take some new matter in hande. For they reporte of him, that he was so inflamed with desire of glorie, & to enterprife great matters, that being but a very yoog man at the battell of Marathon, where there was no talke but of the worthines of

A captaine Miltiades that had wonne the battell: he was found many times solitarie there alone deuising with him self: besides, they saye he could then take no rest in the night, neither would goe to playes in the daye time, nor would keepe companie with those whom he was accustomed to be familiar withall before. Furthermore, he would tell them that would to see him so in his mufes, and chaunged, and asked him what he ayld: that Miltiades victorie would not let him sleepe, because other thought this ouerthrow at MARATHON, would haue made an end of all warres. Howbeit Themistocles was of a contrary opinion, and that it was but a beginning of greater troubles. Therefore he daylie studied howe to prevent them, and how to see to the safetie of GREECE, & before occasion offered, he did exercise his citty in feare of warre, foreseeing what should followe after. Wherefore, where the cittizens of ATHENS before dyd vie to B deuide among them selues the reuenue of their mines of siluer, which were in a parte of AT-TICA called LAVRION: he alone was the first that durst speake to the people, & persuade them, that from thenceforth they should cease that distribution among them selues, & employe the money of the same in making of gallyes, to make warres against the ÆGINETES. For their warres of all GREECE were most cruell, because they were lords of the sea, & had so great a number of shippes. This persuation drue the cittizens more easely to Themistocles minde, than the threatening them with king Darius, or the Persians would haue done: who were farre from them, & not feared that they would come neere vnto them. So this opportunitee taken of the hatred & ialousie betwene the ATHENIANS & the ÆGINETES, made the people to agree, of the said money to make an hundred gallyes, with which they fought against king Xerxes, & did C ouercome him by sea. Now after this good beginning & successe, he wanne the cittizens by degrees to bende their force to sea, declaring vnto them, howe by lande they were scant able to make heade against their equals, whereas by their power at sea, they should not only defende them selues from the barbarous people, but moreover be able to commaund all GREECE. Hereupon he made them good mariners, & passing sea men, as Plato sayeth, where before they were stowte & valliant fouldiers by lande. This gaue his enemies occasion to cast it in his teethe afterwards, that he had taken away from the ATHENIANS the pike & the target, & had brought them to the bāke & the ower: & so he got the vpper hand of Miltiades. Who inueyed against him in that, as Stesimbrotus writeth. Now after he had thus his will, by bringing this sea seruice to passe, whether thereby he dyd ouerthrow the iustice of the comō weale or not, I leaue that D to the philosophers to dispute. But that the preferuacion of all GREECE stood at that time vpon the sea, & that the gallyes only were the cause of setting vp ATHENS againe: Xerxes him self is a sufficient witnes, besides other proofes that might be brought thereof. For his armie by lāde being yet whole, & vnset on, when he saw his armie by sea broken, disperfed, & souncke, he fled straight vpon it, confessing as it were that he was nowe to weake to deale any more with the GRECIANS, & left Mardonius his lieutenant in GREECE, of purpose in my opinion, rather to let that the GRECIANS should not followe him, then for any hope he had to ouercome the. Some write of Themistocles, that he was a very good husband for his own profit, & careful to looke to his things: for he dyd spende liberally, & loued ofte to make sacrifices, & honorably to receyue & entertaine straingers: wherefore he had good reason to be careful to get, to defraye E his charges. Other to the contrary, blame him much, that he was to nere, & miserable: for some saye, he would sell presents of meate that were geuen him. He dyd aske one Phylides on a time, which had a brede of mares, a colte of giste: who denying him flatly, he was so angrie, that he threatened him ere it were long he would make his house the horse of wodde, with the which TROIA was taken. Meaning courtly to let him vnderstande, that he would shortly set strife & quarrel betwext him, & his nearest kinsmen & familiar friends. It is true that he was the most ambitious man of the world. For when he was but a yoig man, & scanty knowen, he earnestly intreated one Epicles, borne at HERMIONNA, an excellent player of the citherne, & counted at that time the conningest man in all ATHENS at that instrument, that he would come & teache his arte at his house: and all was no more, but that many people being desirous to heare him F playe, should aske for his house, & come thither to him. And one yere when he went vnto the feast & assembly of the playes Olympical, he would nedes keepe open house for all comiters, haue his tents richely furnished, & a great traine of seruants & all other furniture, only to con-

stone, which he founde there by chance, or purposely brought thither for that purpose, where there was very good harbor for shippes, and fit places also to lye in. These were the words, that the IONIANs should take the GREECIANs partes being their founders and auncesters, & such as fought for their libertie: or at the least they should trouble the armie of the barbarous people, & doe them all the mischief they could, when the GREECIANs should come to fight with them. By these words he hoped either to bring the IONIANs to take their parte, or at the least he should make the barbarous people iealous & mistrustfull of them. Xerxes being already entred in the vppermost parte of the prouince of DORICA, into the cuntry of PHOCIDA, burning & destroying the townes & cities of the PHOCIANs: the other GREECIANs laye still & suffered the inuasion, notwithstanding the ATHENIANs did request them to meete with the barbarous armie in BORTIA, to saue the cuntry of ATTICA, as before they had done, when they wēt by sea to ARTEMISIUM. But they would not hearkē to it in no wise, & all was because they were desirous they should drawe to the straite of PELOPONNESVS, and there they should assemble the whole strength and power of GREECE within the barre of the same, & make a strong substantiall wall from the one sea to the other. The ATHENIANs were very angrie at this deuise, & were half discouraged & out of hart, to see the selues thus forsake and cast off, by the rest of the GREECIANs. For it was out of all speache that they alone should fight against so many thousands of enemies: & therefore their only remedy was, to leaue their citie: & to get them to the sea. The people were very vnwilling to listen hereto, making their reckoning it was needles to be carefull to ouercome, or to saue them selues, hauing once forsaken the temples of their gods, & the graues of their parents. Wherefore Themistocles seeing that neither reason, nor mans persuation could bring the people to like his opinion: he beganne to frame a deuise (as men doe vsē sometimes in tragedies) & to threaten the ATHENIANs with signes from heauen, with oracles & answers from the goddesses. And the occasion of Minerues draggō seruēd his turne for a celestiall signe & token, which by good fortune dyd not appeare in those dayes in the temple as it was wont to doe: & the priests found the sacrifices which were daylie offered to him, whole & vnouched by any. Wherefore being informed by Themistocles: what they should doe, they spred a brute abroad amongest the people, that the goddesse Minerua, the protectour & defendour of the citie, had forsaken it, pointing them the waye vnto the sea. And againe he wanne them by a prophetic, which commaunded them to saue them selues in walles of wodd: saying, that the walles of wodd dyd signifie nothing els but shippes. And for this cause he saied, Apollo in his oracle called SALAMINA diuine, not miserable nor vnforsunate, because it should geue the name of a most happy victorie which the GREECIANs should get there. And so at the last they following his counsell, he made this decree, that they should leaue the citie of ATHENS to the custodie of the goddesse Pallas, that was lady & gouernour of the country, & that all those which were of age to carie any weapon should get thē to the gallyes: & for the rest, that euery man should see his wife, children, & bondmen placed in some suer place as well as he could. After this decree was past & authorized by the people, the most parte of them did conuey their aged fathers & mothers, their wiues & litle children, into the citie of TROEZEN, where the TROEZENIANs receyued them very louingly & gently. For they gaue order that they should be entertained of the cōmon charge, allowing them a pece, & two obolus of their money a daye, & suffered the young children to gather fruite wherefoeuer they founde it: & furthermore dyd hier schoolemasters at the charge of the cōmon wealth, to bring them vp at schoole. He that was the pēner of this decree, was one called Nicagoras. The ATHENIANs at that time, had no comō money, but the Senate of the Areopagites (as Aristotle sayeth) furnished euery souldier with eight drachmas, which was the only meane that the gallyes were armed. Yet Clidemus writeth, that this was a crafte deuised of Themistocles. The ATHENIANs being come downe vnto the haven of PIREA, he made as though Pallas tergat (on the which Medusus heade was grauen) had bene lost, & was not found with the image of the goddesse: and faiming to seeke for it, he ranfacked euery corner of the gallyes, and founde a great deale of siluer which priuate persones had hidden amongst their fardells. This money was brought out vnto the people, and by this meane the souldiers that were shipped had wherewithall, to prouide them of necessary things. When time came that they were

A to departe the hauen, & that all the citie of ATHENS had taken sea: one waye it was a pittie to behold them. Another waye it made all fortes to wounder, that considered the boldnes and corage of those men, which before sent awaye their fathers, and mothers from them, and were nothing moued at the teares, cries, shrikes, & imbragings of their wiues, their children, & departures, but stowly and resolutely helde on their course to SALAMINA. Notwithstanding, there were many olde citizens left still of necessity in ATHENS, because they could not be remoued for very extreme age, which sturred many with compassion toward them. There was besides, a certen pittie that made mens harts to yerne, when they saw the poore doggs, beasts, & cattell runne vp & downe bleating, mowing, and howling out alowde after their masters, in token of sorowe, when they dyd imbarke. Amongest these, there goeth a straunge tale of Xanthippus dogge, who was Pericles father: which for sorowe his master had left him behinde him, dyd cast him self after into the sea, & swimming still by the gallyes side wherein his master was, he helde on to the Ile of SALAMINA, where so lone as the poore curre laded, his breath fayled him, & dyed presently. They saye, at this daye the place called the doggs graue, is the very place where he was buried. These were straunge acts of Themistocles, that beholding the ATHENIANs sory for the absence of Aristides, and fearing least of spyte he taking parte with the barbarous nation, might haue bene the ruine & distruction of the state of GREECE, being banished fye yerres also before the warres, by Themistocles procurement: that he dyd fet forth a decree, that all those which had bene banished for a time, might returne home againe, to doe, to saye, & to geue counsell to the citizens in those things, which they thought best for the preferation of GREECE. And also where Eurybiades, being general of the GREECIANs whole army by sea, for the worthines of the citie of SPARTA, but otherwise a rancke coward at time of neede, would in any case departe from thence, & retire into the goulfe of PELOPONNESVS, where all the army of the PELOPONNESIANs was by lande assembled: that Themistocles withstood him, and did hinder it all he could. At that time also it was, that Themistocles made so notable answers, which specially are noted, & gathered together. For when Eurybiades sayed one day vnto him, Themistocles, those that at playes & games doe rise before the company, are whistled at. It is true, saied Themistocles: but those that tariē last so, doe neuer winne any game. Another time Eurybiades hauing a staffe in his hande lift it vp, as though he would haue striken him. Strike & thou wilt, saied he, so thou wilt heare me. Eurybiades wōlding to see him so paciēt, suffered him D then to saye what he would. Then Themistocles beganne to bring him to reason: but one that stood by sayed vnto him. Themistocles, for a man that hath neither citie nor house, it is an ill parte to will others that haue, to forsake all. Themistocles turning to him, replied. We haue willingly forsaken our houses and walles, sayed he, cowardly beaste that thou arte, because we would not become slaues for feare to lose things, that haue neither soule nor life. And yet our citie I tell thee is the greatest of all GREECE: for it is a flete of two hundred gallyes ready to fight, which are come hither to saue you if you list. But if you will needes goe your wayes, & forsake vs the seconde time: you shall heare tell ere it be long, that the ATHENIANs haue another free citie, & haue possessed againe as much good land, as that they haue already lost. These wordes made Eurybiades presently thincke, and feare, that the ATHENIANs would E not goe, & that they would forsake them. And as another Eretrian was about to vtter his reason against Themistocles opinion: he could not but answer him. Alas, and must you my masters talke of warres to, that are like to a Saeue? In deede you haue a sword, but you lacke a harte. Some write, that whilst Themistocles was talking thus from his gallye, they spied an owle flying on the right hande of the shippes, which came to light on one of the mastes of the gallyes: and that hereupon all the other GREECIANs dyd agree to his opinion, and prepared to fight by sea. But when the flete of their enemies shippes shewed on the coastes of ATTICA, harde by the hauen Phalericus, and covered all the riuers therabouts, as farre as any bodie could see, and that king Xerxes him selfe was come in person with all his army by lande, to campe by the sea side: so that his whole power both by lande F and sea might be seene in sight: then the GREECIANs had forgotten all Themistocles goodly persuations, and beganne to incline againe to the PELOPONNESIANs, considering how they might recouer the goulfe of PELOPONNESVS, and they dyd growe very angrie, when any man

good thing, or some extreme mischief. Therefore when they went about to teache him any thing, only to checke his nature, or to facion him with good manner and ciuilitie, or to studie any matter for pleasure or honest pastime: he would slowly and carelessly learne of them. But if they deliuered him any matter of wit, and things of weight concerning state: they sawe he would beate at it maruelously, and would vnderstande more then any could of his age and carriage, trusting altogether to his naturall mother wit. This was the cause, that being mockt afterwards by some that had studied humanitie, and other liberall sciences, he was driven for reuenge and his owne defence, to answer with great and stowte wordes, saying, that in deede he could no skill to tune a harpe, nor a violl, nor to playe of a psalterion: but if they dyd put a citty into his handes that was of small name, weake, and litle, he knewe wayes enough how to make it noble, stronge, and great. Neuertheles, Thesimbrotus writeth, how he went to Anaxagoras schoole, and that vnder Melissus he studied naturall philosophie. But herein he was greatly deceaued, for that he tooke no great hede vnto the time. For Melissus was captaine of the SAMIANs against Pericles, at what time he dyd laye siege vnto the citty of SAMOS. Now this is true, Pericles was much younger then Themistocles, and Anaxagoras dwelt with Pericles in his owne house. Therefore we haue better reason and occasion to beleue those that write, Themistocles dyd determine to followe Mnesiphilus Phreasian. For he was no professed O-rator, nor naturall philosopher, as they termed it in that time: but made profession of that which then they called wisdom. Which was no other thing, but a certain knowledge to handle great causes, and an endeavour to haue a good wit and iudgment in matters of state and government: which profession beginning in Solon, dyd continue, and was taken vp from man to man, as a secte of philosophie. But those that came sithence, haue mingled it with arte of speache, and by litle and litle haue translered the exercise of deedes, vnto bare and curious wordes: whereupon they were called sophisters, as who would saye, counterfeate wile men. Notwithstanding, when Themistocles beganne to medle with the government of the common weale, he followed much Mnesiphilus. In the first parte of his youth, his behauiour and doings were very light and vnconstant, as one caried away with a rathe head, and without any order or discretion: by reason whereof his manners & conditions seemed maruelously to chaunge, and oftentimes fell into very ill fauored euents, as him self dyd afterwards confesse by saying: that a ragged colte oftentimes proues a good horse, specially if he be well ridden, and broken as he should be. Other tales which some will seeme to adde to this, are in my opinion but fables. As that his father dyd disinherit him, and that his mother for very care and sorowe the tooke to see the lewde life of her sonne, dyd kill her self. For there are that write to the contrary, that his father being desirous to take him from dealing in gouernment, dyd goe and shewe him all alongest the sea shore, the shippwracks and ribbes of olde gallyes cast here and there, whereof no reckoning was made, and sayed to him: thus the people vse their gouernours, when they can serue no longer. Howfoeuer it was, it is most true that Themistocles earnestly gaue him self to state, and was sodainly taken with desire of glorie. For euen at his first entrie, because he would set foote before the proudest, he stood at pyke against the greatest and mightiest persones, that bare the swaye and government, and specially against Aristides, Lysimachus sonne, who euer encountered him, and was still his aduersarie opposite. Yet it seemeth the euil will he conceyued toward him, came of a very light cause. For they both loued Stesilaus, that was borne in the citty of TEOS, as Ariston the philosopher writeth. And after this ieaousie was kindled betweene them, they allwayes tooke contrary parte one against another, not only in their priuate likings, but also in the government of the common weale. Yet I am perswaded, that the difference of their manners & conditions, did much encrease the grudge and discorde betweene them. For Aristides being by nature a very good man, a iust dealer, & honest of life, and one that in all his doings would neuer flatter the people, nor serue his owne glorie, but rather to the contrary would doe, would saye, & counsaill allwayes for the most benefit & comodiote of the common weale: was oftentimes enforced to resist Themistocles, & disaioyn his ambition, being euer busilie mouing the people, to take some new matter in hande. For they report of him, that he was so inflamed with desire of glorie, & to enterprise great matters, that being but a very yong man at the battell of Marathon, where there was no talke but of the worthines of Aristides a iust man.

Themistocles ambitious.

A captaine Miltiades that had wonne the battell: he was found many times solitarie there alone deuising with him self: besides, they saye he could then take no rest in the night, neither would goe to playes in the daye time, nor would keepe companie with those whom he was accustomed to be familiar withall before. Furthermore, he would tell them that would see him so in his muses, and chaunged, and asked him what he ayed: that Miltiades victorie would not let him sleepe, because other thought this ouerthrow at MARATHON, would haue made an end of all warres. Howbeit Themistocles was of a contrary opinion, and that it was but a beginning of greater troubles. Therefore he daylie studied howe to prevent them, and howe to see to the safetie of GREECE, & before occasion offered, he did exercise his citty in feare of warre, foreseeing what should followe after. Wherefore, where the cittizens of ATHENS before dyd vse to B deuide among them selues the reueneue of their mines of siluer, which were in a parte of ATTICA called LAVRION: he alone was the first that durst speake to the people, & persuaude them, that from thenceforth they should cease that distribution among them selues, & employe the money of the same in making of gallyes, to make warres against the ÆGINETES. For their warres of all GREECE were most cruell, because they were lords of the sea, & had fo great a number of shippes. This persuaasion drew the cittizens more easely to Themistocles minde, than the threatening them with king Darius, or the Persians would haue done: who were farre from them, & not feared that they would come neere vnto them. So this opportunite taken of the hatred & ieaousie betweene the ATHENIANS & the ÆGINETES, made the people to agree, of the said money to make an hundred gallyes, with which they fought against king Xerxes, & did C ouercome him by sea. Now after this good beginning & successe, he wanne the cittizens by degrees to bende their force to sea, declaring vnto them, howe by lande they were scant able to make heade against their equals, whereas by their power at sea, they should not only defende them selues from the barbarous people, but moreover be able to commaund all GREECE. Hereupon he made them good mariners, & passing sea men, as Plato sayeth, where before they were stowte & valliant souldiers by lande. This gaue his enemies occasion to cast it in his teethe afterwards, that he had taken away from the ATHENIANS the pike & the target, & had brought them to the bake & the ower: so he got the vpper hand of Miltiades. Who inueyed against him in that, as Thesimbrotus writeth. Now after he had thus his will, by bringing this sea seruice to passe, whether thereby he dyd ouerthrow the iustice of the commo weale or not, I leaue that to the philosophers to dispute. But that the preservation of all GREECE stood at that time vpon D the sea, & that the gallyes only were the cause of setting vp ATHENS againe: Xerxes him self is a sufficient wimes, besides other proofes that might be brought thereof. For his armie by lade being yet whole, & vnset on, when he saw his armie by sea broken, disperfed, & souncke, he fled straight vpon it, confessing as it were that he was nowe to weake to deale any more with the GRECIANS, & left Mardonius his lieutenant in GREECE, of purpose in my opinion, rather to let that the GRECIANS should not followe him, then for any hope he had to ouercome the. Some write of Themistocles, that he was a very good husband for his own profit, & careful to looke to his things: for he dyd spende liberally, & loued ofte to make sacrifices, & honorably to receyue & entertaine straungers: wherefore he had good reason to be careful to get, to defraye E his charges. Other to the contrary, blame him much, that he was to nere, & miserable: for some saye, he would sell presents of meate that were geuen him. He dyd aske one Philides on a time, which had a brede of mares, a colte of gifte: who denying him flatly, he was so angrie, that he threatned him ere it were long he would make his house the horse of wodde, with the which TROIA was taken. Meaning covertly to let him vnderstande, that he would shortly set fire & quarrel betweene him, & his nearest kinsmen & familiar friends. It is true that he was the most ambitious man of the world. For when he was but a yong man, & scanty knownen, he earnestly intreated one Epicles, borne at HERMIONNA, an excellent player of the citherne, & counted at that time the conningest man in all ATHENS at that instrument, that he would come & teache his arte at his house: and all was no more, but that many people being desirous to heare him playe, should aske for his house, & come thither to him. And one yere when he went vnto the F feast & assembly of the playes Olympicall, he would needs keepe open house for all committers, haue his tents richly furnished, & a great traine of seruants & all other furniture, only to con-tende with Simon. This maruelously spighted the GREECIANS, who thought Themistocles ex-pences fit for Simons countenance, & abilitie, bicause he was a young gentleman, and of a noble house: but for him that was but a new come man, & would beare a greater porte, then either became his calling or abilitie, they thought it not only vnallowable in him, but meere presumption & vaine glorie. Another time he defrayed the whole charges of a tragedie which was played openly: & being set out therein to haue wonne the prise, & the A THENIANS being maruelous desirous of the honour in such plays, he caused this victorie of his to be painted in a table, which he did dedicate & set vp in a temple, with this inscription. Themistocles Phrearian defrayed the charges: Phrynus made it: Adimantus was chief ruler. Yet notwithstanding he was well taken of the common people, partly bicause he would speake to euery citizen by his name, no man telling him their names: & partly also bicause he shewed him self an vpright iudge in priuate mens causes. As one day he answered the poet Simonides, borne in CHIO, who dyd request an vnreasonable matter at his hands, at that time when he was gouernour of the citie. Thou couldest be no good poet, Simonides, if thou diddest singe against the rules of musike: neither my self a good gouernour of a citie, if I should doe any thing against the lawe.

And mocking the same Simonides another time, he told him he was but a foole to speake ill of the CORINTHIANS, considering they were lords of so great & strong a citie. Likewise he was not wile to make him self to be drawn, being so deformed & ill fauored. But being growne in credit, & hauing wōne the fauour of the people, he was such an enemy to Aristides, that in the end he made him to be expulged & banished A THENS, for 5. yeres. Whē newes were brought that the king of PERSIA was onwarde on his iorney & coming downe to make warres vpon the GREECIANS: the A THENIANS consulted with them they should make their generall. And it is reported, that all their cōmon counsellors which were wont to speake in matters, fearing the daunger, dyd drawe backe, saue an orator called Epicides, Euphemides sonne, very eloquent in speache, but somewhat womanishe, fainte harted, & gredie of money, offered him self to sue for this charge, & had some hope to obtaine it. Wherefore Themistocles fearing all would not be well, if it fell to this man to be generall of the armie, he bought out Epicides ambitiō with ready money, & so made him let fall his sute. It fell out Themistocles was greatly comēded, about that was done to the interpreter, that came with the king of PERSIAES ambassadours, & demanded the empire of the GREECIANS both by sea & lande, that they should acknowledge obedience to the King. For he caused him to be taken, & put to death by a comon cōsent, for vsing the Greeke tongue in the seruice & cōmaundement of the barbarous people. It was a notable thing also, that at his motion, Arthmius born at ZELEA, was noted of infamie, both he, his children, & all his posteritie after him, bicause he brought gold frō the king of PERSIA, to corrupt & winne the GREECIANS. But the greatest & worsteste acte he did in those parts, was this: that he pacified all ciuill warres among the GREECIANS, perswading the cities to leaue of their quarrels vntill the warres were done, in the which they saye Chileus Arcadian did helpe him more then any other man. He being now chosen generall of the A THENIANS, wēt about presently to imbarke his citizens into gallyes, declaring to them they should leaue their citie, & goe mete with the barbarous King by sea, so farre frō the coast of GREECE as they could: but the people did not thincke that good. Wherefore he led great numbers of souldiers by lande, into the countrie of TEMPE with the LACEDEMONIANS, to keepe the passage & entrie into THESSALIE, against the barbarous people, which countrie stooode yet fownde to GREECE, & not resuolued to the MEDES. Afterwards the GREECIANS coming frō thence without any acte done, and the THESSALIANS also being wonne somewhat on the Kings side, for that all the whole country vnto BOEOTIA was at the deuotion & goodwill of the barbarous people: then the A THENIANS beganne to finde, howe Themistocles opinion to fight by sea was very good.
Whereupon they sent him with their nauie to the citie of ARTEMISIYN, to keepe the straight.
There the other GREECIANS would haue had the LACEDEMONIANS & their admirall Eury-biades to haue had the authoritie & cōmaundement of the rest. But the A THENIANS would not set sayle vnder any other admirall then their own, bicause theirs were the greatest number of shippes in the armie, & about all the other GREECIANS. Themistocles foreseeing the daunger that was likely to fall out amongst them selues, dyd willingly yelde the whole authoritie vnto

Eury-

Eurybiades, & got the A THENIANS to agree vnto it: assuring them, that if they behaued them selues valliantly in these warres, the other GREECIANS of their own accord would afterwards submit them selues vnto their obedience. Hereby it appeareth, that he only of all other was at that time, the original cause of the fauing of GREECE, & dyd most aduance the honour and glorie of the A THENIANS, by making them to ouercome their enemies by force, & their frinds & allies with liberalitie. In the meane time, Eurybiades being the barbarous flete riding at anker, all alongest the Ile of A PHEYS, with such a great nūber of shippes in the vaward, he beganne to be affrayed. And vnderstanding moreouer, there were other 200. sayle that wēt to caft about the Ile of SCIATHE, & so to come in: he presently would haue retired further into GREECE, & would haue drawē neerer vnto PELOPONNESVS, to the end their army by sea might be neare their army by lāde, as thinking it vnpossible to fight with king Xerxes power by sea. Whereupō the inhabitants of the Ile of E VBOEA, fearing least the GREECIANS would to the spoyle of the enemy, they caused Themistocles secretly to be spokē with all, & sent him a good sōme of money by one called Pelagon. Themistocles tooke the money, as Herodotus writeth, & gaue it to Eury-biades. But there was one Architelus amōgest the A THENIANS, captain of the galley called the holy galley, that was much against Themistocles intended purpose: who hauing no money to paye his mariners, dyd what he could that they might departe with speede from thence.
Themistocles sturred vp then his souldiers more against him then before, inso much as they wēt aboard his galley, & tooke his supper from him. Architelus being maruelous angrie & offēded withall, Themistocles sent him both bread & meat in a pānier, & in the bottome thereof he had put a talent of siluer, bidding him for that night to suppe with that, and the next morning he should provide for his mariners, or els he would cōplaine, & accuse him to the citizees that he had takē money of the enemies. Thus it is writtē by Phanias Lesbū. Moreouer these first fights in the straite of E VBOEA, betwene the GREECIANS, & the barbarous people, were nothing to purpose to end the warres betwene them. For it was but a taste geuē vnto them, which ser-ued the GREECIANS turne very much, by making them to see by experiece, & the manner of the fight, that it was not the great multitude of shippes, nor the pōpe & sumptuous setting out of the same, nor the prowde barbarous shewes & songes of victorie that could stande them to purpose, against noble harts & valliant minded souldiers, that durst grapple with them, & come to hands strokes with their enemies: & that they should make no reckoning of all that brauery & braggies, but should sticke to it like men, & laye it on the iacks of them. The which (as it seemeth) the poet Pindarus vnderstoode very well, when he sayed touching the battell of ARTE-MISIYN.

The stovvte Athenians, haue nowue foundation layed, vnto the libertie of Greece, by thes assaults assayed.

For out of doubt the beginning of victorie, is to be hardie. This place ARTEMISIYN is a part of the Ile of E VBOEA, looking towards the North, about the citie of ESTIÆ, lying directly ouer against the country which somtimes was vnder the obedience of the PHILOCTE-TES, and specially of the citie of OLIZON. There is a little temple of Diana, surnamed Oriental, round about the which there are trees, & a compasse of pillars of white stone, which when a man rubbes with his hande, they shewe of the culler and fauour of sifferance. And in E one of those pillars there is an inscription of lamentable verses to this effect.

When boldest bloods of Athens by their might beganne to builde, this noble monument:
had ouercome, the numbers infinite and to Diane the same they dyd present, of Asiatic they then in memorie, for that they had the Medes likewise subdued, of all their dedes, and valliant victorie & with their blood, their hardy hands embured.

There is a place seene also vpon that coast at this daye, a good waye into the lande, in the middest whereof are great sands full of blacke dust as ashes: and they thincke that they burnt in that place all dead bodies and olde shippwracks. Newes being brought: what had bene done in the countrie of THERMOPYLES, how that king Leonidas was dead, and how that Xerxes had wonne that entrie into GREECE by lande: the GREECIANS then brought their whole F army by sea more into GREECE, the A THENIANS being in the rereward in this retire, as mewhoe hartes were liſte vp with the glorie of their former valliant dedes. Nowe Themistocles passing by those places where he knewe the enemies must of necessitie fall vpon the lee shore for harborow: he dyd ingraue certain wordes spoken vnto the IONIANS, in great letters in stone, which he founde there by chance, or purposely brought thither for that purpose, where there was very good harbor for shippes, and fit places also to lye in. These were the wordes, that the IONIANs should take the GREECIANs partes being their founders and auncesters, & such as fought for their libertie: or at the least they should trouble the armie of the barbarous people, & doe them all the mischief they could, when the GREECIANs should come to fight with them. By these wordes he hoped either to bring the IONIANs to take their parte, or at the least he should make the barbarous people ielous & mistrustfull of them. Xerxes being already entred in the vppermost parte of the prouince of DORICA, into the countie of PHOCIDA, burning & destroying the townes & cities of the PHOCIANs: the other GREECIANs laye still & suffered the inuasion, notwithstanding the ATHENIANs did request them to mete with the barbarous armie in BOEOTIA, to saue the countie of ATTICA, as before they had done, when they wēt by sea to ARTEMISIVM. But they would not hearkē to it in nowise, & all was because they were desirous they should drawe to the straite of PELOPONNESVS, and there they should assemble the whole strength and power of GRECE within the barre of the fame, & make a strong substantiall walle from the one sea to the other. The ATHENIANs were very angry at this deuise, & were half discouraged & out of harte, to see the felues thus forsake and cast of, by the rest of the GREECIANs. For it was out of all speache that they alone should fight against so many thousands of enemies: & therefore their only remedy was, to leave their cities: & to get them to the sea. The people were very vnwilling to listen hereto, making their reckoning it was needeles to be carefull to ouercome, or to saue them selues, hauing once forsaken the tēples of their godds, & the graues of their parents. Wherefore Themistocles seeing that neither reason, nor mans persuation could bring the people to like his opinion: he beganne to frame a deuise (as men doe vsē sometimes in tragedies) & to threaten the ATHENIANs with signes from heauen, with oracles & aunswers from the goddes. And the occasion of Mineruas draggō serued his turne for a celestiall signe & token, which by good fortune dyd not appeare in those dayes in the tēple as it was wont to doe: & the priests found the sacrifices which were daylie offered to him, whole & vntouched by any. Wherefore being enformed by Themistocles what they should doe, they spred a brute abroad amongst the people, that the goddesse Minerua, the protectour & defendour of the cittie, had forsaken it, pointing them the waye vnto the sea. And againe he wanne them by a prophetic, which cōmaunded them to saue them selues in walles of wodd: saying, that the walles of wodd dyd signifie nothing els but shippes. And for this cause he saied, Apollo in his oracle called SALAMINA diuine, not miserable nor vnfürfortunate, because it should geue the name of a most happy victorie which the GREECIANs should get there. And so at the last they following his counsell, he made this decree, that they should leaue the cittie of ATHENS to the custodie of the goddesse Pallas, that was lady & gouernour of the country, & that all those which were of age to carie any weapon should get the to the gallyes: & for the rest, that euery man should see his wife, children, & bondmen placed in some suer place as well as he could. After this decree was past & authorized by the people, the most parte of them did conuey their aged fathers & mothers, their wiues & litle children, into the cittie of TROEZEN, where the TROEZENIANs receyued them very louingly & gently. For they gaue order that they should be entertained of the cōmon charge, allowing them a pece, & two obolos of their money a daye, & suffered the young children to gather fruite wherefoeuer they founde it: & furthermore dyd hier schoolemasters at the charge of the cōmon wealth, to bring them vp at schoole. He that was the pēner of this decree, was one called Nicagoras. The ATHENIANs at that time, had no comō money, but the Senate of the Aeropagites (as Aristotle sayeth) furnished euery soldier with eight drachmas, which was the only meane that the gallyes were armed. Yet Clidemus writeth, that this was a craffe deuised of Themistocles. The ATHENIANs being come downe vnto the haue of PIRÆA, he made as though Pallas terga (on the which Medusus heade was grauen) had bene lost, & was not found with the image of the goddesse: and faining to seeke for it, he ransacked euery corner of the gallyes, and founde a great deale of siluer which priuate perſones had hidden amongst their fardells. This money was brought out vnto the people, and by this meanes the soldiars that were shipped had wherewithall, to provide them of necessary things. When time came that they were

The Athenians forsake Athens by
persuasion, & doe goe to the sea.

A to departe the haue, & that all the cittie of ATHENS had taken sea: one waye it was a pittie to beholde them. Another waye it made all sortes to wounder, that considered the boldnes and corage of those men, which before sent away their fathers, and mothers from them, and were nothing moued at the teares, cries, shrikes, & imbrailings of their wiues, their children, & departures, but stowly and resolutely helde on their course to SALAMINA. Notwithstanding, there were many olde citizens left still of necessitie in ATHENS, because they could not be remoued for very extreme age, which sturred many with compassion toward them. There was besides, a certen pittie that made mens harts to yerne, when they saw the poore doggs, beaſts, & cattell runne vp & downe bleating, mowing, and howling out alowde after their masters, in token of sorowe, when they dyd imbarke. Amongst these, there goeth a straunge tale of Xanthippus dogge, who was Pericles father: which for sorowe his master had left him behinde him, dyd cast him selfe into the sea, & swimming still by the galleys side wherein his master was, he helde on to the Ile of SALAMINA, where so lone as the poore curie laded, his breath fayled him, & dyed presently. They saye, at this daye the place called the doggs graue, is the very place where he was buried. These were straunge acts of Themistocles, that beholding the ATHENIANs fory for the absence of Aristides, and fearing least of spyte he taking parte with the barbarous nation, might haue bene the ruine & destruction of the state of GRECE, being banished fūe yeres also before the warres, by Themistocles procurement: that he dyd set forth a decree; that all those which had bene banished for a time, might returne home againe, to doe, to saye, & to geue counsell to the citizens in those things, which they thought best for the preferuation of GRECE. And also where Eurybiades, being generall of the GREECIANs whole army by sea, for the worthines of the cittie of SPARTA, but otherwise a rancke coward at time of neede, would in any case departe from thence, & retire into the goulfe of PELOPONNESVS, where all the army of the PELOPONNESIANs was by lande assembled: that Themistocles withstood him, and did hinder it all he could. At that time also it was, that Themistocles made so notable aunswers, which specially are noted, & gathered together. For when Eurybiades layed one day vnto him, Themistocles, those that at playes & games doe rise before the company, are whistled at. It is true, saied Themistocles: but those that tarie last so, doe neuer winne any game. Another time Eurybiades hauing a staffe in his hande lift it vp, as though he would haue striken him. Strike & thou wilt, saied he, so thou wilt heare me. Eurybiades woulding to see him so paciēt, suffered him then to saye what he would. Then Themistocles beganne to bring him to reason: but one that stood by layed vnto him, Themistocles, for a man that hath neither cittie nor house, it is an ill parte to will others that haue, to forsake all. Themistocles turning to him, replied, We haue willingly forsaken our houses and walles, sayed he, cowardly beaſte that thou arte, because we would not become slaues for feare to lose things, that haue neither soule nor life. And yet our cittie I tell thee is the greatest of all GRECE: for it is a flete of two hundred galleys ready to fight, which are come hither to saue you if you list. But if you will needes goe your wayes, & forsake vs the seconde time: you shall heare tell ere it be long, that the ATHENIANs haue another free cittie, & haue possessed againe as much good land, as that they haue already lost. These wordes made Eurybiades presently thincke, and feare, that the ATHENIANs would E not goe, and that they would forsake them. And as another Eretian was about to vtter his reason against Themistocles opinion: he could not but aunswer him. Alas, and must you my masters talke of warres to, that are like to a Sleur? In deede you haue a sword, but you lacke a harte. Some write, that whilst Themistocles was talking thus from his galley, they spied an owle flying on the right haunde of the shippes, which came to light on one of the mastes of the galleys: and that hereupon all the other GREECIANs dyd agree to his opinion, and prepared to fight by sea. But when the flete of their enemies shippes shewed on the coastes of ATTICA, harde by the haue Phalericus, and covered all the riuers thereabouts, as farre as any bodie could see, and that king Xerxes him selfe was come in persone with all his army by lande, to campe by the sea side: so that his whole power both by lande & sea might be seene in sight: then the GREECIANs had forgotten all Themistocles goodly persuasions, and beganne to incline againe to the PELOPONNESIANs, considering how they might recouer the goulfe of PELOPONNESVS, and they dyd growe very angry, when any man went about to talke of any other matter. To be shorthe, it was concluded that they should sayle awaye the next night following, & the masters of the shippes had order geuen them to make all things readie for them to departe. Themistocles perceyuing their determination, he was maruelous angry in his minde, that the GREECIANS would thus disperse them selues a fonder, repairing euery man to his owne cittie, and leauing the aduantage which the nature of the place, & the straight of the arme of the sea, where they laye in harbor together, did offer them: and so he bethought him selfe howe this was to be holpen. Sodainly the practise of one Scimus came into his minde, who being a PERSIAN borne, and taken prisoner before in the warres, loued Themistocles very well, and was schoolemaster to his children. This Scimus he secretly sent vnto the king of PERSIA, to aduertise him that Themistocles (generall of the ATHENIANS) was very desirous to become his maiesties seruante, and that he dyd let him vnderstand betimes, that the GREECIANS were determined to flye: and therefore that he wished him not to let them scape, but to set vpon them, whilst they were troubled and affrayed, and farre from their army by lande, to the ende that vpon a sodaine he might ouerthrowe their whole power by sea. Xerxes supposing this intelligence came from a man that wished him well, receyued the messenger with great ioye, and thereupon gaue present order to his capitaines by sea, that they should imbarke their men into the other shippes at better leysure, and that presently they should put out with all possible speede, two hundred sayle to followe the GREECIANS in the taile, to shut vp the foreland of the straite, and to compasse the lles all about, that not one of his enemies shippes should scape: and so it fell out. Then Aristides (Lyfimachus sonne) being the first that perceyued it, went to Themistocles tente, though he was hisemie, and through his only meanes had bene banished before, as ye haue heard: and calling him out, told him how they were enuironned. Themistocles, who knewe well enough the goodnes of this man, being very glad he came at that time to seeke him out, declared vnto him the pollicie he had vsed by the message of Scimus, praying him to put to his helpe to staye the GREECIANS, and to procure with him, considering his worde had more authoritie among them, that they would fight within the straight of SALAMINA. Aristides commending his great wisdom, went to deale with the capitaines of the other gallyes, and to procure them to fight. For all this, they would not credit that he sayed, vntill such time as there arriued a galley of TENEDIANA, whereof one Panetius was capitaine, who being stolen out of the hoste of the barbarous army, brought certen newes, that the straight out of doubt was shut vp. So that besides the necessitie which dyd vrge them, the spight which the GREECIANS conceived thereof, dyd prouoke them to hazard the battell. The next morning by breake of daye, king Xerxes placed him selfe on a maruelous steepe highe hill, from whence he might descerne his whole flete, and the ordering of his army by sea, aboue the temple of Hercules, as Phanodemus writeth. Which is the narrowe waye or channell betwixt the Ile of SALAMINA, and the coast of ATTICA: or as Acetodorus sayeth, vpon the confines of the territories of MEGARA, aboue the pointe which they commonly call the hornes. There Xerxes set vp a throne of golde, and had about him many secretaries, to write all that was done in the battell. But as Themistocles was sacrificing vnto the goddes in his galley that was admiral, they brought to him three young prisoners, laye of complexion, richly arrayed with gold and iuells, whom they sayed were the children of Sandracce the kings sister, and of prince Amarsius. So soone as Euphrantides the soothsayer had seene them, and at their arriual obserued there rose a great bright flame out of the sacrifice, and at the very selfe same instant that one on his right hand had sneeced: he tooke Themistocles by the hand, and willed him to sacrifice all those three prisoners vnto the god Bacchus, furnamed Omeltes, as much to saye, as the cruell Bacchus: for in doing it, the GREECIANS should not only be saued, but they should haue the victorie ouer their enemies. Themistocles wounded much, to heare so straunge and terrible a commaundement of the soothsayer. Neuertheles, the comon sorte following his custome, which is, to promise safety soner in the greatest daungers, & most desperate cases, by straunge & vnreasonable, rather then by reasonable and ordinary meanes: they beganne to call vpon the god with one voyce, and bringing the three prisoners neere vnto the altar, they compelled him to performe the sacrifice in that sorte as the soothsayer had appointed.

A appointed. Phanias Lesbian, an excellent philosopher, and well seene in stories and antiquities, reporteth this matter thus. As for the number of the shippes of the barbarous nauie: Eschylus the poet, in a tragedie which he intituled the PERSIANS, knowing certainly the trothe, sayeth thus:

King Xerxes had a thousand shippes I knowe, amongest the which xvvv hundred were (I knowe) and seven: which all the rest dyd ouersayle with swifter course. This is vwithowen sayle.

*Xerxes king

The ATHENIANS had nine score, in euery one of the which there were eightene souldiers, whereof foure of them were archers, and all the rest armed men. Themistocles also did with no lesse skill & wisdom choose his time & place to fight, forbearing to charge his enemies, vntill the hower was come, that of ordinarie custome the sea winde arose, and brought in a rough syde within the channell, which dyd not hurt the GREECIAN gallyes, being made lowe and snugge, but greatly offended the PERSIAN gallyes, being highe carged, heauie, & nor yare of steredge, and made them lye sidelong to the GREECIANS, who fiercely set vpon them hauing allwayes an eye to Themistocles direction, that best foresawe their aduantage. At the same time, Ariamenes, Xerxes admiral, a man of great valure and worthiest of the Kings brethren, he stowed arrowes and darts as it were from the wallles of a castell, charging the galley of Aminias Decelians, and Soficles Pedian, which were ioyned and grappled with him, and fiercely entering the same, was by them valiantly receyued vpon their pikes, and thrust ouer borde into the sea. V whose bodie floating amongst other shippetracks ARTEMISIA knowing, caused to be caried to king Xerxes. Nowe whilst this battell stood in these termes, they saye that there appeared a great flame in the element, toward the cittie of ELEYSIN, and that a lowde voyce was heard through all the plaine of THIRASIA vnto the sea, as if there had bene a nuber of men together, that had songe out alowde, the holy songe of Iacchus. And it seemed by litle and litle, that there rose a clowde in the ayer from those which fange: that left the land, & came & lighted on the gallyes in the sea. Other affirmed, that they sawe armed men, which did reache out their hands from the Ile of EGINA, towards the GREECIAN gallyes: & they thought they were the ÆACIDS, for whose helpe they all prayed before the battell was begonne. The first man of the ATHENIANS that tooke any of the enemies shippes, was Lycomedes, a capitaine of a galley: who hauing takē very rich furniture & flagges, did afterwards cōsecrate them to Apollo laurell: as ye would saye, victorious. The other GREECIANS in the fronte being equal in nuber with the barbarous shippes, by reason of the straightnes of the arme of the sea wherein they fought, & so straightened as they could not fight but by one & one, where by the BARBARIANS disorderly layed one another abourde, that they did hinder them selues with their ouer multitude: & in the end were so fore pressed vpon by the GREECIANS, that they were cōstrayned to flye by night, after they had fought & maintained battell, vntill it was very darke. So the GREECIANS wanne that glorious & famous victorie: of the which maye truly be affirmed that, as Simonides sayeth:

VV as neuer yet, nor Greeke nor Barbarous crevv that could by sea, so many men subdevv: Nor that obtaynd, so famous victorie in any fight, against theiremie.

*The Grecians

Thus was the victorie wonne through the valliantnes and corage of those that fought that battell, but especially through Themistocles great policie and wisdom. After this battell Xerxes being mad for his losse, thought to fill vp the arme of the sea, and to passe his armie by lande, vpon a bridge, into the Ile of SALAMINA. Themistocles, because he would feelee Aristides opinion, tolde him as they were talking together, that he thought best to goe and occupie the straight of HELLESPONT with the armie by sea, to breake the bridge of shippes which Xerxes had caused to be made: to the ende, said he, that we maye take ASIA into EVROPE. Aristides liked not this opinion, for we haue (said he) fought all this while against this barbarous King, who thought but to playe with vs: But if we shut him within GREECE, and bring him to fight of necessitie to saue his life: such anemie that commaundeth so great an armie, will no more stand still as a looker on, and set at his ease vnder his golden pavilion, to see the pastime of the battell, but will proue euerie waye, and be him selfe in euery place at all assayes to take him self from such a straight & daunger. Thus with politicke care & foresight, he maye easily amend his former faulte committed by negligence, and doe well enough, when he shall see his life and Kingdome both depend vpon it. Therefore Themistocles, I would thinke not best to breake his bridge at all, which he hath caused to be made: but rather if we could, to build another to it, to driue him out of Evrota as fone as we could. Themistocles then replied: Seeing you thinke this were good to be done, we must all laye our heades together, to deuise, how he maye be forced to come out as fone as we could. They breaking of with this resolutio, Themistocles sent immediately one of the Kings enuches, called Arseus, that was one of the gromes of his chaber, whom he found out amongst the prisoners, & by him he sent this message vnto the King. That the Grecians hauing wone the battell of him by sea, had decreed in their counsell, how they would goe to the straight of Hellespont, to breake the bridge of shippes he had caused to be made there. Whereof he thought good to aduertise him, for the goodwill he did beare him, and to the ende he might bethinke him betimes, to get him away to the sea within his own dominion, and so passe backe againe into Asia as fone as he could, whilst he gaue order to his allies and confederates, to staye following him at the poope. The barbarous King vnderstanding these newes, was so affrayed, that he hoied away with all possible speede. The further foresight and great wisdom of Themistocles, and Aristides, in marine causes, dyd manifestly appeare afterwards in the battell the Grecians fought before the citie of Platea, against Mardonius, king Xerxes lieutenant: who hauing but a small power of the King his foueraignes there, dyd yet put the Grecians to great distresse, and in hazard to haue lost all. Of all the townes and cities that fought in this battell, Herodotus writeth, that the citie of Ægina wanne the fame for valliantnes about the rest: & of priuate men, among the Grecians, Themistocles was iudged the worthiest man: although it was fore against their willes, because they enuid much his glory. For after the battell done, all the captaines being gotten into the straight of Peloponnesus, and hauing sworne vpon the altar of their sacrifices, that they would geue their voyces after their consciences, to those they thought had best deserued it: euery one gaue him selfe the first place for worthines, and the seconde vnto Themistocles. The Lacedæmonians caried him into Sparta, where they iudged the honour and dignitie to their admirall Eurybiades: but the wisdom and policie they attributed to Themistocles. In token thereof they gaue him an olue branche, and the goodliest coche that was in their citie: and moreover they sent three hundred of their lusty youtnes to accompany him, and conducte him out of their countrie. They saie, at the next feastes and assembly of the playes Olympicall that were made after this victorie: when Themistocles was once come into the shoue place where these games were played, the people looked no more on them that fought, but all cast their eyes on him, shewing him to the strangers which knewe him not, with their fingers, and by clapping of their handes dyd wisse how much they esteemed him. Whereat he him selfe tooke so great delite, that he confessed to his familiar friends, he then dyd reape the fruite and benefit of his sundry and painefull seruices he had taken in hande, for the preferuacion of Greece: so ambitious was he of nature, & couetous of honour, as we maye easily perceyue by certen of his dedes and notable sayings they haue noted of him. For being choien admirall of Athens he neuer dispatched any causes priuate or publicke, howsoever they fell out, vntill the very daye of his departure, and taking shippe: and all because that men seeing him yd much busines at once, and to speake with so many persones together, they should esteeme him to be the notabler man, & of the greater authoritie. Another time he walked vpon the sandes by the sea side, beholding the dead bodies of the barbarous people, which the sea had cast vp vpon the shore: and seeing some of them that had on still their chaynes of golde, and bracelets, he passed by on his waye, but shewed them yet to his familiar friends that followed him, and sayed vnto him: take thou those, for thou art not Themistocles. And vnto one Aniphas, who in his youth had bene a goodly young boye, and at that time dyd scornfully behaue him selfe vnto him, making no reckoning of him: and now that he sawe him in authoritie came to seee him, he sayed, O my young sonne, and friend: we are both euen at one time, (but to late) growen wise. He sayed the Athenians dyd not esteeme

A esteeme of him in time of peace: but when any storme of warres were towards, and they stood in any daunger, they ranne to him then, as they ranne to the shadowe of a plane tree, vpon any sodaine raine: and after fayer weather come againe, they cut awaye then the branches, and bowghes thereof. There was a man borne in the Ile of Seripha, who being fallen out with him, dyd cast him in the teethe, that it was not for his worthines, but for the noble citie wherein he was borne, that he had wonne such glorie. Thou sayest true he said: but neither should I euer haue wonne any great honour, if I had bene a Seriphian, nor thou also if thou haddest bene an Athenian. An other time one of the captaines of the citie, hauing done good seruice vnto the common weale, made boast before Themistocles, and compared his seruice equall with his. Themistocles to answer him, tolde him a prety tale. That the working daye brawled on a time with the holy daye, repining against her, that he laboured for his liuing continually, and howe he dyd nothing but fill her bellie, and spende that they had gotten. Thou hast reason sayed the holy daye. But if I had not bene before thee, thou haddest not bene here nowe. And so, if I had not bene then: where had you my masters bene nowe? His owne sonne was a litle to sawie with his mother, and with him also, bearing him selfe ouer boldly of her good will, by meanes of her cockering of him. Whereup being merely disposed, he would saye that his sonne could doe more then any man in all Greece. For, sayeth he, the Athenians commaunde the Grecians, I commaunde. Themistocles sayeth of his sonne. The Athenians, my wife commaundeth me, and my sonne commaundeth her. Moreouer because he would be singular by him selfe about all other men: hauing a peece of lande he would sell, he willed the crier to proclaime open sale of it in the market place, and with all he should adde vnto the sale, that his lande laye by a good neighbour. An other time, two men being futers to his daughter, he preferred the honeste before the richer, saying: he had rather haue to his sonne in lawe a man that lacked goodes, then goodes to lacke a man. These were Themistocles pleasaunt conceits and answers. But after he had done all these things we haue spoken of before, he tooke in hande to buyld againe the citie and walles of Athens, and dyd corrupt the officers of Lacedæmonia with money, to the end they should not hinder his purpose, as Theopompus writeth. Or as all other saye when he had deceyued them by this subtiltie, he went vnto Sparta as ambassadour, sent thither of purpose vpon the complaints of the Lacedæmonians, for that the Athenians had dyd inclose their citie againe with walles, who were accused vnto the counsaill of Sparta, by an orator called Polarichus, who was sent thither from the Æginets, of purpose to prosecute this matter against the Athenians. Themistocles stowly denied it to them, and prayed them for better vnderstanding of the trothe, they would sende some of their men thither to see it. This was but a fetche only to winne by this delaye, the Athenians should keepe as oftages for surtie of his persone, tho they should send to Athens, to bring backe the reporte thereof: and so it fell out. For the Lacedæmonians being informed of the trothe as it was, dyd him no hurte, but dissembling the misliking they had to be thus abused by him, sent him awaye safe and sounde. Afterwards he made them also mende and fortifie the hauen of Piræa, hauing considered the situation of the place, and all to incline the citie to the sea. Wherein he dyd directly contrary to all the counsell of the auncient kings of Athens: who seeking (as they saye) to withdrawe their people from the sea, and to accustomethem to lue vpon the lande, by planting, sowing, and plowing their groundes, dyd deuise and geue out abroade, the fable they tell of the goddess Pallas. And that is this, how the contending with Neptune about the patronage of the country of Athens, brought forth and shewed to the iudges the olyue tree, by meanes whereof the preuayled, and obtained the preheminece. Euen so Themistocles dyd not ioyne the hauen of Piræa, vnto the citie of Athens, as the comicall poet Aristophanes sayeth: but rather ioynd the citie vnto the hauen Piræa, and the lande vnto the sea. By this meanes he made the people strong against the nobilitie, and brought the communalitie to waxe bolder then they were before, by reason the rule and authoritie fell into the handes of saylers, mariners, pilottes, shippemasters, and such kinde of seafaring men: so as the pulpet where all the oracles were made, Roode in the market place of Pnyx, and dyd looke towards the sea. But the thirtie A tyrannies that came in afterwarde, dyd remoue it, and turne it towards the lande: holding opinion to be strong by sea, was it that dyd mainteine the authoritie of the popular state. And that contrariwise they which liue by the labour and toyle of the earth, doe more willingly like the government of Nobilitie. Themistocles called to minde another matter also of greater importance, to make the cittie of Athens of a greater power by sea. For after the retire of Xerxes, and that all the flete and naue of the Grecians wintered in the haue of Pagase: he sayed one daye in an open assembly of the people, that he had thought of a thing which would be very profitable and beneficiall for them, but it was not to be tolde openly. The people willed him then to imparte it to Aristides: and if he thought it good, they would execute it speedely. Themistocles then tolde Aristides: the thing he had considered of, was to burne the Arcenal where the Grecians navy laye, and to set on fire all their shippes. Aristides hearing his purpose, returned to the people, and tolde them: how nothing could be more profitable, but with all more vniust, then that which Themistocles had deuiled. The Athenians then willed Aristides it should be let alone altogether. Furthermore when the Lacedemonians had exhibited their petition to the counsell of the Amphityons (that is the generall counsaill of all the states of Greece assembled) howe the townes and citties of Greece which had not bene parties with the Grecians to the league, against the barbarous people, should be put of wholly from this counsaill. Themistocles dowing of the Argives, the Thessalians, and the Thebans also should by this meanes be exempted, that the Lacedemonians would be then the greater number in voyces, and by this meanes might doe what they would in this counsell: he spake so considerably for the cities which they would haue thus discharged, that he made the petitioners in the assembly vtterly to chaunge their opinion. Declaring, howe there were but one and thirtie cities comprised only the league, and yet that some of them were very weake and small: and howe it were no reason, that reiecting all the rest of Greece, the greatest authoritie of this counsaill should fall into the hands of two or three of the chiefe cities alone. For this cause chiefly the Lacedemonians dyd euer beare him extreme hatred, and dyd set vp Cimon all they could, to be alwayes aduersary opposit vnto him, and as it were to bearde him in all matters of state, and the government of Athens. They procured him besides, the ill will and displeasure of all the friends and confederates of the Athenians, for that he went sayling still to and from longest the Iles, exacting money of the inhabitants of the same. And this is to be known by the matter propounded by him to the Andrians (of whom he would haue had money) and by the answer they made him, as Herodotus writeth. Which was, howe he had brought them two mightie goddesses: Loue, and Force. And they answered him againe, that they also had two great goddesses, which kept them from geuing of him any money: Pouertie, and Impossibilitie. And to make this good also: Timocreon the Rhodian poet galled him to the quicke, when he sharply taunted him, for calling many home againe for money that were banished: and howe for couetousnes of money he had betrayed, and forsaken, his hoste and friende. The verses wherein this matter is mentioned, are to this effecte.

O Muse, let these my verses be disperst, throughout all Greece, since they deserue no lesse:
and since the truthe vrubich is in them vrhears, deseruethe fame, vrubich no man should suppress.

They saye the cause was, why this Timocreon was banished: the friendshippe which he had with the Barbarous people, and for geuing them intelligence. Whereof Themistocles was one that iudicially condemned him. Wherefore when Themistocles him selfe was accused afterwards of the same faulte, Timocreon then made these verses following against him.

Timocreon was not vrwithout his pheere, vrubich did conferre vrwith Medes priuely, Since others mo, the selfe same blame might beare, mo foxes lurke in denmes as vrwell as I.

Besides these verses, Themistocles owne citizens for the ill will they bare him, were contented to heare him ill spoken of. Therefore while he sought wayes, to redresse all this: he was driuen to vse such meane, which more increased their hatred toward him. For in his orations to the people, he dyd ofte remember them of the good seruice he had done them: and perceyuing howe they were offended withall, he was driuen to saye. Why, are ye weary so ofte to receyue good by one man? Many of them were very angry with him also, when he furnished Diana (in the dedication of her temple he made vnto her) Aristobule, as much to saye, as the good counsellor: meaning thereby, howe he had geuen graue and wise counsell, both vnto his cittie, and to all the rest of the Grecians. He built this temple also neere his house, in a place called Melita, where the hangemen doe cast the dead bodies of those that were executed, and throwe the ragges and halters endes of those that were hanged, or otherwise put to death by lawe. There was also in our dayes in the temple of Diana Aristobule, a litle image of Themistocles, which shewed plainly, that he was not only wise, and of a noble minde, but also of a great maiestie and countenance in face. In the ende, the Athenians banished him Athens for fure yeres, because they would plucke downe his ouergreat corage and authoritie, as they dyd vse to serue those, whose greates they thought to be more, then common equalitie that ought to be among citizens would beare. For this manner of banishment for a time, called Ostracifmon, was no punishment for any faulte committed, but a mitigation and taking away of the enuie of the people, which delited to plucke downe their stomaks that too much seemed to excede in greates: and by this meanes they tooke awaye the poyson of his malice, with diminishing his glorie and honour. So Themistocles being banished Athens, went to dwell in ARGOS. In this meane season, Pausanias treachery fell out, which gaue his enemies occasion to lye heauie on his backe. But he which became his accuser, & was partener of the treason, was one called Leobotes (Alcemon sonne) borne in a village called A GRAYLA. Besides this, the SPARTANS also dyd fit on his skirres, & charged him sorely. For Pausanias neuer before reuealed to Themistocles the treason he had purposed, although he was his very familiar friende. But after he sawe Themistocles was banished, and dyd take his exile very vnpatiently: then Pausanias was bolde to open his treason to him, to procure him to take his parte, and shewed him the letters the king of PERSIA had written to him, and all to sturte him vp against the GRECIANS, as against vngratefull and vnnatural people. Howbeit Themistocles shooke him of, and tolde him plainly he would be no partener of his treason. Notwithstanding, he neuer reuealed it to any liuing creature, nor discovered the practise he intended: hoping either he would haue geuen it ouer; or that shortly it would appeare by some other meane, considering he so fondly aspired to things of great danger, and without purpose or possibility. After Pausanias was condemned, and had suffered paynes of death for the same: they found amongst his papers, certaine writings and letters, which made Themistocles to be very sore suspected. Whereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS on the one side cried out of him: and his enemies and ill willers at ATHENS accused him on th'other side. To the which he made answer by letters from the beginning, and wrote vnto the people, it was not likely that he (who fought all the wayes to rule, and was not borne to serue, neither had any minde thereto) would euer haue thought in his heade, to sell his owne libertie, and the GRECIANS also vnto the Barbarous people their enemies. Notwithstanding this purgation of his, the people by the procurement of his enemies, sent to apprehend him, and to bring him before the states of all GRECE, to be iudged by that counsaill. Whereof Themistocles hauing intelligence in time, he dyd conuey him selfe into the Ile of CORPHU, because the citie there was greatly beholding to him, for a certain pleasure in time past he had done them. For they being at lute and strife with the CORINTHIANS, he tooke vp the matter betweene them, and gaue iudgement on their side, & condemned the CORINTHIANS to paye them twety talents damages: and did set downe an order, that they should occupie the Ile of LEUCADE in comon together, as ground that had bene inhabited with the people, as well of the one citie, as of the other. From thence he fled to EPIRUS, whether being followed by the ATHENIANS, & the LACEDÆMONIANS, he was compelled to venter him selfe vpon a doubtfull and very dangerous hope. For he went to yelde him selfe into the hands of Ametus, king of the MOLOSSIANS. Who hauing heretofore made certain requestes vnto the ATHENIANS, and being shamefully denied them by meanes of Themistocles (who then was at his chiefeest height and authoritie) the King was maruelously offended with him: and it was a clere case in dedde, that if he could then haue layed handes on him, he would haue bene reuenged of him thoroughly. Howbeit feeling the present miserie of his exile, he thought he might lesse feare the Kings olde quarrell and displeasure, then the sicke hate & enuie of his contriemen. Whereupon he went vnto king Ametus, trusting to his mercie, and became an humble suer to him in a straunge extraordinarie forte. For he tooke the Kings litle young sonne in his armes, and went and kneeled downe before the altar in his chappell: which humble manner of suinge the MOLOSSIANS take to be most effectual, and such as they dare not denie, nor refuse. Some saye that Queene Phibia her selfe, the Kings wife, dyd enforce him of this their country custome and manner, & brought her litle sonne also neere vnto the altar. Other write also, that it was Ametus him selfe that taught & shewed him this inforcing manner of petition, only for a cloke to excuse him selfe to those that should come to demaunde Themistocles of him: that by duetie of religion he was so straightly bounde & restrained, that he might not deliuer him out of his protection. In this meane time, Epirotas Atharnian founde the meanes secretly to conuey Themistocles wife and children out of ATHENS, & dyd send them priuilege vnto him: whereupon he was afterwards accused, & put to death, vpon Cimons accusation & motion, as Stesimbrotus writeth. Who not remembering those matters I knowe not howe, or making as though Themistocles had not remembered him selfe, doo saye, that Themistocles layed into SICILE, where he fought to marry Hierons daughter, the tyranne of SYRACUSA: promising him if he would let him haue her, he would

As would assure him to conquer all GRECE for him, and to bring them vnder his obedience. But Hieron refusing this offer, Themistocles went from thence into ASIA: but that is not likely. For Theophrastus writeth in his booke intituled of Kingdomes, that Hieron hauing sent certain running hories to the feast of games Olympical, & hauing let vp a maruelous riche and sumptuous tent there: Themistocles made an oration to the GRECIANS, declaring vnto them how they should teare the tyrannes tente in peces, and not to suffer his hories to runne with other swite and light hories, and to cary away the price in those holy games. Thucydides againe declareth, howe he went vnto the other sea, and imbarked in the citie of PYDNE, being knowne of neuer a man in the shippe, vntill such time as the winde beganne to carie them into the Ile of NAXOS, which the ATHENIANS by chaunce dyd besiege at that time, where being afeard to be set on lande, he was forced to bewraye him selfe to the master of the shippe, & the masters mate, and wrought them, what with fayer wordes and what with threats (by saying he would accuse them to the ATHENIANS, that they dyd not ignorantly receiue him in, but hired for money) so as he compelled them to sayle on further, and to cary him into ASIA. As for his goodes, his friends saued the most parte of them, and sent them into ASIA to him. But for those that came to light, and were confiscate vnto the state: Theopompus writeth, they dyd amounte to the value of one hundred talents. And Theophrastus sayeth, but to foure score talents only. So that all his goodes was not worth three talents, when he beganne to gouerne the state of the common weale. when he came vnto the citie of CYMA, he perceyued that all the coastes by sea were layed for him to apprehend him, and that he had many spyalls vpon him: among the which, there were two speciall noted men, Ergoteles, and one Pythodorus, the reward being very great, for men that fought their gayne any waye they could. For the king of PERSIA had proclaymed by sound of trüpet, two hundred talents to him that brought him Themistocles. Whereupon he fled vnto a litle towne of ÆOLIA, called ÆORS, where no liuing bodie knewe him, but his host only, called Nicogenes: who was the richest man of all the ÆOLIANS, and knewe all the noble men of authoritie that were about the king of PERSIA. Themistocles continued hidden certen dayes in his house: in which time, on a night after the feast of a sacrifice, one Olbius, schoolemaster to Nicogenes children, by some secret working of the goddes, sodainly fell besides him selfe, and beganne to singe these verses out alowde.

Doe thou belecue, what so the night the tells and geue thy voyce, thy counsell and conceits Vnto the night, in darcksonnes that durvells, thereon also thy victorie auarits.

The next night following, Themistocles being fast asleepe in his bed, dreamed that a snake wounde it selfe round about his bellie, and glided vpwardes to his necke, vntill it touched his face, and sodainly then it became an eagle, and embraced him with his winges: and so at length dyd liue him vp into the ayer, and caried him a maruelous waye of, vntill he thought he sawe a golden rodde (suche as Heraldes vse to carie in their handes) whereupon the eagle dyd let him, and so was deliuered of all this feare and trouble he thought him selfe in. The trothe was, Nicogenes had this deulse in his heade, howe he might bring him safe to the king of PERSIAs court. The Barbarous nations for the most parte (and specially the PERSIANS) are of a very straunge nature, and maruelous ielous ouer their women, and that not onely of their wiues, but also of their bonde women, and concubines: which they keepe so straightly locked vp, that no man euer seeth them abroad at any time, but are all wayes like housedoues kept within doores. And when they haue any occasion to goe into the country, they are caried in close coches couered all about, that no man can looke into them. Themistocles was conueyed into one of these coches drest after this manner, and had warned his men to answer those they met by the waye, that asked whom they caried: howe it was a young GRECIAN gentlewoman of the countrie of IONIA, which they caried to the court for a noble man there. Thucydides, and Charon Lampsaecian saye, he went thither after the death of Xerxes, and spake with his sonne there. But Ephorus, Dino, Clisarchus, Heraclides, and many other write, that he spake with him selfe. Yet notwithstanding it appeareth that Thucydides wordes doe best agree with the chronicles & tables, recording the succession of times, although they be of no great certaintie. Themistocles being come nowe to the sworde pointe (as it were) and to the extremite of his daunger: dyd first present him selfe vnto one Artabanus, Colonell of a thousand foote men, and sayed vnto him, Syr, I am a Grecian borne, and desire to speake with the King: I haue matters of importance to open to his maiestie, and such as I knowe he will thanckfully receyue. Artabanus answered him in this manner. My friend, syr stranger, the lawes and customes of men are diuers, and some take one thing for honest, others some another thing: but it is most honestly for all men, to keepe and obserue the lawes and manners of their owne countrie. For you Grecians haue the name to loue libertie, and equalitie about all things: & for vs, amongst all the goodly lawes and customes we haue, we esteeme this about the rest: to reuerence and honour our King, as the image of the god of nature, who keepeth all things in their perfect life and state. Wherefore, if thou wilt facill thy selfe after our manner to honour the King, thou mayest both see him, and speake with him: but if thou haue another minde with thee, then must thou of necessitie vise some thirde persone for thy meane. For this is the manner of our countrie: the King neuer geueth audience to any man, that hath not first honoured him. Themistocles hearing what he sayed, answered him againe. My lord Artabanus, the great good will I beare vnto the King, and the desire I haue to aduance his glorie and power, is the only cause of my present repaire vnto his court: therefore I meane not only to obey your lawes (since it hath so pleased the goddes to rayse vp the noble empire of Persia vnto this greatnes) but will cause many other people also to honour the King, more then there doe at this present. Therefore let there be no stay, but that my selfe in persone maye deliuer to the King that I haue to saye vnto him. Well, sayed Artabanus: whom then shall we saye thou arte? For by thy speache it seemeth, thou art a man of no meane state and condition. Themistocles answered him: as for that Artabanus, none shall knowe before the King him selfe. Thus doth Phanias reporte it. But Erastophanes, in his booke he wrote of riches, addeth further: howe Themistocles had access vnto this Artabanus, being recommended to the King by a woman of Eretria, whom the King kept. Themistocles being brought to his presence, after he had presented his humble duty and reuerence to him, stood on his feete, and sayed neuer a worde, vntill the King commaunded the interpreter to aske him what he was? and he answered. Maye it please your maiestie, o noble King: I am Themistocles the Athenian, a banished man out of my country by the Grecians, who humbly repayreth to your highnes, knowing I haue done great hurt to the Persians, but I perswade myself I haue done them farre more good then harme. For it was that kept the Grecians backe they dyd not follow you, whē the state of Greece was deliuered from thralldome, and my native country from daunger, and that I knew I stood then in good state to pleasure you. Nowe for me, I finde all mens good willes agreeable, to my present misery and calamitie: for I come determined, most humbly to thancke your highnes, for any grace and fauour you shall shewe me, & also to craue humble pardone, if your maiesty be yet offended with me. And therefore licence me (most noble King) to beseech you, that taking mine enemies the Grecians for witnesses of the pleasures I haue done the Persian nation, you will of your princely grace vise my harde fortune, as a good occasion to shewe your honorable vertue, rather then to satisfie the passion of your heate and choller. For in sauing my life, your maiestie faueth an humble suter that put him selfe to your mercie: and in putting me to death, you shall ryd away an enemy of the Grecians. Hauing spoken thus these words, he sayed further. That the goddes, by diuers signes and tokens had procured him, to come to submit him selfe vnto him, and tolde the King what vision he had seene in his dreame in Nicogenes house: and declared also the oracle of Iupiter Dodonian, who had commaunded him that he should goe vnto him that was called as a god, and howe he thought it was the persone of his maiestie, because that god and he in trothe were called both great Kings. The King hauing thus heard him speake, gaue him then no present answer againe, notwithstanding he maruelously wondred at his great wisdome and boldenes. But afterwarde amongst his familiars the King sayed, he thought him selfe very happy to mete with the good fortune of Themistocles coming to him: and so besought his great god Arimanius, that he would allwayes send his enemies such mindes, as to banish the greatest, & wisest men amongst them.

It is reported also he did sacrifice vnto the goddes, to geue them thanks therefore, and disposed him selfe presently to be merry, in so much as dreaming in the night, in the middle of his dreame he cried out three times together for ioye I haue Themistocles the Athenian. The next morning the King hauing sent for the chiefe lordes of his court, he made Themistocles also to be brought before him: who looked for no goodnes at all, especially when he sawe the soldiers warding at the court gates, geue him ill countenance and language both, when they behelde him, and vnderstood his name. Moreouer, Roxanes, one of the captaines as Themistocles passed by him going to the King (who was set in his chayer of state, and every man keeping silence) softly sighing, sayed vnto him. O thou Greek the serpent, subtil and malicious: the Kings good fortune hath brought thee hether. Neuertheless when he came to the King, he had once againe made him a very humble and lowe reuerence: the King saluted him, & spake very curteously to him, saying. I am nowe your detter of two hundred talents, for presenting your selfe. It is good reason I should deliuer you the money promised him that should haue brought you: but I geue you a further warrant, be bolde I charge you, & speake your minde freely, saye what you thinke of the state of Greece. Themistocles then answered him. That mens wordes did properly resemble the stories and imagery in a peece of arras: for both in the one & in the other, the goodly images of either of them are seene, when they are vnfolded and layed open. Contrariwise they appeare not, but are lost, when they are shut vp, & close folded: whereupon he sayed to the King, he must nedes require some further time of answer. The King liked his comparison passingly well, & willed him to appointe his owne time. Themistocles asked a yere, in which time hauing prettily learned the Persian tongue, he afterwards spake to the King him selfe without any interpreter. So, such as were no courtiers, thought he only talked with the King of matters of Greece. But because the change & alteration of the court fell out great, at that time, the noble men imagined he had bene so bolde to comon with the King of them, also. Thereupon they greatly enuid him, & afterwarde murmured much against him. For indeede the king dyd honour Themistocles about all other straigers whatsoeuer they were. On a time the king had him out a hunting with him, he made him see his mother, with whom he grew familiar: and by the kings owne commaundement he was to heare the disputations of the wise men of Persia touching secret philosophie, which they call magike. Demaratus the Lacedemonian being at that time in the court of Persia, the king willing him to aske what gifte he would. He besought the king to graunt him this fauour: to licence him to goe vp & down the citie of Sardis, with his royall hat on his head, as the kings of Persia doe. Demaratus the kings cofin, taking him by the had, sayed vnto him. Demaratus, the kings hatte thou demaundest, and if it were on thy heade, it would couer but litle wit: Naye though Iupiter dyd geue thee his lightning in thy hande, yet that would not make thee Iupiter. But the king gaue him so sharpe a repulse for his vnreasonable request, & was so angrie with him for it, that it was thought he would neuer haue forgiven him: howbeit Themistocles was so earnest a suter for him, that he brought him into fauour againe. And the reporte goeth, that the kings successfull which haue bene since that time, vnder whom the Persians haue had more dealings with the Grecians, then in former dayes: when they would retaine any great estate or personage of Greece into their seruice, they wrote vnto him, and promised him they would make him greater about them, then euer was Themistocles about Xerxes. That which is written of him, doth also confirme it. For he being stept vp to great countenance and authority, & followed with great traines of suters after him by reason of his greatnes: seing him selfe one daye very honorably serued at his table, & with all sortes of dainty meates, he turned him to his childre, & sayed vnto them. My sonnes, we should haue bene vndone, if we had not bene vndone. The most writers doe agree, that he had giuen him the reueneue of 3. citiees for his allowance of bread, wine & vittrailes to wit, Magnesia, Lampsacys, & Mvnta. But Neithes Cyzicenia, & Phanias, doe adde two other citiees more, Percota, & Palesscepstia: the one to defraye his charges of apparell, & the other for his lodging. Afterwarde Themistocles going into the lowe countries towards the sea, to take order against the practises of the Grecians: there was a Persian lord called Epixies (gouernour of highe Phrygia) that had layed a traine to kill him (hauing of long time hired certaine murderers of Pisidia to doe it) so soone as he should come into a towne of his gouernment, called the Lyons head. But as he slept on a daye, A in his house in the after none, the mother of the goddess appeared vnto him, and sayed, Themistocles, goe not to the Lyons heade, for feare thou meete with the Lyon: and for this warning, I doe aske thy daughter Mnesipolema for my seruante. Themistocles waking sodainly out of his dreame, made his prayer vnto the goddesse, and turning out of the highe waye, fetched another compasse about. Afterwardes hauing passed that towne, he tooke his lodging being benighted: but one of the beastes which caried his tente, fell by the waye, vnfurnatly in a riuer, and all his arras and tapestry hangings being thoroughly wet, his seruants were driuen to laye them out a drying by moone light. The Pisidians that laye in wayte, and could not discerne by moone light that they were hangings layed out to drye, thought it had bene the very tente Themistocles selfe dyd ly in: whereupon they went vnto it with their swordes B drawn in their handes, hoping to haue taken him sleeping. But when they were come thither, and beganne to liſt vp a peece of the hangings: some of the people of Themistocles (which kept watche) perceyuing them, ranne vpon them, and tooke them. So Themistocles hauing escaped this danger, wondred greatly at the fauour of the goddesse which had appeared vnto him. In recompence whereof, when he was in the citie of Magnesia, he built a temple vnto Dindymena, and made his daughter Mnesipolema prioreſſe of the same. As he passed by the citie of Sardis for his recreation, he went to visite the temples, and offerings that had bene geuen there. So he sawe an image of a mayden in copper, in the temple of the mother of the goddess, being two yeardes highe, which they called the Hydrophora: as much to saye, as the water carier. And it was a statue, which him selfe had heretofore dedicated, and caused to be made, with the fines of those that had payed forfeitures, for stealing or turning awaye the water course at Athens, at ſuche time as he was maſter ſurueyer of the water workes and conduites there. Wherefore, whether Themistocles was ſory to ſee this goodly image a priſoner in the handes of the Barbarous people, or that he would ſhowe vnto the Athenians the greatnes of his credit and authoritie through all the Kings dominions: he ſpake to the gouernour of Lydia, & prayed him for his ſake that he would lend this image againe to Athens. But this Barbarous gouernour was very angry with his request, and tolde him he would aduertise the King thereof. Then Themistocles beganne to be aſeard, & was driuen to ſeeke to the gouernours women and concubines, whom he got for money to intreate him, and ſo made ſayre weather againe with the gouernour. But from thenceforth, he tooke D better garde of him ſelfe in all his doings, greatly fearing the enuy of the Barbarous people. For he progreſſed not vp and downe Asia, as Theopompus writeth, but laye a long time in the citie of Magnesia, quietly enioying the Kings gracious giſtes beſtowed on him: where he was honoured & reuerenced for one of the greateſt perſones of Persia, whileſt the King was els where occupied in the affaires of the highe prouinces of Asia, and had no leysure to thincke vpon thoſe of Greece. But when newes was brought him, that Aegypt was rebelled, by meanes of the fauour & aſſiſtance of the Athenians, & that the Grecians gallyes dyd ſcowre the ſeaes euen vnto the Ile of Cyprus, & vnto the coaſtes of Cilicia, & that Cimon had all the ſea in ſubiectiō: that made him then to bende all his thoughts howe to reſiſt the Grecians, that their greatnes might not turne to his hurte. Then commiſſions went out E to leauy men, to aſſemble capitaines, & to diſpatche poſtes vnto Themistocles at Magnesia, with the Kings letters, ſtraightly charging him to haue an eye to the Grecians doings, and moreouer that he ſhould faithfully keepe his promiſe he had made to him. But he, to ſhewe that he neither maliced his citizeins, nor was moued with the deſire of greatnes and authoritie he might haue growen vnto in thoſe warres, or els for that he thought the Kings expectation would proue to a greater matter, then he could ende or waſte through, conſidering Greece was full at that time of famous capitaines, and that Cimon amongſt the reſt had maruelous good fortune, and that it ſhould be a reproche to him to ſtayne the glorie of ſo many noble actes, ſo many triumphes, and ſo great victories as Cimon had done and wonne: he tooke a wiſe reſolution with him ſelfe, to make ſuche an ende of his life, as the F fame thereof deſerued. For he made a ſolemne ſacrifice vnto the goddes, and feaſted at the ſame all his friends. And, after he had taken his leaue of them all, he dranke bulles bloude,

A as moſt men thincke (or as other ſaye) by ſon, which diſpatcheth a man in foure and twenty howers, and ſo ended his dayes in the citie of Magnesia, after he had liued threeſcore and ſue yeres, and the moſt parte of them in wayes in office, and great charge. It is written, that the king of Persia vnderſtanding the cauſe and manner of his death, dyd more eſteeme him afterwardes, then he dyd before, and that euer after he continued to vie his friends and familiars in very good ſorte. For he left children behinde him, which he had of Archippa (Lyſanders daughter) of the towne of Aloracia: Archeptola, Polyeuctus, and Cleophantus, of whom Plato the philoſopher maketh mention, ſaying that he was a good man at armes, but otherwiſe that there was no goodnes in him. His other ſonnes that were elder, as Neocles, dyed being bitten with a horſe: and as for Diocles, another ſonne, his grandfather Lyſander dyd adopt him for his ſonne. He had many daughters, of the which Mnesipolema (which he had by a ſeconde wiſe) was married vnto her halſe brother Archeptola, for they were not both of one venter: An other called Italia, was married vnto one Pamphides of Chios. Sybaris, vnto Nicomedes an Athenian. And Nicomacha, vnto Pharſicles, Themistocles nephew: vnto whom her brethern dyd mary her within the citie of Magnesia, after the death of their father. This Pharſicles dyd bring vp Asia, which was the youngſt of all his daughters. Furthermore, his ſumptuous tombe ſtandeth yet in the market place of Magnesia. But that Andocides writeth of his bones, in a booke he made to his friendes, is not to be credited, which was: that the Athenians hauing founde the aſhes of his bones, dyd caſt them vp into the ayer, as a deuſe to ſturte vp the noble men againſt the people. And C Phylarchus in his hiftorie (much like vnto the ſayned ſubtilties of a tragedie) bringeth in I can not tell what Neocles, and Demopolis, for Themistocles ſonnes, to moue the readers with compaſſion. Howbeit no man is ſo ſimple, but will iudge it ſtraight a very fayning and deuſe. Diodorus the eoſmographer alſo, in a booke he hath written of tumbes and monuments ſayeth, by coniecture, rather then of any certen knowledge: that alongſt the hauē of Piræus, coming towards the head of Alcimus, there is a foreland in forme of an elbowe, within the which when they haue doubled the pointe, the ſea is alwayes calme, and there they finde a great and long foundation or baſe, vpon the which there is as it were the forme of an altar, and that is (ſayeth he) Themistocles tombe. And he ſuppoſeth that Plato the comicall poet doth wiſeſſe it in theſe verſes.

Furius Camillus.

Why Camillus never came to be Consul. The authority of a free, adious to the common people.

Camillus wisdom and modestie.

Camillus humble.

AMONGEST many great matters which are spoken of this Furius Camillus, this seemeth most straunge and wonderfull about the rest. That he hauing borne the chiefe offices of charge in his country, and hauing done many notable and worthy deedes in the same: as one that was chosen five times Dictator, and had triumphed foure times, and had wonne him selfe the name & title of the seconde founder of Rome, and yet neuer came to be Consul. But the only cause thereof was, that the common weale of Rome stood then in such state and forte. The people were then at disension with the Senate.

They would chuse no more Consuls, but other kynde of gouernours whom they called Tribuni militares: these dyd all things with like power & authoritie as the Consuls, yet were they nothing so odious vnto the people, by reason of the number that was of them. For it was some hope to them that could ill beare the rule of the small number of nobilitie, that the government of the state being put into fixe, and not into two officers hands, their rule would be the easier, and tollerabler. Nowe Camillus being at that time in his best credit and authoritie, and in the prime and glorie of his doings, dyd not desire to be made Consul without the goodwill of the people, although whilste he was in authoritie, there were many times Consuls created. But to all other offices and dignities, he was called, and chosen. He behaued him selfe in such forte, that when he was alone, he made his authoritie comon to other: and when he had companions & associates, the glorie of all redounded to him selfe alone. The cause whereof, was his modestie on the one side, for he commaunded euer without enuie: and his great wisdom and sufficiencie on the other side, for the which all others willingly gaue him place, and yelded to him. The house of the Furians being at that time of no great fame, he was the first that beganne to set him selfe forwards. For in a great battell which was fought against the Aques and Volsces, he being but a priuate man at armes vnder the Dictator Posthumius Tubertus, was the first that riding out of the army, aduanced him selfe, and gaue the charge. And being runne into the thighe at that time with a staffe broken vpon his thighe, he plucked the truncheon out, and retired not for all that: but geuing charge againe vpon the stoutest of the enemies, he fought it out so valiantly to the encouraging of other, that he was the chief cause they turned their backs. Whereupon, to requite his seruice done at that time (besides other

A honours they dyd him) they made him Censor: an office at that time of great preheminent & dignitie. In his office of Censorshippe, he dyd two notable acts. The one very honest: which he brought men that were not married, to marie the women whom the warres had left widows, which were in nuber many. To this he got them partly by persuation, & partly by threatnings, to set round fines vpon their heads that refused. The other very necessary: in that he brought the orphans to be contributories, vnto taxes, & subsidies, which before payed nothing. The cause thereof was, the continuall warres, about the which the common weale sustained great charges: but specially about the siege of the citie of the VEIANS (which some call VENETIANIAN) that was a very foreburden to the at that time. For it was the capital citie of all THYSCAN, the which for store of armour, & nuber of souldiers, was nothing inferiour vnto the citie of Rome.

Camillus acts in his Censorshippe.

The citie of Veies besieged.

B For the VEIANS being growen to stomake & corage in time, by reason of their wealth & prosperitie, & for the sundry great battells they had fought against the ROMAINES, that conckred with them for glory and empire: now it fell so out, that they finding them selues weakened by many great ouerthrowes, which they had receyued of the ROMAINES, they did let fall their former peacockes brauery, & ambition, to byd them battell any more in the fildes. Howbeit the inhabitants of the citie of VEIES hauing raised the walles, & made very great high rampers, beganne to fortifie them selues, & made good prouision for armour & munition, besides store of corne, shotte, & other necessary things: they valiantly, & without feare of any thing, defended the siege of the ROMAINES, that continued long time, & was no lesse hard & painefull vnto the that did besiege, then it was vnto those that were besieged. For where the ROMAINES were wont before time to keepe their houses in the winter season, and the fildes only in the sommer time: that was the first time they were compelled by the captaines and Tribuni militares, to buyld fortres, and to intrenche their campe with a wall, euen in their enemies countie, and to winter abroad as they were wont to lye in the campe in sommer. Nowe this siege had continued seuen whole yeres together. The captaines were burdened that they dyd not their duties, nor stood manfully to their charge: whereupon in the end they were discharged, and other captaines placed in their roomes to followe the siege. Among those, Camillus was one, whom then the seconde time they created Tribunus militaris. Who notwithstanding dyd nothing then in that siege, because it was his happe by lot, to make warres vpon the PHALERIANS, and the CAPENATES. These people whilste the ROMAINES were occupied other where, had

D invaded their countie, and done them great harme, during the time of their warre with the THYSCANS. But Camillus hauing ouerthrowen a great number of them in the fildes, had the rest in chafe, and draue them to take their citie, and dyd shut them vp within their owne walles. The chance that happened at the lake of the ALBANVS, about the time the THYSCAN warres were greatest, dyd maruelously amare the ROMAINES, being no lesse wonderfull, then the most straunge and vncrediblest thing that could be tolde by man. For they could not finde out the cause of it by common reason, nor any naturall ground: considering it was in the latter end of Autumne, and sommer was ended, and that there had not bene much rayne, nor notable fowth winds. And although there are many lakes, many brooks & riuers, many springs, and other waters in ITALIE: yet some of them dried vp altogether, other ranne but faintly

The wonderfull overflowing of the lake Albanus.

E by reason of the drought, and all the riuers then were (as they are wont to be commonly in sommer) very lowe, and there was scanty any water. But the lake ALBANVS contrariwise, that cometh from no other place, neither runneth any whether out of him selfe, being enuironed all about with hilles and mountaines, and where the earthe is good: beganne to swell, and rise to euery mans sight, without any cause at all (but secret and hidden vnto the goddes alone) and went allwayes increasing alongest those hilles sides, vntill suche time as it came to be euen with the height of the highest mountaine, gathering vpwardes still without any waues or tempest of weather at all. This at the first, made poore shepheardes and heardeamen, keeping their cattell thereabouts, maruelously affrayed. But at the length when the earthe and weight of one of the hilles (which kepte in the lake as a walle,

F from running ouer into the felde) beganne to breake by reason of the waight, and great quantitie of water, that ranne straight with a maruelous extreme force and violence ouer all the arrable landes and groundes planted with trees, and so tooke his course into the sea: the ROMAINES then not alone, but the whole inhabitants of ITALY were wonderfully affrayed, and iudged that it was some signe and prognostication of some wonderfull thing to come. And there was no other newes currante in the campe, which laye at siege of the citie of VETES: in so much as the very brute of it flew ouer the walles of the citie, vnto them that were besieged. And as it happeneth very ofte in long sieges, that those which lye in campe doe oftentimes talke with them that are besieged: there was a ROMAINE who self acquainted, and commonly vied to talke familiarly with one of the citie, who could tell of many olde & straunge things done and happened, and was very skillfull aboue any other in the citie, in the arte of diuination, or soothelaying. The ROMAINE then tolde him one daye the violent breaking out of the lake ALBANVS, and perceyuing that the other after he had heard him, was as merry as a pye at the matter, and that he gibed at their siege: he tolde him further, that this wonderfull chauce was not only happened vnto the ROMAINES at that time, but that they had bene acquainted with many other farre more straunge then this, which he would very willingly open vnto him, to see if there were any remedy, that though the affaires of the common weale had but harde successe, yet he would procure that his owne priuate matters might prosper well with him. The VETIAN answered him, he would heare them with a goodwill, & gaue good eare vnto him, hoping to haue heard some great secret. So the ROMAINE training him on still from one matter to another, holding on his waye, vntill he sawe he was a good distance of from the gates of the citie, he sodainly caught holde on him, and by strong hand caried him awaye with him, and with helpe of other souldiers which came running out of the campe vnto him, he brought him to the captaines. The VETIAN seeing him self thus forcible vsed, and knowing also that fatal destiny cannot be auoyded, beganne to declare vnto the ROMAINES, the auncient oracles and prophecies touching the fortune of their citie: by which it was reported vnto them, that the citie of VETES should neuer be taken, vntill the enimie had cauled the water of the lake ALBANVS (which should breake out) to be brought backe againe, and to turne it some other waye from thence, that it should not fall into the sea. This was caried vnto the Senate at ROME, to be consulted of in counsaile: and there it was determined they should fend to the oracle of Apollo, at the citie of Delphes, and aske him what they should doe therein. So thither were sent great and notable men, Cossus Licinius, Valerius Politus, and Fabius Ambustus: who hauing ended their iorney by sea, and receyued answer of that they demanded, returned home againe, and amongst other oracles they brought one that sayed thus. That through negligence they had omitted some auncient ceremonies in the holy dayes of the Latines. And another willed them, that they should by all possible meanes they could, keepe the water of the lake ALBANVS that it fell not into the sea, and should (if it were possible) bring it backe againe into his old place: if not, that yet they should cut as many trenches and ditches as might be, that it might be droncke vp in the midst of the fields. When these oracles were vnderstanded, the priests prepared all things for diuine seruice, and the people went about the water of the lake to turne it againe. After these things were done, the Senate in the tenth yere of the warres against the VETIANS, put of all those which dyd beare office, and created Camillus Dictator, who named for generall of the horse men, Cornelius Scipio. And before he went in hande with any thing, he made a vow vnto the goddes, E that if it pleased them to graunte a happy ende of these warres, in honour of them he would celebrate great playes, and buyld a temple vnto the goddesse which the ROMAINES call Matuta: which seemeth to be her whom we call Lencosthea, considering the ceremonies done in these sacrifices. For they cause a chamber mayde to enter into her temple, & there they boxe her about the eares. Then they put her out of the temple, and doe embrace their brothers children rather then their owne. They make many other ceremonies, and they are much like vnto those that are done vnto Bacchus nurces, and to the misfortunes that chaunced vnto Ino, by reason of her husbands concubine. After all these vowes and prayers made, he entred with his army into the FALISSIANS territories, whom he ouerthrew in a great battell, together with the CAPENATES also, which came to ayde them. From thence he went to the siege F of the citie of VETES, where perceyuing to take it by assault, was not to be wonne without great daunger, he beganne to vndermine it (finding the earth all about very minable) and with A all so deepe, that the enemies could perceyue nothing. Nowe when his mining fell out according to his good hope, he gaue an assaulte to the walles in all places alike about the citie at one instante, to bring out all the inhabitants of the citie to man the walles. Whilest they were all thus vpon the walles to make defence: Camillus souldiers entred secretly through the mines within the castell, harde by the temple of Iuno: which was the chiefe Church of all the citie, and whereunto the citizens had most deuotion. They saye that euen at that present time the generall of the THYSCANS dyd sacrifice vnto the goddes, & that his soothelayer hauing considered the intrells of the beastes offered vp in sacrifice, cried out alowde, that the goddes gaue the victorie vnto him, which should happen to come vpon them in this sacrifice. The ROMAINES which were within the mine hearing this, brake the earth incontinently, and leaped out, crying, and making noyse with their weapons: wherewith the enemies were so astonied, that they fled vpon it, and so the ROMAINES tooke the intrells, and caried them vnto Camillus. And these be euen much like the Poets tales and fables. Howbeit Camillus hauing by this meanes taken the citie, and seeing from the toppe of the castell the infinite goodes & riches within the citie, which the souldiers spoyle & made hauock of, he wept for very pittie. And when those that were about him tolde him he was a happy man: he lift vp his hands vnto heauen, and made this prayer. O mightie god Iupiter, and you o goddes, which see and iudge mens good and ill workes: you knowe right well, that we haue not willingly (without wrong and cause offered vs) begonne this warre, but iustly, and by compulsion, to be reuenged of a citie our enimie, which hath done vs great iniuries. But if to conuertuayle this our great good C prosperitie, and victorie, some bitter aduersitie and ouerthrowe be predestined vnto vs: I beseeche you then (most mercifull goddes) in sparing our citie of ROME, and this her army, you will (with as litle hurte as maye be) let it all fall and light vpon my persone alone. And as he had spoken these wordes, and was turning on his right hande (according to the manner of the ROMAINES after they haue prayed vnto the goddes) he fell downe flat before them all. The standers by taking this fall for an ill token, were somewhat troubled with the matter: but after he got vp on his feete againe, he tolde them that the thing he requested of the goddes was happened vnto him. And that was, a litle hurte, in exchange of a great good fortune. So the whole citie being spoyle and rifled, he was also desirous to carie Iunos image to ROME, to accomplishe the vowe he had made. And hauing sent for workemen for this purpose, he dyd D sacrifice first vnto the goddesse, beseeching her to accept well of the ROMAINES good will, & that she would willingly vouchsafe to come and dwell with the other goddes, who had the protection of the citie of ROME. Some saye, that the image answered, she was contented. But Linius writeth that Camillus made this prayer, as he touched the image, and that the assistants answered she was contented, and would goe with a goodwill. Yet they which doe asseme, it was the image selfe that spake, doe fauour this miracle, grounding their prooffe vpon the opinion of the fortune of ROME: the which, from so base and meane beginning had impossibily attained vnto so highe glorie and power as it had, without the singular fauour of the goddes, and that hath manifestly appeared vnto the world, by sundry great proofes and examples. They bring forth also such other like wonders. As, that images haue heretofore let fall E dropes of swete from them: that they haue bene heard to sigh: that they haue turned: and that they haue made certain signes with their eyes, as we finde written in many auncient stories. And we could our selues also tell such like wonders, which we haue heard men of our time asseme, which are not vncredible, nor lightly to be condemned. But for such matters, it is as dangerous to geue to much credit to them, as also to discredit them to much, by reason of the weaknes of mans nature, which hath no certain boundes, nor can rule it self, but sometimes after vanitie and superstition, and otherwhile also dispiseth and contemneth holy and diuine matters: and therefore the meane is the vertue, & not to goe to farre in this, as in all other things besides, it is the best. Nowe Camillus, whether his late enterprife performed, in winning a citie that hoode out with ROME, & helde siege with them tenne yerres together, had put him into an ouerwining or conceipt of him selfe: or that the wordes of the people, which dyd blisse and prayse him, had made him looke highe, and presume vpon him selfe, more then became the modestie of a ciuill magistrate, and gouernour of the common N weale, & one that was subiect to the lawe: he shewed a stately triumphe, set forth with all riche furniture, & specially for that him self was caried through ROME vpon his triumphant charre drawn with foure fayer white coursers. This neuer captaine nor generall before him durst vndertake to doe, neither any euer after him attempted it: for they thinke it is a sacred cariage, and only mete for the King, and father of the goddes. This bred him much enuy amongst the cittizens, which had not bene acquainted with so great statelynes. There was another occasion also that made them dislike him much: which was, because he stood against the lawe put forth that they should deuide the citie of ROME. For the Tribunes of the people dyd let out an Edict, that the Senate & people of ROME should be deuided into two partes: and that those on whom the lotte should fall, should abide still in ROME, and the other should goe dwell in the newe wonne citie of VEIES. There were the reasons to perswade this: that both the one and the other lotte should be richer then they were before, & should more easily keepe their lands and goodes from the inuasion of their enemies, by meanes of these two great cities. The people which were multiplied nowe into great numbers, & had serued dutifully & daungerously, thought it the best waye in the world: Therefore they still cried out, and thronged with great tumulte, about their pulpit for orations, praying that this lawe might be put vnto the voyces of the people. But the whole Senate, and wisest cittizens among them, judging this motion of the Tribunes would be the destruction, and not the diuision of the citie of ROME: could in no wise abide it should goe any further. Whereupon they went & prayed Camillus helpe: who fearing to bring it to the point, whether the lawe should passe or no, dyd all wayes seeke new occasions and letts, till it to delaye & put off the matter, & staye the confirmation of this lawe. For these causes, he was hated of the common people. But the originall & apparant cause of the peoples ill will towards him, was for taking from them the tenth parte of their spoyle: and it was not altogether without some reason, and to saye truly the people dyd him much wrong to beare him such malice for that. For before he went to the citie of VEIES, he made a solene vowe to offer the tenth parte vnto the goddes, of the spoyle of the citie, if he wane the same. But when it was taken and sacked, whether it was that he was lothe to trouble the cittizens, or hauing a worlde of busines in his head, that he easily forgate his vowe: he suffered the fouldiers to deuide the spoyle amongst them, & to take the benefit to them selues. Shortly after he was discharged of his charge, he dyd enforce the Senate of his vowe. Furthermore, the fouldiers made reporte at that very time, howe they knew by certaine signes and tokens of their sacrifices, that the goddes were offended for somewhat, and howe they must of necessitie be pacified againe. Whereupon the Senate presently made an order, where it was vnpossible every man should bring in againe the selfe same things he had gotten, to make a newe diuision of euery mans share: that euery one therefore vpon his othe should present the tenth parte of his gaynes he had gotten by that bootie. There was great trouble about it. They were driuen to vltre great extremitee to the poore fouldiers (which had traueled fore, and taken great paynes in the warres) to make them to restore backe such a coloppe out of their gaine, and the rather because many of them had already spent it euery penny: and for this trouble, they all cried out with open mouth against Camillus. But he being set vp, and not knowing otherwise howe to excuse him selfe, was forced to bring forth as cold and as vnreasonable an excuse as he could make, which was: forsooth he had forgotten his vowe he had made. The people notwithstanding were eger still against him, saying: howe he had vowed then to offer the tenth parte of the enemies goodes to the goddes, and that now he would performe it with the tenthes of the cittizens goodes. Neuertheles, euery man hauing brought that he should for his parte: it was thought good they should cause a massie cuppe of golde to be made, to send to the temple of Apollo at DELPHES. And small store of golde being in the citie of ROME, as the officers of the citie were fersching vp and downe to get it: the women of ROME of their owne voluntary willes without motion, agreed among them selues, that they would departe with all the iuells they had, towards the making vp of this offering, which came to the weight of eight talents. In recompence whereof, to honour them withall: the Senate ordeined that they should be prayfed openly with funerall orations at their buriall, as they dyd vsé at honorable and noble mens obsequies. For before that lawe, it was not

A the manner to prayse women openly at their funeralls. Nowe there were appointed three of the noblest men of the citie to goe to carie this offering, & they sent them out in a galley well manned, stored also with good mariners, & trimly set forth in all triumphing manner: howbeit both in storme, & calme weather, they were in daunger of their liues. For after that they had escaped drowning very narrowly by tempest, when the winde was downe againe, they fell into another daunger, which they escaped also beyond all hope. For harde by the Iles of ÆOLVS, the galleys of the LIPARIANS fell vpon them, as if they had bene rousers. But when the LIPARIANS sawe they made no resistance, & intreated them, holding vp their hands: they gaue no further charge vpon them, but only fastened their galleys vnto theirs. So when they had haled them to the shore, they declared they were pirates, & offered to make portie sale of the men & goodes, as if they had bene a lawfull prise: & had solde them in deede, had not the wisdomed & authoritie of Timesitheus letted them, who was gouernour at that time of the citie, and had great a doe to perswade them to let them goe. And he dyd not so leaue them, but sent out certaine of his owne shippes to accompanie them in their iorney, who dyd helpe them to goe and performe their offering. For which curtesie of his, the ROMAINES afterwarde dyd him great honour at ROME, according to his well deseruing. The Tribunes of the people beganne nowe to set a foote againe the lawe for the deuiding of the inhabitants of ROME vnto the citie of VEIES. But the warres of the FALISCES fell out happily at that time, whereby the noble men dyd choole such officers as they would. So they choie Camillus, Tribunes militaris of the fouldiers, and five other to assiste him, the seruice in that case requiring a generall, C that caried both authoritie & reputation among them, as an olde experienced fouldier in the warres. When the people had confirmed the election, Camillus immediately entred the territories of the FALISCES with the ROMAINES armie, where he layed siege vnto the citie of the FALERIANS, being very well fortified, vitted and stored, with all other munition of warre. Knowing therefore that it was no small attempto winne this citie, and that it would not be done in a shorte time: he pollietly fought (whatsoeuer came of it) to keepe his countime occupied about some thing, & to staye them for going home, least by repaying to ROME, they should haue many occasions to rebell, & raise some ciuill dissention. For the ROMAINES dyd wisely vse this remedie: to disperse abroad like good phisicians, the humours which troubled the quiet state of their comon weale at home. But the FALERIANS trusting in the situation of their citie, which was very strong in all partes, made so litle account of the siege: that those which kept not watche vpon the walles, walked vp and downe in their gownes in the citie, without any weapon about them, and their children went to schoole, the schoolemaster also would commonly leade them abroad out of the citie a walking, to playe and passe the time by the towne walles. For the whole citie had one common schoolemaster, as the GRECIANS also haue, which doe bring vp their children from litle ones in company together, because one maye be familiarly acquainted with an other. This schoolemaster spying his time to doe the FALERIANS a shrewd turne, dyd accustomably take all his scholers out of the citie with him, to playe, not farre from the walles at the beginning, & afterwards brought them into the citie againe, after they had played their fill. Now after he had led them abroad thus once E or twice, he trayned them out euery daye a litle further, to make them to be bolde, perswading them there was no daunger. But at the length, one daye hauing gotten all the cittizens children with him, he led them within the watche of the ROMAINES campe, & there deliuered all his scholers into their handes, & prayed them they would bring him vnto their generall. So they did. And when he came before Camillus, he beganne to tell him that he was schoolemaster vnto all these children, neuertheles that he dyd more esteeme to haue his grace and fauour, then regarde his office he had by this name & title. Camillus hearing what he sayed, & beholding his threacherous parte, he sayed to those that were about him: Warre of it selfe surely is an euill thing, for in warres many iniuries & mischieues are done: neuertheles amōg good men there is a law & discipline, which doth forbid the to seeke victorie by wicked & traiterous meanes, & F that a noble & worthie generall should make warre, & procure victorie, by trusting to his own vallianties, & not by others vilenes & villanie. Therefore he commaunded his sergeants to teare the clothes of the backe of this vile schoolemaster, & to binde his handes behinde him: & that they should geue the children rodde & whippes in their hands, to whippe the traitour backe againe into the citie, that had thus betrayed them, & grieved their parents. Now when the FALERIANS heard newes that the schoolemaster had thus betrayed them, all the citie fell a weeping (as euery man maye thinke for so great a losse) and men & women ranne together one in anothers necke, to the town walles, & gates of the citie, like people out of their wittes; they were so troubled. VVhen they came thither, they saw their childre bringing their schoolemaster backe againe, stark naked and bownde, whipping of him, & calling Camillus their father, their god, and their sauour: so that not only the fathers and mothers of the children, but all other the citizens also in general, dyd conceyue in them selues a wonderfull admiration and great loue of the wisdom, goodnes, and iustice of Camillus. So that euen presently they called a counsaill, and there it was concluded they should send ambassadours forthwith vnto him, to put their liues and goodes to his mercy and fauour. Camillus sent their ambassadours vnto Rome, where audience being geuen vnto them by the Senate, the ambassadours sayed, Bicause the ROMAINES preferred iustice aboue victorie, they taught them to be better contented to submit them selues vnto them, then to be their own men at libertie: confessing their vertue dyd more ouercome them, then any force or power could doe. The Senate dispatched letters vnto Camillus, giuing him commission to doe and determine as he thought good. So he hauing taken a certen summe of money of the FALERIANS, dyd furthermore make peace and league with all the rest of the FALISCES: and thereupon returned backe againe to Rome. But the souldiers grudged maruelously at it. For they stood in hope to haue had the sacking of the citie. VVhen there was no remedie, but they must needs returne home emptic handed, they beganne to accule Camillus to the rest of the citizens, as fone as they came to Rome, saying: he loued not the common people, and howe for spite he disapointed their army of the spoyle. On the other side, the Tribunes of the people beganne to reuiue the lawe, for the deuiding of the inhabitants of Rome, and were ready to passe it by the voyces of the people. Camillus not fearing the ill will of the commons, dyd boldly speake, and doe in open preface, all he could against it. So that plainly he was the chiefeft cause, that the people against their willes (intreate what they could) were driuen to let it alone. But withall they were so spitefull against him, that notwithstanding his sorowe and misfortune for the death of his sonne (dying of a sickenes) was great: they would not of malice once take pittie or compassion of him. The losse whereof (albeit he was of a very good & curteous nature) was so grieuous, and made him D so inquier: that being accused before the people, he sturrd not once out of his house, but was locked vp with the women, which lamented for his sonne departed. He that dyd accule him, was one Lucius Apuleius, burdening him that he had stolen and taken away, parte of the spoyle of the THYSCANS: and sayed, they had seene certen brazen gates at his house, which had bene brought out of THYSCAN. Nowe the people were so maliciously bent against him, that euery man might see, if they could once take him in a trippe, vpon any aduantage whatsoever, they would douteles haue condemned him. Wherefore calling together his friends and souldiers that had serued vnder him in the warres, or that had taken charge with him, which were many in number: he earnestly besought them, that they would not suffer him thus vilely to be condemned, through false and vniust accusations layed against him, nor to be so scorned and defamed by his enemies. His friends hauing layed their heades together, and consulted thereupon, made him aunswer: howe for his iudgment they could not remedy it, but if he were condemned, they would all ioyne together with a very goodwill, to helpe to paye his fine. But he being of minde not to beare such an open shame and ignominie, determined in choller to leaue the citie, and to exile him selfe from it. And after he had taken his leaue of his wife & children, bidding them farewell: he went out of his house to the gates of the citie, & sayed neuer a word. VVhen he came thither, he stayed sodainely, & returning backe againe, he lift vp his hands towards the Capitoll, and made his prayers vnto the godds: that if it were of very spight and malice, and not of iust deserting, that the common people compelled him thus shamefully to forsake the citie, that the ROMAINES might quickly repent them, and F in the face of the world might wishe for him, and haue nede of him. After he had made these prayers against the citizens (as Achilles dyd against the GRECIANS) he went his way, & was condemned

A condemned for his contempe, in the summe of fifteene thousand Affer of the ROMAINE coyne, which make of Greeke the money, a thousand five hundred Drachmas of siluer: for as As was a litle peece of money, whereof tenne of them made a ROMAINE penny. Howbeit there was not a ROMAINE of any vnderstanding, but beleued certainly that some great punishment would followe them incontinently, and that the wrong & iniurie they had done him would be quickly requited, with some most sharpe and terrible reuenge, not only vnpleasunt to thinke vpon, but further most notable to be spoken of through the world. There tell out so sodainely vpon it, such mischief toward the citie of Rome, and the present time also brought forth such occasion of daunger and destruction thereof, to their shame & infamie: that it was vncertaine whether it happened by chaunce, or els it was the handie worcke of some god, that would not suffer vertue recompenced with ingratitude, to passe vreuenged. Their first token that threatened some great mischief to light vpon them, was the death of Julius, one of the Censors for the ROMAINES doe greatly reuerce the office of a Censor, and esteeme it as a sacred place. The seconde token that happened a litle before Camillus exile, was: that one Marius Caudinus a man but of meane qualitie, and none of the Senatours (but otherwise a fayre conditioned honest man, and of good conscience) tolde the Tribunes of a thing that was to be well considered of. For he sayed that the night before, as he was going on his waye in the newe streete, he heard one call him alowde: and returning backe to see what it was, he sawe no liuing creature, but only heard a voyce bigger then a mans, which sayed vnto him. Marius Caudinus goe thy waye to morrowe morning to the Tribunes militaires, and byd them looke quickly for the GAVLES. The Tribunes were mery at the matter, and made but a ieast at his warning, and straight after followed the condemnation of Camillus. Nowe as touching the GAVLES. They came (as they saye) of the CELTAE, whose country not being able to mainteine the multitudes of them, they were driuen to goe seeke other countreies to inhabit in; and there were amongst them many thousands of young men of seruice and good souldiers, but yet more women and litle children by a great number. Of these people, some of them went towards the north sea, passing the mountaines RHPHEI, and dyd dwel in the extreme partes of EVROPE. Other of them remained betwene the mountaines PIRENE, and the greatest mountaines of the ALPES, neere vnto the SENONES, and the CELTORIE: There they continued a long time, vntill they fortun'd in the ende to taste of the wine, which was first brought out of ITALIE vnto them. Which drinke they found so good, and were so delighted with it, that sodainely they armed themselves: and taking their wiues and children with them, they went directly towards the ALPES, to goe seeke out the country that brought forth such fruite, judging all other countreies in respect of that, to be but wilde and barren. It is sayed, that the first man which brought wine vnto them, and that dyd procure them to passe into ITALIE, was a noble man of THYSCAN called Arron, and otherwise of no ill disposed nature: howbeit he was subiect to this misfortune following. He was tutor vnto an orphan childe, the richest that was at that time in all the countrie of THYSCAN, and of complexion was wonderful fayre: he was called Lucumo. This orphan was brought vp in Arrons house of a childe, and though he was grown to mans state, yet he would not goe from him, sayning he was so well, and to his liking. But in deede the cause was, that he loued his maiestres (Arrons wife) whom secretly he had enjoyed a long time, and the him, that made him like his continuance there. Howbeit in the ende, loue hauing so possessed them both, that neither parte could withdrawe from other, much lesse culler that they had long enjoyed: the young man stole her away from him, and kept her still by force. Arron put him in fure, but he prayeaud not for Lucumo outwewed him with friends, money, giftes, and charges. But he took it so greuouly, that he left his country: and hauing heard talke of the GAVLES, he went vnto them, and was their guide to bring them into ITALIE. So they conquered at their first coming all that country which the THYSCANS helde in olde time, beginning at the foote of the mountaines, and stretched out in length from one sea vnto the other which enuironneth ITALIE, as the names them selfes doe witness. For they call yet that sea which looketh vnto the northe, the Adriack sea: by reason of a citie built sometime by the THYSCANS, which was called Adria. The other, which lieth directly ouer against the South, is called the THYSCAN sea. All that countrie is well planted with trees, & hath goodly pleasaunt pastures for beastes and cattell to feede in, & is notably watered with goodly running riuers. There was also at that time eighteen fayer great cities in that country, all of them very strong and well seated, as well for to enrich the inhabitants thereof by traffike, as to make them to liue delicately for pleasure. All these cities the GAVLES had wonne, and had expelled the THYSCANS, but this was done long time before. Now the GAVLES being further entered into THYSCANIA, dyd besiege the citie of CLVSIVM.

Clusium a citie of Thuscā besieged by the Gauls.

Brennus king of the Gauls.

Thereupon the CLVSIVS seeking ayde of the ROMAINES, besought them they would send letters and ambassadours vnto these barbarous people in their fauour. They sent vnto them three of the best and most honorable persones of the citie, all three of the house of the Fabians. The GAVLES receyued them very courteously, bicause of the name of ROME, and leauing to assault the citie, they gaue them audience. The ROMAINES ambassadours dyd aske them, what iniurie the CLVSIVS had done vnto them, that they came to make warres with them. Brennus king of the GAVLES, hearing this question, smiled, and answered them thus. The CLVSIVS doe vs wrong in this: they being but fewe people together, & not able to occupie much lande, doe notwithstanding possesse much, and will let vs haue no parte with them, that are strangers, and out of our country, and stande in neede of feate and habitation. The like wrong was offered vnto you ROMAINES in oldtime, by those of ALBA, by the FIDENATES, and the ARDEATES: and not long sithence, by the VEIANS, & the CAPENATES: and partly by the FALISCES and the VOLSCS: against whom ye haue taken, & doe take armes, at all times. And as ofte as they will let ye haue no parte of their goods, ye imprison their persones, robbe and spoyle their goodes, and destroye their cities. And in doing this, ye doe them C no wrong at all, but followe the oldest lawe that is in the worlde, which euer leaueth vnto the stronger, that which the weaker can not keepe and enioye. Beginning with the goddes, & ending with beastes: the which haue this propertie in nature, that the bigger and stronger haue euer the vantage of the weaker and lesfer. Therefore, leaue your pittie to see the CLVSIVS besieged, least you teache vs GAVLES to take compassion also of those you haue oppressed. By this answer the ROMAINES knewe very wel, there was no waye to make peace with king Brennus. Wherefore they entered into the citie of CLVSIVM, and incouraged the inhabitants to saue out with them vpon these barbarous people: either bicause they had a desire to proue the valliantnes of the GAVLES, or els to shewe their owne corage and manhood. So the citizens went out, and skirmished with them harde by the walles: in the which one of the FAB bians, called Quintus Fabius Ambustus, being excellently well horsed, and putting spurres to him, dyd set vpon a goodly bigge personage of the GAVLES, that had aduanced him selfe farre before all the troupe of his companions. He was not knowne at the first encounter, as well for the sodaine meeting and skirmishing together, as for that his glistering armour dimmed the eyes of the enemies. But after he had slaine the GAVLE, and came to stripp him: Brennus then knewe him, and protested against him, calling the goddes to witness, howe he had broken the lawe of armes, that coming as an ambassadour, he had taken vpon him the forme of an enemy. Hereupon Brennus forthwith left skirmishing, and raising the seige from CLVSIVM, marched with his army vnto ROME gates. And to the ende the ROMAINES might knowe, that the GAVLES were not well pleased for the iniurie they had receyued: to haue an honest culler to beginne warres with the ROMAINES, he sent an Herald before to ROME, to demaunde liuerie of the man that had offended him, that he might punish him accordingly. In the meane time, he him selfe came marching after, by small iourneys to receyue their answer. The Senate hereupon assembled, & many of the Senatours blamed the rashnes of the Fabians: but most of all, the priestes called Faciales. For they followed it very earnestly, as a matter that concerned religion, & the honour of the godds: declaring how the Senate, in discharge of all the residue of the citie of the offence comitted, should laye the whole weight and burden of it vpon him alone, that only had done the facte. Numa Pompilius, the iustest and most peaceable of all the kings of ROME that had bene, was he that first erected the college of these Faciales, and dyd ordeine that they should be the keepers of peace, and the iudges to hear and allowe all the causes, for the which they should iustly beginne any warres. Neuertheles, the Senate in the ende turned ouer the ordering of the matter, vnto the whole will and iudgment

A iudgment of the people, before whom these priestes Faciales dyd also accuse Fabius Ambustus. The people made so litle accept of their propounded religion, & honour of the godds in that case: that in steede of deliuering of this Fabius vnto the enemy, they dyd chooe him for one of the Tribunes of the souldiers with his brothers. The GAVLES vnderstanding this, were so furious & angrie thereat, that they would no longer linger their iourneys, but marched with all speed vnto ROME. The people that dwelt by the high wayes where they should passe by, were maruelously affrayed to see the multitude of them, & their braue & vniuersall furniture: & beginning to doubt the furie of their rage, they imagined first of all that they would destroye all the chapien country before them, & afterwards would take all the strong cities. They contrarywise dyd take nothing at all out of the fieldes, neither dyd any hurte or displeasure vnto any

B bodie: but passing by their cities, cried out they went to ROME, and would haue no warres but with the ROMAINES, and howe otherwise they desired to be friendes with all the worlde. These barbarous people marching on in this wise towards ROME, the Tribunes of the souldiers brought their army to the field to encounter them. They were no lesse in number then the GAVLES, for they were forty thousand footemen. Howbeit most part of them were rawe souldiers, that had neuer serued in the warres before. They were very careless of the goddes, & dissolute in matters of religion: for they passed neither for good signes in their sacrifices, neither to aske counsaile of their soothsayers, which the ROMAINES were religiously wont to doe, before they gaue any battail. To make the matter worse: the number of the captaines hauing power and authoritie alike, dyd asmuche (or more then the rest) disorder and confounde their

C doings. For ofte times before, in farre lesfer matters and daungers then these, they dyd vnto chule speciall officers that had sole & soueraigne authoritie, which they called Difflators: knowing very well of how great importance it is, in daungerous times to haue but one head & generally, to command all, & to haue supreme authoritie of iustice in his hands, & not to be bound to deliuer accept of his doings to any. The iniury allo which they had to vngratefully done to Camillus, brought great mischief & inconueniēce then vpon them. For the captaines after him, durst no more commaunde the people roughly, but euer after dyd flatter them much. When their army was now brought into the field, they encamped them selues by a liue riuier called Allia, about the eleuth stone from ROME, and not farre from the place where the same riuier falleth into Tyber. Thither came the barbarous army to them, who ouerthrew them in battell,

D by their disorder & lacke of gouernment. For the left pointe or winge of their battell was broken of at the first by the GAVLES, who charged them so furiously, that they draue them hedlog into the riuier. The right wing then retiring out of the plain, before they had any charge geue, & hauing gotten certain hilles hard by them: they had litle hurte, & most of them sauing them selues, did recouer ROME again. The rest that escaped after the enemies were weary of killing, fled by night vnto the citie of VIES, thinking ROME had bene lost, & all the citie put to the sword. This ouerthrowe was on the 106th daye in sommer, the moone being at the full: & the daye before fortuneth the great slaughter of the Fabians, of the which were slaine by the THYSCANS in one daye 300. all of a name. The very daye it self was afterwards called Allia's daye, of the name of the liue riuier, by the which the 2. ouerthrow was geuen. But for the difference of dayes,

E that some of the are naturally vnfortunate, or that Heraclitus the philosopher had reason to reprove the poet Hesiodus, for makig some dayes good, & some dayes ill, as though he vnderstood they were not all of one nature: we haue writte & declared our opinion thereof in other places. Yet, bicause the matter deliuereth present occasio to speake of the same, peradventure it will not be amisse to alleage a few exaples of it only. It fortuneth the BOEOTIANS on a time to wine two honorable victories, on the first daye of the moneth they call Hippodromus (and which the ATHENIANS call Hecatombæon) that is now the moneth of Iune, by either of the which they did still restore the GRECIANS to their libertie. The first was the battell of LEVCTERS. The second was the battell of GERASTE, which was two hundred yeres before, when they ouercame LATAMIAS, & the THESSALIANS in battell. The PERSIANS contrarily were ouercome in battell F by the GRECIANS, the first daye of August, at the iorney of MARATHON. The third day, at the battell of PLATERS. And on the selfe same daye, neere vnto MYCALA. On the fise and twenty daye, at the sight of ARBELES, the ATHENIANS wanne the battell by sea, neere vnto

Ille of Naxos, vnder the charge and gouernment of Chubrias, about the full of the moone, in the moneth of August. And on the twenty of the same moneth, they wanne the battell of SALAMINA: as we haue writtten more ample in our historie of difference of dayes. The moneth of Aprill also brought to the barbarous people many notable losses. For Alexander the great, ouercame the generall of the king of PERSIA, at the fildes of GRANICA, in the sayed moneth. The CARTHAGINIANS also were vanquished in STICILE by Timoleon, on the seuen & twenty daye thereof. On which daye also it is thought the citie of TROYE was taken: as Ephorus, Callithenes, Damastrus, and Phylarchus, haue writtten in their histories. Nowe contrariwise. The moneth of Iuly, which the BOEOTIANS call Panemus, hath not bene gracious to the GRECIANS. For on the seuen daye of the same, they were ouerthrowen by Antipater at the battell of CRANON, which was their vtter destruction. They had before also lost a battell the same moneth, neere vnto the citie of CHAEIRONIA, by king Philippe. On the same daye also, and in the very self moneth and yere, those which came into ITALIE with king Archidamus, were slaine euery one of them, by the barbarous people of the coutry. The CARTHAGINIANS also feare the seuen & twenty daye of the same moneth, as the daye which had before time brought them into many great and sorowfull calamities. Contrarie also, I knowe very well, how about the feast of mysteries, the citie of THEBES was destroyed by Alexander, & that the ATHENIANS were compelled to receyue a garrison of souldiers into their citie, about the twenty daye of August, at which time they made the holie procession of the mysteries of Iacchus. And on the self day the ROMAINES lost their armie, & their generall Capio, who was slaine by the CIMBRES. And how afterwards vnder the leading of Lucullus, they ouercame king Tigranes, & the ARMENIANS. And that Attalus, & Pompey also, dyed both on the selfe same daye they were borne. To conclude, infinite examples of men might be brought, vnto whom after like reuolutions of time, there happened notable chaunces of good or ill. But to returne againe vnto our historie. The daye of this ouerthrowe, is one of those which the ROMAINES stak for one of the vnfortunatest dayes that euer came vnto them. And by reason of that day, they reckon two other dayes of euery moneth very vnfortunate, engendered through feare & superstition, which spreadeth farre (as commonly it doth) vpon such sinister misfortunes. But for this matter, we haue writtten it more largely & exquisitely in the booke we made, of the ceremonies & customes of the ROMAINES. Now after this battell lost, if the GAVLES had hottely pursued the chafe of their flying enemies, nothing could haue saued ROME from being taken, & the inhabitants therof from being put vnto the sword. For the ROMAINES that fled from the battell, brought such a feare vpon those that receyued them, and filled the whole citie of ROME with such greif & trébling: that they wist not what to doe. The barbarous people againe, beleueing little their victorie was so great as it was, fell to make good cheere for so great a ioye receiued, & deuided among them the spoyle of their enemies goods they found in the campe. So gaue they time & leysure by this meane, to the multitude of people that fled out of ROME, to seeke them some place of safety: & to such as remained still, they left good hope to saue them selues, & to make someprouision for defence. Thereupon they all fortified them selues within moit Capitoll, & storing it with all kind of vitall, armor, & munition, they wholly dyd forsake the rest of the citie. But the first worke they tooke in hande was this. They dyd bring into their sayed forte, parte of their sacred relickes: & the professed Vestalls brought thither also their holy fire & all other their holy monumets. Some writers saye, that they had nothing els in keeping, but the sempiternall fyre, & were so consecrated by king Numa, who dyd first institute, that the fyre should be worshipped, as the beginning of all things. For that it is the moit motiue & quickest substance that is of all naturall things: notwithstanding, that generation also is a mouing, or at the least not done without motion. For we see, that all other substance which lacketh heate, remaineth idle, & without action, & sturtheth not, no more then doth a dead thing, which craueth the force and heate of fyre: as the soule it selfe recouering heate, beginneth somewhat to moue, and disposeth it selfe to doe, and suffer some thing. Wherefore Numa being (as they saye) a man of great learning and vnderstanding, who for his wisdom was reported to talke many times with the Muses, dyd consecrate the same as a moit sacred thing, and commaunded that they neuer should suffer that fyre to goe out, and but keepe it, as they would preferre the

A the liuely image of the eternall God, the only King & maker of the worlde. Other saye, that the fyre burned continually there before the holy & sacred things, signifying a kinde and manner of purification, which opinion the GRECIANS holde also: howbeit behinde the same fyre, there were certain hidden things, which in no case any might see, but those holy Vestall Nines. Many also holde an opinion, that the Palladium of TROYE (as much to say, as Pallas image) is hidden also there, which was brought by Aeneas into ITALIE. Other doe reporte also, that Dardanus, at that time when he first beganne to buyld the citie of TROYE, brought thither the holy images of the goddesses of SAMOTHRACIA, and he dyd offer them vp there: and howe Aeneas after the citie was taken, dyd steale them awaye, & kept them vntill he came to dwell in ITALIE. Some other also, that take vpon them to knowe more therein then the common sorte, doe holde opinion, that there are two pipes not very great, whereof the one is emptye and standeth open, the other is full & fast locked vp, howbeit they are not to be seene but by these holy Nunes. Other thincke also, that these imaginers inuented that they spake of their owne heads, because the Vestall Nunes dyd cast all that they could put in at that time, into two pipes, which they buried after in the grounde, within the temple of Quirinus: and herefore that very place carieth the surname at this daye of pipes. Howbeit they caried about them the moit precious things they had, & fled alongest the riuer. Where one Lucius Albinus (one of the common people) flying also, & hauing brought away his wife & litle children, and other household stuffe he had in a carte, by chaunce he lighted vpon the Vestall Nunes in the waye. But so fone as he perceyued these holy Nunes (carying the blessed relickes and iuells in their armes, dedicated vnto the seruice of the goddesses) all alone, & that they were wearie with going a foote: he caused his wife and his children to come out of the carte, & tooke downe all his goodes also, & willed them to get them vp, and flye into some citie or towne of GREECE. Thus, he thought I could not well passe ouer with silence, Albinus reuerence & deuotion he shewed vnto the goddesses, in so daungerous a time & pinche of extremitye. Furthermore the priests of other goddesses, & the moit honorablest olde men of the citie of ROME (that had bene Cōsuls before time, or had past the honour of triumphe) had not the harte to forsake ROME: but putting on all their moit holy robes & vestments dyd vowe, and as it were willingly sacrificed them selues vnto the fortune that should befall them, for the safety of their countrie. And vsing certain words & prayers which their high bisshope Fabius had taught them, they went diuenty thus appalled into the great market place, & dyd sit them downe there, in chayers of iuory, expecting the good will & pleasure of the godds what should become of them. But with in three dayes after, Brennus came to ROME with his army: who finding the gates of the citie all open, & the walles without watche, he dowtred some deuise in it, & feared some priuie ambush had bene layed, as one hardly beleueing to haue found the ROMAINES of so base a mind, as to forsake their citie. After being enformed of the troth, he entred into ROME by the gate Collina, & tooke the same, litle more the three hūdrēd & three score yeres after it was first builded: if it be true at the least there hath remained any certen chronicles of those times vnto this present daye, considering the trouble & confusion of that time hath made many things more vncertaine then that, dowtrefull vnto vs. But so it was, that the rumor ranne to GREECE incontinently howe ROME was taken, but yet withall somewhat doubtfully & vncertainly. For Heraclides Ponticus (who was about that time) sayeth in a certen booke he wrote of the foule, that there was newes come from the VVest parte, that an armie which came from the HYPERBORIANS, had taken a citie of GREECE called ROME, situated in that country neere the great sea. But I wonder not that Heraclides (who hath writtten so many other fables & lyes) dyd amplify the true newes of the taking of ROME, with adding to of his owne deuise, of the HYPERBORIANS, & by the great sea. It is a moit true tale, that Aristotle the philosopher had certain knowledge it was taken by the GAVLES: howbeit he sayeth also it was recovered againe afterwards by one called Lucius: where in deede it was, by Marcus Camillus, & not by Lucius. But all this in manner is spoken by cōiecture. Moreouer, Brennus being entred ROME, dyd appointe parte of his souldiers to besiege those which were gotten into moit Capitoll. And he with the residue of his armie, marched on towards the market place: where when he saw the aunciēt Senatours set so grauely in their chayers, & spake neuer a word, nor offered once to rise, though they law their enemies come armed towards them, neither chaunged countenance, nor culler at all, but leaned softly on their stauies they had in their hands, seeming to be nothing affrayed nor abashed, but looked one vpon another, he maruelously wondred at it. This their so straunge manner at the first dyd so dampe the GAVLES, that for a space they stooode full, and were in doubt to come neere to touche them, fearing least they had beue some goddes: vntill suche time, as one of them went boldly vnto Marcus Papyrius, & layed his hand fayer & softly vpon his leg bearde. But Papyrius gaue him such a rappe on his pate with his staffe, that he made the bloud runne about his eares. This barbarous beaue was in such a rage with the blowe, that he drue out his sworde, and slewed him. The other fouldiers also killed all the rest afterwarde: and so the GAVLES continued many dayes spoyling and sacking all thinges they founde in the houses, and in the ende dyd fet them all a fyer, and destroyed them euery one, for despite of those that kept the forte of the Capitoll, that would not yeld vpon their summons, but valiantly repulled them when they scaled the walles. For this cause they rased the whole cittie, and put all to the sworde that came in their hands, young and olde, man, woman, and childe. Nowe this siege continuing long, and the ROMAINES holding them out very stoutly, vittells beganne to growe scante in the campe of the GAVLES, in so much as they were driuen of force to seeke it abroad without the cittie. Hereupon they deuided them selues, whereof some remained still with the King at the siege of the Capitoll: and the rest went a forraging, and spoyling all the champion countrie and villages thereabouts, scattered as it were by bandes & companies, some here, some there, fearing nothing, nor passing vpon watch or warde, they liued in such securitie of their victorie. Howbeit the greatest company amongst them, went by fortune towards the cittie of ARDEA, where Camillus dwelt, liuing like a priuate man, meddling with no matters of state from the time of his exile, vntill that present time. But then he beganne not to bebinke him self as a man that was in safety, and might haue escaped the handes of his enemies, but rather fought to deuise and finde out all the meanes he could to subdewe them if occasion were so offered. Whereupon, considering that the inhabitants of ARDEA were enough in number to set vpon them, although faynte harted, and cowardly, by reason of the slouth and negligence of their gouernours and captaines, who had no manner of experience in the warres: he beganne to cast out these words amongst the young men. That they should not thinke the ROMAINES misfortune fell vpon them, through the valiantmes of the GAVLES, nor that their calamitie (who had refused good counsaill) had hapened vnto them by any worke or acte of the GAVLES, hauing done nothing for their parte to make them carie awaye the victorie: but that they should thinke, it was no other thing, but fortune alone, that would needes shewe her power. Therefore, that it were nowe a notable and honorable enterprife (although somewhat dangerous) to driue these straungers and barbarous people out of their countrie: considering that the only ende of their victorie was, but to destroye and consume as fire, all that fell into their hands. Wherefore if they would but only take a good lusty harte and corage vnto them, he would with opportunitie, and place, assure them the victorie, without any danger. The young men were pleased with these words of life & comfort. Whereupon Camillus went to breake the matter alse vnto the magistrats & counsellours: and hauing drawn them by perswasion vnto this enterprife, he armed all that were of age to carie armor, & would not suffer a man to goe out of the cittie, for feare least the enemies (which were not farre off) should haue intelligence of the same. Now after the GAVLES had rone ouer all the chapion countrie, & were loden with all sorts of spoyles, they did encampe them selues negligently in open fields, & neuer charged watch nor warde: but hauing their full cariage of wine layed them down to sleepe, & made no noyse at all in their campe. Camillus being aduertised thereof by his seuerall skowtes, caused the ARDEANS with as litle noyse as might be, forthwith to goe out into the fields: & hauing marched somewhat rouidly the distance betwene the cittie, & the cape of the GAVLES, they came thither much about midnight. Then he made his fouldiers make great shoutes & cries, & the trippets to be sounded on euery side, to put a feare in their enemies, who yet with all the lowde noyse they made, could hardly be made to wake, for they were so deadly dröke. Yet there were some notwithstanding, that for feare to be take tardy, dyd bustle vp at this sodaine noyse: & coming to them selues, fell to their weapons to resist Ca-

A millus, which were slayne by and by. The rest, & the greatest number of them, laye here & there scattered in the middelt of the field, without any weapon, dead a sleepe, starcke droncke with wine, & were put to the sworde, & neuer strake stroke. Those that fled out of the campe that night (which were but fewe in number) were ouerthrowen also the next day, by the horle men which followed & killed them, as they tooke them straggling here & there in the fieldes. The brute of this victorie was blowne abroad incontinently through all the townes and villages thereabouts, which caused many young men to come & ioyne them selues to Camillus: but specially the ROMAINES desired the fame, that had saued the selues in the cittie of VETES, after the battell lost at ALLIA, who made their mones amongst them selues there, saying. O goddes, what a capitaine hath fortune taken from the cittie of ROME? What honour liath the B cittie of ARDEA by the valliantnes and worthy deedes of Camillus: and in the meane season, his naturall cittie that brought him forth, is now lost, & vtterly destroyed? We, for lacke of a capitaine to leade vs, are shut vp here within others walles, & doe nothing but suffer ITALLE in the meane space to goe to ruine, & vtter destruction before our eyes. Why then doe we not send to the ARDEANS for our capitaine? or why doe we not arme our selues, to goe vnto him? For he is nowe no more a banished man, nor we poore cittizens: since our cittie is possessed with the forein power, of our hatefull enemies. So they all agreed to this counsaill, & sent vnto Camillus to beseeche him to be their capitaine, and leade them. But he made answer, he would in no case consent vnto it, vnles they that were besieged in the Capitoll had lawfully first confirmed it by their voyces. For those (sayed he) so long as they remaine within the cittie, doe represent the state & bodie thereof. Therefore if they commaunded him to take this charge vpon him, he would most willingly obey them: if otherwise they misliked of it, that the he would not medle against their good willes & commaundement. They hauing receaued this answer, there was not a ROMANE amongst them, but greatly honored & extolled the wisdom & iustice of Camillus. But nowe they knewenot how to make them priue to it, that were besieged in the Capitoll: for they sawe no possibilitie to conuey a messenger to them: considering the enemies were lordes of the cittie, & layed seige to it. Howbeit there was one Pontius Cominius amongst the young men (a man of a meane house, but yet desirous of honour & glory) that offered him self very willingly to venter to get in if he could. So he tooke no letters to cary to them which were besieged, for feare least they might be intercepted, & so they should discouer Camillus in-D tention: but putting on an ill fauoured gowne vpon him, he coueyed certen peces of corcke vnder it, & traueling at none dayes kept on his waye without feare, vntill he came to ROME, bringing darke night with him. And because he could not passe ouer the bridge, for that the Barbarous people kept watche vpö it: he wrapped such clothes as he had, about his necke (which were not many, nor heauy) & tooke the riuier, & swimming with these corcks he had brought, at the length he got ouer to the other side where the cittie stooode. Then taking vp those lanes allwayes where he thought the enemies were not, seeing fire, & hearing noyse in other places, he wet to the gate Carmentale, where he found more silence then in other places: on the which side also, the hill of the Capitoll was more stepe and vpright, by reason of the great rocks that were harde to clime vp vpon. But he digged & crept vp so long amongst them, that he got vp E with great payn vnto the wall of the fortresse, on the which side also the enemy kept no watch: & saluting the watche of the Capitoll, he told them what he was. So they plucked him vp vnto them, & brought him to the magistrats that ruled then. Who caused the Senate to assemble presently, vnto whom he told the newes of Camillus victorie, which they had not heard of before: & therewith also he dyd declare vnto the, the determination of the ROMAINES fouldiers that were abroad, which was, to make Camillus their capitaine & general, & did perswade them also to graüt him the charge, for that he was the only man abroad who the cittizens gaue their consents to obey. When they heard this, all that were within the Capitoll, consulted thereupon amongst them selues, & so did chuse Camillus Dictator, & returned the messenger Pontius Cominius backe againe, the self same waye he came vnto them. His fortune in returning backe, was F like vnto his coming thither: for the enemies neuer sawe him. And so he brought report vnto that that were abroad, of the Senates decree & consent, whereof they all were maruelous glad. Thus came Camillus to take this charge of generall vpon him, & found there were twety thouland good fighting men abroad, and well armed. Then got he further ayde also of their allies and confederates, and prepared daylie to goe and set vpon the enemies. So was Camillus chosen now Dictator the seconde time, and went vnto the citie of Vies, where he spake with the ROMAINE souldiers that were there, and leauied a great number of the allies besides, to goe fight with the enemies as sone as he could. But whilest Camillus was thus a preparing, certain of the Barbarous people in ROME, walking out by chaunce on that side of the Capitoll where Pontius Cominius had gotten vp the night before: spied in diuers places the printes of his fete and hands, as he had griped & gotten holde, still digging to get vp, & sawe the weedes and erbes also growing vpon the rocks, & the earth in like manner, flat troden down. Whereupon they went presently vnto the King, to let him vnderstande the same: who forthwith came to vewe the place. And hauing considered it well, he dyd nothing at that time: but when darke night was come, he called a companie of the lightest GAVLES together, and that vnto most to digge in mountaines, & layed vnto them. Our enemies them selues doe shew vs the waye how to take them, which we could not haue founde out but by them selues. For they hauing gone vp before vs, doe geue vs easly to vnderstande, it is no impossible thing for vs to clime vp also. Wherefore, we were vtterly shamed, hauing already begone well, if we should sayle also to end well: & to leaue this place as vnuincible. For if it were easie for one man alone, by digging to clime vp to the height thereof: much lesse is it harde for many to get vp one after another, so that one doe helpe another. Therefore Syr, I assure you, those that doe take paynes to get vp, shalbe honorably rewarded, according to their iust deserte. When the King had spoken theie wordes vnto the GAVLES, they fell to it lustely euery man to get vp: & about midnight, they beganne many of them to digge, & make steepps vp to the rocke one after another, as softly as could possibly, with catching holde the best they could, by the hāging of the rocke, which they found very steepe, but neuertheles easier to clime, then they tooke it at the beginning. So that the foremost of them being come to the toppe of the rocke, were now ready to take the walle, & to set vpon the watche that slept: for there was neither man nor dogge that heard them. It chanced then there were holy gese kept in the temple of Iuno, which at other times were wont to be fedd till their croppes were full: but vitrells being very straite, & scante at that time euen to finde the men, the poore gese were so hard handled, & so little regarded, that they were in manner starued for lacke of meate. This fowle in dedde naturally is very quicke of hearing, & so is she also very fearefull by nature: & being in manner famished with their harde allowance, they were so much the more waking, & easier to be afrayed. Vpō this occasion therfore, they heard the cōming of the GAVLES, & also beganne to ronne vp & downe & crie for feare: with which noyse they did wake those that were within the castell. The GAVLES being bewrayed by these foolishe gese, left their stealing vpon them, & came in with all the open noyse & terrour they could. The *ROMAINE*s hearing this larum, euery man tooke such weapon as came first to his hand, & they ranne sodainly to rescue that place from whence they vnderstoode the noyse: among those, the foremost man of all was Marcus Manlius, a man that had bene Cōsul, who had a lusty bodye, & as stowte a harte. His happe being to mete with two of the GAVLES together, as one of them was lifting vp his axe to knocke him on the head, he preuēted him, & strake of his hand with his sword, and clapt his target on the others face so fiercelly, that he threwe him backward down the rocke: & cōming afterwards vnto the walle with others that ranne thither with him, he repulsed the rest of the GAVLES that were gotten vp, who were not many in number, neither did any great acte. Thus the *ROMAINE*s hauing escaped this daunger, the next morning they threw the captaine heddlong down the rocks from the castell, who had charge of the watche the night before: & gaue Manlius in recompence of the good seruice he had done, a more honorable then profitable rewarde, which was this. Euery man of them gaue him halfe a pound of the country wheate, which they call Far, and the fourth parte of the measure of wine, which the *GRECIA*ns call Cotile: and this might be about a quart, being the ordinary allowance of euery man by the daye. After this repulse, the GAVLES beganne to be discouraged, partly for that their vitallies sayled them, and durst no more forage abroad in the fieldes for feare of Camillus: and partly also for that the plague came amongst them, being lodged amongst heapes of dead bodies, lying in euery place about ground without buriall,

A and amongst burnt houfes destroyed, where the ashes being blown very high by the winde & vehemēcy of heate, dyd geue a drie persing ayer, that dyd inuariously poylon their bodies when they came to drawe in the breathe of it. But the greatest cause of all their mischief was, the change of their wonted dyer. Who coming out of a frethe cōuntry, where there were excellent pleasaunt places to retire vnto, to auoyde the discommoditie of the parching heate of the sommer, were now in a naughty plaine cōuntry for them to remaine in, in the latter season of the yere. All these things together dyd heape diseases vpon them, besides the long continuance of the sieg about the Capitoll (for it was then about the seventh moneth) by reason whereof there grewe a maruelous death in their campe, through the great numbers of them that dyed daylie, and laye vnburied. But notwithstanding all the death and trouble of the GAVLES, the poore besieged *ROMAINE*s were nothing holpen the more, the famine still dyd growe so fast vpon them. And bicause they could heare nothing of Camillus, they were grown almost vnto a despair: and send vnto him they could not, the GAVLES kept so straight watche vpon them in the citie. Whereupon both parties finding them selues in harde state, first the watche of either side beganne to cast out wordes of peace amongst them selues: and afterwards by cōsent of the heades, Sulpitius, Tribune of the souldiers, came to parle with Brennus. In which parle it was articulated: that the *ROMAINE*s should paye a thousand pounce weight of golde, and that the GAVLES should incontinently after the receipt of the same, departe out of their citie, and all their territories. This decree being passed by othe from both, the golde was brought. And whē it came to be weyed, the GAVLES at the first priuely begane to deale falsely with them: but afterwards they openly stayed the ballance, and would not let them weye no more, whereat the *ROMAINE*s beganne to be angrie with them. Then Brennus, in scorn & mockery, to despight them more, plucked of his sworde, girdell and all, and put it into the ballance where the golde was wayed. Sulpitius seeing that: asked him what he ment by it: Brennus answered him: what canne it signifie els, but sorrowe to the vanquished. This worde euer after ranne as a common prouerbe in the peoples mouthes. Some of the *ROMAINE*s tooke this vile parte of theirs in such scorn, that they would needes take the gold from them againe by force, and so returne into their holde, to abide the sieg still, as they had done before. Other were of opinion to the contrary, and thought it best with patience to put vp this scorn of theirs, and not to thincke it was a shame to paye more then they had promised: but only to paye it by cōpulsion as they dyd, by misfortune of time, was to thincke it rather necessary, then honorable. And as they were debating the matter thus, as well amongst them selues, as with the GAVLES: Camillus came to ROME gates with his armie, and vnderstanding all what had passed betwene them, he commaunded the rest of the army to marche fayer and softly after him in good order, and he in the meane season with the best choyse men he had, went before with all speede. As sone as the other *ROMAINE*s within the citie had spied him, they shewed out for ioye, and receaued him euery one with great reuerence, without any more wordes, as their foueraigne captaine and prince, who had power ouer them all. And Camillus taking the golde out of the skales, gaue it vnto his men, and commaunded the GAVLES presently to take vp their skales, and to get them going: for, sayeth he, it is not the *ROMAINE*s manner to keepe their cōuntry with golde, but with the sworde. Then Brennus beganne to be hotte, and tolde him it was not honorably done of him, to breake the accorde that had passed betwene them before by othe. Whereunto Camillus stowtly answered him againe, that accorde was of no validitie. For he being created Dictator before, all other officers and magistrates whatsoeuer, & their actes, by his election were made of no authoritie: and seeing therefore they had delte with men, that had no power of them selues to accorde to any matter, they were to speake to him, if they required ought. For he alone had absolute authoritie to pardon them if they repented, and would aske it: or els to punish them, and make their bodies answer the damages and losse his cuntry had by them susteyned. These wordes made Brennus madde as a march hare, that out went his blade. Then they drew their swordes of all sides, and layed lustely one at an other as they could, within the houfes, and in open streetes, where they could set no battell in order. But Brennus sodainly remembering him selfe that it was no euen matche for him, retired with his men about him into his campe, before he had lost many of his people. The next night following, he departed out of ROME with all his army, and went to encamp him self about a three score furlong from thence, in the high way that goeth towards the citie of the GABIANs. Camillus with his whole army well appointed, went after him immediately, & shewed at his campe by the breake of daye. The ROMAINES hauing taken hate againe vnto them, dyd lustily geue them battell: the same continued longe, very cruell and doubtfull, vntill the GAVLES at the length were ouerthrowen, and their campe taken with great slaughter. As for those that dyd escape the furie of the battell, they were killed, some by the ROMAINES felues, who hottely followed the chase after the battell broken: the residue of them, and the greatest parte, were slaine by those of the cities and villages neere abouts, that dyd set vpon them as they fled scatteringly here and there in the fields. And thus was the citie of ROME straungely againe recovered, that was before straungely wonne and lost, after it had continued seuen moneths in the hands of the barbarous people. For they entred ROME about the fiftenth daye of Iuly: and they were driuen out againe, about the thirteenth daye of Februarye following. So Camillus triumphed as befecmed him, and as one that had faued and deliuered his countrie out of the hands of their enemies, and set ROME againe at libertie. Those that had bene abroade all the time of this siege, came into ROME againe, following his triumphing charret: and those that had bene besieged within the Capitoll (looking for no other but to haue dyed by famin) went and presented them selues before him, and eche one embraced other in weeping wise for ioye. The priestes and ministers of the temples also, presented their holy iuells, whole and vndefaced, which some of them had buried in the ground within the citie selfe: and others some had caried away with them, when they fled out of ROME. All these the people dyd as gladly see, as if the goddes them selues had returned home againe into their citie. After they had sacrificed vnto the goddes, and rendred them most humble thanks, and had purged their citie, as they had bene taught by men experienced in those matters for satisfaction of the goddes: Camillus beganne againe to buylde vp the temples that were there before, harde by the which he buyle another newe one also to the god Aius Locutius, in that very place where Marcus Ceditius heard the voyce warne him of the coming of the GAVLES. So by Camillus good diligence, and the priestes great paynes and travail, the situations of these temples were with muche a doe founde out againe. But when they were to buylde againe all the rest of the citie, that was wholly burnt, and destroyed to the ground: the people had no minde to it, but euer shrinked backe, to put any hande to the worcke, for that they lacked all things necessarie to beginne the same. Furthermore, waying their late and long suiteined trouble and miseries, they were fitter to take their ease and rest, then to beginne newe labour and toyle, to kill their hartes and bodies altogether. For neither were their bodies able to performe it, nor yet their goods to reache to the charge of it. Wherefore disposing their mindes to dwell in the citie of VEIES, which remained whole, untouched, and furnished of all things to receaue them: they deliuered to the prating Orators (whose tongues dyd neuer cease to speake placencia to the people) trimme occasion to set this matter abroache. So they gaue good eare, and were willing to heare certain feditious wordes spoken against Camillus, which were these. That for his priuate ambition he would deprime them of a citie well furnished already, and would against their willes compell them to lodge in their owne houses, wholly burnt and pulled downe. And moreover, he would make them to rayse vp againe the great ruine the fire had made, to the ende the people might call him, not only capitaine and generall of the ROMAINES, but the founder of ROME also, & so drowne Romulus honorable title thereof. The Senate considering of this matter, & fearing some tumulte among the people: they would not suffer Camillus to leaue his Dictator (ship before the ende of the yere, notwithstanding no man cuer enioyed that office above fixe moneths. Then Camillus for his parte dyd much endeuour him selfe, to comforte & appease the people, praying them all he could to tarie: and further pointed with his finger vnto the graues of their auncesters, and put them in minde also of the holy places dedicated to the goddes, and sanctified by king Numa, or by Romulus, or by other Kings. But amongst many other tokens drawen out of holy and diuine things, he forgate not to bring for example, the heade of a man founde newe and frethe, in making the foundations of the Capitoll, as if that Camillus Dismissed the people, and persuaded the people what he could to dwell in Rome, and to leave Veies.

A if that place by fall destiny had bene once chosen to be the heade and chief of all ITALIE. And moreover, that the holy fyer of the goddesse Veita (which fence the warres had bene kindled againe by the holy Veitall Nunnes) would againe come to be put out by them, if they did forsake their naturall citie, besides the great shame and dishonour it would be vnto them, to see it inhabited in time to come by vnknowe straungers, or els to be left a common field and pasture, for beastes and cattell to graze in. Such sorrowfull examples and griefes, the honest naturall borne citizens, dyd euer blowe into the peoples eares, as well priuately, as openly. The people againe to the contrary, dyd make their hartes to yerne for pittie, when they layed before their eyes their penurie, and pouertie they suiteined: and besought them also not to enforce them to gather and ioine together againe the broken peces of a spoyled citie (as B of a shippewracke that had cast them naked into the sea, hauing only faued bare life and persones) fence that they had another citie neere at hande and ready to receaue them. So Camillus counsell was, that the Senate should consulte vpon this matter, and deliuer their absolute opinion herein: which was done. And in this counsell, he him self brought forth many probable reasons, why they should not leaue in any case, the place of their naturall birth and country: and so dyd many other Senators in like case, fauoring that opinion. Last of all, after these persuations, he commaunded Lucius Lucretius (whose manner was to speake first in such assemblies) that he should stand vp and deliuer his opinion, & that the rest also in order as they sat, should saye their mindes. So euery man keeping silence, as Lucretius was ready to speake, at that present time there passed by their counsaill house, a captaine with his bade that warded C that daye, who spake alowde to his ensigne bearer that went formeit, to staye, and set downe his ensigne there: for, sayed he, here is a very good place for vs to warde in. These wordes being heard vp into the Senate house, euen as they stood all in a doubt & maze what would be the resolution of this matter: Lucretius beganne to saye, that he most humbly thancked the goddes, and allowed of the captaines iudgment, and so euery one of the rest in their order, sayed as much. Moreover there was a wonderful change and alteration of minde suddenly among the common people: for euery man dyd persuaide & encourage his fellowe liuely to put his hand to this worke. In so much as taryng for no diuision or appointing out of streetes, nor setting out euery man his place he should builde in: they fell to worke of all handes, euery one choosing that place he liked best, & was most comodious for their building, without any other D order or diuision amongst them. Whereupon, they running to this building on a head, the streetes were cōfused on heapes together, & their houses all built out of order & vnformitie. For the reporte goeth, that the whole citie (as well cōmon as priuate buildings) was built vp newe againe in a yere. But the surueyors, to whom Camillus had geuen charge to finde out all the holy places where the temples had bene ouerthrowen: as they went about mount Pallatine, they came by chance to the place, where the chappell of Mars had stood, which the GAVLES had wholly burnt and destroyed, as they had done all the rest. They making cleane the place, and surueying euery corner, dyd finde by chance Romulus augures crooked staffe hidden vnder a great mount of ashes. This staffe is crooked at one of the endes, and they call it Litus, which soothsayers doe vse to quarter out the regions of the element, when they will E beholde the flying of birdes to teller of things to come. Romulus that was very skillfull in this arte, dyd vse this staffe: and after he was taken awaye from all mens sights, the priests tooke it, and kept it as a holy relicke, suffering no creature to laye hands on it. Nowe they founde this staffe whole and vnbroken, where all things els were consumed and perished by fire, they were in a marvelous ioye thereat. For they interpreted this to be a signe, of the euerlasting continuance of the citie of ROME. But before they could make an ende of all their building, there grewe a newe warre againe vpon them. For at one very instante, all the AQUES, the VOLSCES, and the LATINES, entred with all their might and mayne into the territories of the ROMAINES. The THYSCANS also went then and besieged SVTRIVM, that was in league & amitie with the ROMAINES. The Tribuni militares got them straight to the field with their F armie, and encamped about mount Martian. The LATINES besieged them so straightly, that their army stood in great danger to be ouerthrowen, & they were driuen to sende to ROME for a newe supplie. Thereupon the ROMAINES dyd choose Camillus Dictator againe the third time. The occasion of this warre is reported two manner of wayes: whereof I will declare the A first, which I doe conceyue to be but a tale. They say the LATINES sent vnto the ROMAINES, to demaunde some of their free maydes in mariage: which they dyd either to make a quarell of warre, or els as desirous in deede, to ioyne both the peoples againe by newe mariages. The ROMAINES were amafed very much at this, and fore troubled, as not knowing howe to aunswer them, they were so affrayed of warres. For they were yet scante newe settled at home, and dreaded much left this demaunde of their daughters, was but a summons made to geue them hostages, which they finely cloyed vnder the name of alliance in mariage. Some saye that there was at that time a bonde mayde called Tutola, or as some saye, Philotis, that went vnto the Senate, and counseiled them they should sende her away with some other fayer maydes slaues, B dressed vp like gentlewomen, & then let her alone. The Senate liked very well of this deuise, and chose such a number of bonde maydes as she desired to haue, & trimming them vp in fine apparell, begawed with chaines of golde and iuells, they sent them forth to the LATINES, who were encamped not farre from the citie. VVhen night was come, the other maydes hyd their enemies [swords]. But this Tutola, or Philotis (call her as you will) dyd clime vp to the topp of a wilde figge tree, from which she shewed a burning torch vnto the ROMAINES, hauing made thiste to hange somewhat behinde her, to keepe the light from sight of the enemies. For this signall the Senate of ROME had secretly appointed her to set vp, which was the cause that the issuing out of the souldiers being commaunded to goe out in the night, was full of trouble and tumulte. For being pressed by their captaines, they called one another, and there was great a doe to put them into order of battell. Thus they went to take their enemies sleeping, who nothing mistrusting the same, were slaine the most parte of them within their cape. This was done on the fifte day of the moneth called then Quintilis, & now is named Iulycat which time they doe yet celebrate a certaine feast in remembrance of that acte. For first of all, going out of the citie, they call allowde many of their fellowes names which are most common: as Caius, Marcus, and Lucius, shewing thereby howe one of them called another after that sorte, as they went in great haue out of the citie. Afterwardes all the mayde seruantes of the citie being trimmely apparellled, goe playing vp and downe the towne, pleasauntly ieastring with those they mete: and in the ende they make as though they fought together, in token that they dyd helpe the ROMAINES at that time to destroye the LATINES. Then they are feasted, sitting vnder bowers made with wilde figge tree boughes: and this feaste daye is called, None D Capratine, by reason of the wilde figge tree (as some thincke) from the topp whereof, the bonde mayde shewed to the ROMAINES the burning torch. For the ROMAINES call the wilde figge tree, Caprificus. Other saye, that all these things are done and spoken, in remembrance of the mischaunce that happened vnto Romulus, when he was taken out of their fight, the same day without the gates of the city, at which time there rose a sodain miste & darke clowd.

 Or as some other saye, that then was the eclipse of the sunne: and they holde opinion that the day was named None Capratine, because Capra in the ROMAIN toge, signifieth a goate. Romu- lus vanished out of mens sightes, as he was making an oration vnto his people, neere vnto the place which is called goate marthe, as we haue mentioned more at large in his life. The 2. occasion & beginning of this warre (according to the opinion of most writers) was, that Camillus E being chosen Dictator the third time, & knowing that the Trib. militares with their army were straightly besieged by the LATINES, and Volscs: he was enforced to arme all the old men, who for very age were priuiledged from further seruice in warres. And hauing fetched a great copasse about mount Martian, because he would not be scene of his enemies, he came to lodge his campe behind them, where he raised fiers, to make the ROMAINES knowe that were besieged, how he was come which as sone as they perceiued, they tooke to the corage againe, & determined to fight. But the LATINES & Volscs kept within their cape, & dyd entrench & fortifie the selues with a wall of wodd, which they layed a crosse, because they saw they were beset both before & behind: & determined to tary the releefe of a new supply, as well of their owne, as of some further ayde besides fro the Thvscans, which thing Camillus pceaung, & fearing F least they should serue him, as he had already halded the by copassing of him againe behind: he thought it necessary to preuent this. So considering the inclosure & fortificatio of their cape was

A all of wodde, and that euery morning commonly, there came a great winde from the side of the mountains, he made prouision of a number of fire brandes. And leading out his armie into the fields by breake of day, he appointed one parte of them to geue charge vpon the enemies on the one side, with great noyse and shewing: and he with the other parte determined to rayle fier on the contrary side, from whence the winde should come, looking for oportunitie to doe the same. VVhen he sawe the sunne vp, and the winde beginning to whistle, blowing a good gale from the side of the hilles, & that the skirmish was begonne on the other side: then he gaue a signall vnto the companie he led with him, to set vpon the enemies, and made them throwe into the inclosure of their campe, diuers potts & darts with fire, so that the flame finding matter to catche holde of, in this inclosure of wodde, & trees layed ouerthwart, dyd raise B straight an exceeding great flame in the ayer, & still got waye inwards into the LATINES cape.
 Whereupon the LATINES being vnprovidid of present remedy to quenche the flame, and seeing their campe a fyre all about their eares: they gathered them selues together at the first in a very small roome. Neuertheles, they were enforced in the ende to get them into the field, & there they founde their enemies ready armed, & in battell raze. So as fewe of those escaped that came into the field, & their fellowes that remained within their cape, were burnt to death with fyre, vntill the ROMAINES them selues came to quench it for greedines of their spoyle & goodes. When all this was done, Camillus left his sonne in the campe, to keepe the prisoners & Ipyoles: & he him self, with the rest of the armie, went to inuade his enemies contrie, where he tooke the citie of Boys. Then after he had overcome the Volscs, he led his army presently from thence vnto the citie of Svtrivm. For he had not yet harde of their misfortune.
 C Therefore he halted him self to ayde them, because he thought they were yet besieged by the Thvscans. But siche was their harde fortune, that they had already yielded vp their citie by composition, & saued no parte of their goodes, but the very clothes they had on their backs.
 So being turned out of all they had, they met Camillus by the waye as they were wandring abroad, lamenting their miserie, with their wiues & little young children: whose miserie went to the very harte of Camillus, when he beheld their lamentable state. Furthermore, when he sawe the ROMAINES weepe for pittie also, to see the mone that these vnfortunate people made vnto him, and that it greued them hartly to beholde their great mischaunce: he determined with him self not to deferre reuenge, but presently to goe the selfe same daye before the citie D of Svtrivm, imagining that he should finde the Thvscans out of order, without keeping watch, & attending nothing but making good cheere, because they had newly taken a wealthy riche citie, where they had left neuer an enemy in the same to hurte them, neither feared any abroad to come neere to assaulte them. And in deede it fell out rightly as he gesied. For he had not only passed through the territories of the citie, without any intelligence geuen to the enemies within the same: but he was come to the very gates, and had taken the walles, before they hard any thing of his coming, by reason they neither kept watch nor warde, but were dispersed abroad in the citie, in euery house, eating and drincking droncke together. Insomuch as when they knew their enemies were already within the citie, they were so full fraight with meate & wine, that the most of their wittes serued them not so much as to flye, but stard vn-E till they were slaine or taken, like beastes in the houses. Thus was the citie of Svtrivm twise taken in one daye. And it chaunced that those which had wonne it, lost it: & those which had lost it, recouered it againe by Camillus meanes. Who deserued both the honour and entrie of triumphe into ROME: the which wanne him no lesse good will and glorie, then the two first before had done prayse, and gotten fame. For euen his greatest enemies that most spighted and enuied his former noble actes, ascribing them rather to fortune that fauored him, then to his valliantnes or worthines: were forced now by this deede of his to confesse, that his wisdomed and valliantnes deserued prayse and commendation to the skyes. Camillus of all his enemies had one most bitter to him, which was Marcus Manlius, that was the first man that gaue the Gayles the repulse that night they had entered the walles of the Capitoll.
 F And had thought to haue taken it: whereupon they gaue him the surname of Capitolinus. He aspiring to be the chief of the citie, & finding no direct waye to exceede the glory of Camil-

the common people, and specially those that were indebted: he tooke vpon him to defende A their causes, and pleaded their case at the barre against their creditours. Sometimes he tooke the debtors out of the creditours handes and caried them away by force, that for lacke of abilitie to paye, were by rigour of the lawe condemned to be bonde slaues. But by this practise, in shorte time he gotte him a maruelous number of suche needie followers, and poore men, that the noble men and honest citizens were affrayed of the insolent partes they played, and of the continuall troubles and tumultes they daylie stirred vp in the market place. Therefore suspecting the worst in this case, they dyd choole Quintus Capitolinus Dictator: who caused the sayed Manlius immediately to be apprehended, and committed him to prison. Whereupon the people beganne to change their apparell: which they were neuer wont to doe, but in great and common calamities. But the Senate fearing least some cōmōtion would rise hereupon, they dyd set him at libertie againe. He being thus out of prison, was no whit the better, nor wiser thereby, but dyd still stirre vp the commons, more boldly and sediciously, then before. Then was Camillus chosen againe Tribunus militaris, and Manlius was accused in his time of office. But when this matter came to pleading, the sight of the Capitoll troubled his accusers much. For the very place it selfe where Manlius had repulsed the GAYLES by night, and defended the Capitoll, was easely seene from the market place, where the matter was a hearing: and he him selfe pointing with his hande, shewed the place vnto the goddes, and weeping tenderly he layed before them the remembrance of the hazarde of his life, in fighting for their safety. This dyd moue the iudges hartes to pittie, so as they knew not what to doe, but many times they dyd put ouer the hearing of his case vnto another daye, and neither would they geue iudgement, knowing he was conuicted by manifest proofes: neither could they vse the seueritie of the lawe vpon him, because the place of his so notable good seruice was euer still before their eyes. Wherefore Camillus finding the cause of delaye of iustice, dyd make the place of iudgement to be removed without the citie, into a place called the wodde Petilian, from whence they could not see the Capitoll. And there the accusers gaue apparent euidence against him: and the iudges considering all his wicked practises, concealed a iust cause to punishe him, as he had defused. So they gaue sentence of death against him: that he should be caried to the mount Capitoll, and there to be thrown downe hedlonge the rockes thereof. Thus, one, and the selfe place was a memory of his notable good seruice, and also a memoriall of his miserable and vnfortunate end. Besides all this, D they rased his house, and built in the same place a temple to the goddesse they call Moneta: and made a lawe also, that no Patrician from thenceforth should dwell any more in the mount Capitoll. Camillus after this, being called againe to take the office of Tribunus militaris the first time: he sought to excuse him selfe aswell for that he sawe he was well stepe in yeres, as also for that he feared fortunes spight, or some mishap, after he had obtained such glorie for his noble actes and seruice. Howbeit the most apparent cause of his excuse, was his sicknes, which troubled him much at that time. But the people would allowe no excuse by any means, but cried out, they dyd not desire he should fight a foote nor a horse backe, but that he should only geue counsaile, and commaunde: and therefore they compelled him to take the charge, and to leade the armie with one of his companions named Lucius Furius, against E their enemies the PRÆNESTINES, and the VOLSCES, who ioyning together, dyd invade the confines of the ROMAINE friends. So he led his army out immediately to the field, and camped as neere the enemy as he could: being minded for his parte to drawe the warres out in length, that he might fight afterwards (if neede required) when he had recouered strength. But Furius contrarie coueting glorie, was wholly bent to hazarde the battell, whatsoeuer perill came of it: and to this ende he stirred vp, and incorage the capitaines of euerie priuate bande. Wherefore Camillus fearing lest they should thinke, for ill will he bare the young men, that he went about to hinder and take awaye the means to winne their honour, and to doe some noble acte: suffered Furius against his will to put his men in order of battell, and he in the meane season by reason of his sicknes, remained with a fewe about him in the campe. So F went Lucius vpon a head to present battell to the enemy, & so was he as headlie also overthrown. But Camillus hearing the ROMAINE were overthrowen: sicke as he was vpon his bedde,

A bedde, got vp, and taking his householde seruantes with him, he went in haste to the gates of the campe, and passed through those that fled, vntill he came to meete with the enemies that had them in chafe. The ROMAINE seeing this that were already entred into the campe, they followed him at the heeles forthwith: and those that fled also without, when they sawe him, they gathered together, and put them selues againe in arraye before him, and perswaded one another not to forsake their captaine. So their enemies hereupon stayed their chasing, and would pursue no further that daye. But the next morning, Camillus leading his armie into the fildes, gaue them battell, and wanne the field of them by plaine force: and following the victorie hard, he entred amongst them that fled into their campe pelmele, or hand over head, and slue the most parte of them euen there. After this victorie, he was aduertised howe the B THYSCANS had taken the citie of SVTRIVM, and had put to the sword all the inhabitants of the same, which were the ROMAINE citizens. Whereupon he sent to Rome the greatest parte of his army, and keeping with him the lightest and lustiest men, went and gaue assault vnto the THYSCANS, that now were harbored in the citie of SVTRIVM. Which when he had wonne againe, he slue parte of them, and the other saued them selues by flight. After this, he returned to Rome with an exceeding spoyle, confirming by experience, the wisdom of the ROMAINE, who dyd not feare the age nor sicknes of a good captaine that was experte and valliant: but had chosen him against his will, though he was both olde and sicke, and preferred him farre before the younger and lustier that made sute to haue the charge. Newes being brought vnto the Senate, that the THYSCVLIANS were reuolted, they sent Camillus C thither againe, willing him of five other companions to take out one he liked best, euery of the which desired to be chosen, and made their sute vnto him for the same. But he refusing all other, dyd chose againe Lucius Furius beyonde all expectation of men, seeing not long before he needed would against his will hazarde battell, in which he was ouerthrowen. Howbeit Camillus, hauing a desire (as I thincke) to hyde his faulte and shame he had receaued: dyd of curtesie preferre him before all other. Nowe the THYSCVLIANS hearing of Camillus coming against them, greatly sought to culler the faulte they had already committed. Wherefore they put out a fubtil number of people into the fildes, some to plowe, other to keepe the beastes, as if they had bene in best peace: and dyd set the gates of the citie wide open, sent their children openly to schoole, their artificers wrought their occupation in their shoppes, D the men of hauour & honest citizens walked in the market place in their long gownes, & the officers and gouernours of the citie went vp and downe to euery house, commanding them to prepare lodgings for the ROMAINE, as if they had stode in no feare at all, and as though they had committed no faulte. Howbeit all these fine fetches could not make Camillus beleue, but that they had an intent to rebell against the ROMAINE: yet they made Camillus pittie them, seeing they repented them of that they had determined to doe. So he commaunded them to goe to Rome to the Senate, to craue pardone of their faulte: and he him selfe dyd helpe them, not only to purge their citie of any intent of rebellion, but also to get them the priuledge and freedome of Rome. And these be the chiefest acts Camillus dyd in the first time of his tribuneshippe. After this, one Licinius Stolo moued great sedition in the citie, betwene E the common people, and the Senate. For he would in any case that of the two Consuls, which were chosen yerely, the one of them should be a commoner, and not that both of them should be of the auncient noble families, called Patricians. The Tribunes of the people were chosen, but the election of the Consuls, the people stayed: so that the common wealth went to decaye, and declined to greater troubles, then euer it dyd before, for lacke of gouernment. But to suppress this, the Senate created Camillus the fourth time Dictator: but this was fore against his will, because it misliked the people much. Furthermore, he would not complaine of the people, for that they hauing serued vnder him in many warres and battells, might boldly and truly saye vnto him: that he had done more notable acts by them in the warres, then he had done by the Patricians in peace: Yet was he created Dictator in despight, to rule the people, F and of enuie in the noble men towards them. Thus needesse dyd vrge him, either by force to suppress the people, if he were the stronger in this dissention: or els that he him self should be suppressed, if he became the weaker. Camillus notwithstanding, preparing to preuent this mischiefe, and knowing the daye the Tribunes had determined, to preferre the passing of their lawe by voyces of the people: he gaue warning by proclamations set vpon postes, that the same very daye he would muster the people, and all was but to drawe them from the market place into the field of Mars, and dyd set great penalties vpon those that should be lacking at the musters, and would presume to disobey. The Tribunes of the people on the contrarie parte, dyd withstande his threats, and sware they would condemne Camillus selfe in fiftie thousand Drachmas of siluer, if he dyd not let the people alone, but would goe about to disturbe them for geuing their voyces to such lawe, as they liked of. Camillus perceiving this, and fearing to be condemned, and banished once againe, which would fall out very ill for him, being nowe an olde man, and one that had done so many great and notable actes, or els for that he thought him selfe not strong enough to withstande the force of the people: he kept his house that daye, sayning him selfe to be sicke, and certaine other dayes following, and in the ende he gaue vp his office. Thereupon the Senate chose in his place another Dictator, who named the same Licinius Stolo general of the horse men, that was the author and furtherer of all this sedition: and besides dyd suffer him to preferre another lawe, and to passe it by voyces of the people, that aboute all other lawes, dyd most trouble the Patricians. Which lawe dyd forbid any citizen of ROME, to haue, or occupie aboue fise hundred iugera, which amount to 330. acres and a halfe, 12. pole, and 121. partes of a pole. Then was this Stolo alofte, and of great estimation at that time: for that he had in despite of the Senate established this law. Howbeit shortly after it was found out, that him selfe had more number of acres then his owne lawe permitted. By reason whereof, he receaued the iuste punishment of his owne default for forfeiture. Yet the most weightie matter of all this diffention that beganne first, and most of all troubled the Senate, touching the election of the Consuls, remained still vndertermined. But while these matters were thus in talke, the ROMAINES had certen intelligence, howe the GAVLES were departed once againe from the Adriaticke sea, and were coming with a great power straight vnto ROME: vpon reporte of which newes, the warres followed immediately. For the GAVLES destroyed the champion country as they went: and the poore country men that could not recouer ROME, were scattered here and there amongst the mountaines. The feare of this dyd somewhat appease the diffention. The people then assembling with the Senate, and the baser sorte with the noble, dyd all with one voyce and assent chuse Camillus Dictator the fiftie time. He was nowe a very olde man, lacking litle of foure score yeres; but neuertheles, considering the necessitie and present daunger, without framing any excuse, or starting as he had before, he vnderooke the charge. Nowe that he had taken it vpon him, he presently leued men, and prepared his army. And knowing very well howe the fiercenes of these barbarous GAVLES consisted, in downe right blowes with their swordes, with which they would strike of heades and shoulers of men at a blowe, mangling them like bouchers, without any cast or skylle of fight: he caused iron fallattes, and morians to be made for the most of his men, as smoothly wrought on the out side as could be, that their swordes lighting on them, should either slyde of, or breake. Moreouer, he caused their sheldes to haue barres made about them of copper, bicause the wodde selfe was not able to abide their blowes. Furthermore, he dyd teache his souldiers to cary long iaelines or punction staues, where they might wounde their enemies lifting vp their swordes to strike them. Nowe when the GAVLES were come neere ROME, hauing pitched their campe vpon the riuer of Anian, and being full loden and stuffed with all kindes of spoyle and booties: then Camillus brought his armie also into the fildes, and went to lodge on a litle hill which was easie to get vpon, where there were many litle caues, so that the most of his army was all hidden and couered, and those that were seene, seemed to be retired thither into those highe places for an aduantage, and of feare. Camillus to increase this opinion more in his enemies, and to make them the bolder: dyd suffer them to come and spoyle euen to the foote of the hill where he was lodged, and stirred not once out to trouble them, but kept him selfe quiet in his campe and well fortified. Vntill such time as he spied occasion of aduantage, that the best parte of their army were scattered here and there, a forraging all about the fildes: and those which remained in their campe, fell to eating and drincking, as they vsed carelesly at all howres. Anian.

Camillus sent very early before daye, his lightest armed men, to vexe and trouble the barbarous people in coming out of their campe, and to let them in any case from putting their men in order of battell: and he at the breake of daye, came downe into the plaine, and dyd set his other men being well armed, in good arraye, which were a great number, and lustie fellows, and were not as the barbarous people thought, fewe, and fearefull. This at the very first discouraged the hartes of the GAVLES maruelously, bicause they thought them selues dishonored, that the ROMAINES should charge vpon them first. Afterwardes also Camillus vanguard dyd set vpon the GAVLES, and that on a sodaine, before they had leysure to put them selues in battell, or to order their troupes: compelling them to fight without order, as they met out of order by chaunce. In the ende also Camillus came vpon the neckes of them, with all his whole force, and army together: against whom they ranne notwithstanding, holding vp their naked swordes alofte in their hands. But the ROMAINES thrusting with their armed iaelines, receaued their enemies blowes vpon them, and thereby so rebated the edges of their swordes (their blades being very sharpe and thinne grounde, and of so softe a temper) that they bowed againe, and stoode crooked vnreasonably: and furthermore, hauing peried their shields through with their punching staues, the GAVLES armes were so cloged and wearied with them, the ROMAINES plucking them backe to them againe, that they threw away their swordes and shields, and flying in, closed with the ROMAINES, and caught holde of their iaelines, thincking by plaine force to haue wrested them out of their hands. Howbeit they perceiving then the GAVLES were naked, fell straight to their swordes: and so was the slaughter of their first rankes very great. The other fled scatteringly here and there, all about the plaine: bicause Camillus had caused all the hilles and mountaines about them to be occupied and possessed. Neither dyd they retire towards their campe, for that it was vnfortified, and also knewe well enough it would be easely taken. This battell (as they saye) was thirtene yeres after their taking of ROME before. But after that fildes, the ROMAINES courages were good enough against these barbarous GAVLES, whom they stoode in feare of before: thincking the first time they came, that they had not ouercome them by force, but by reason of the plague that fell amongst them, or through some other strange chaunce. For they dyd so feare them at that time, that they made a lawe, howe their priestes should be exempted from warres, so it were not against the GAVLES. This ouerthrowe was the last marshall acte Camillus dyd in the warres. For, the taking of the citie of VELITRES, was an accident depending vpon this iorney: bicause they yelded straight vnto him, without striking any stroke. But the ieditiousnes of the people of ROME about gouernment, and the choosing of the yere Consuls, was the hardest matter he euer had in hande. For they returning home to ROME stronge, and of greates power, by their late obtained victorie: woulde in any case haue one of the Consuls to be chosen of a commoner, which was directly against their ancient custome. But the Senate stoutly withstoode it, and would not suffer Camillus to be put out of office: hoping the better by meanes of his authoritie, which was greates then, that they should mainteine and continue their ancient dignitie, and prerogative of their nobilitie. But as Camillus was set in his chayer in the market place, where he hearde and dispatched causes: there came a fergeante to him, sent from the Tribunes of the people, who commaunded him to followe him, and there withall layed violent hands vpon him, as he woulde haue caried him awaye by force. This made suche a terrible tumulte and vprore, that the like was neuer seene before in the market place. For Camillus friends draue the fergeante backe behinde the chayer. The common people cried out againe to the fergeant from beneath, pull him out of his chayer. This so amazed Camillus, that he knew not well what to saye to the matter. Notwithstanding, he would not resigne vp his office, but taking those Senatours he had about him, he went vnto the place where the Senate was wont to be kept. And there, before he would goe into it, he returned backe againe vnto the Capitoll, & made his prayer vnto the goddes, that it would please them to bring his troubles againe to a quiet, and so made a solemne vowe and promise (if these tumultes and troubles might be pacified) that he woulde builde a temple of Concorde. When this matter came to debating before the Senate, there fell great contention and diuersitie of opinions among them: yet in the ende, the easiest waye dyd carie it, and that was to graunt the common peoples desire, that a commoner should be chosen Consul with a noble man. The Dictator hauing openly published to the people the Senates decree, confirming their desire: the common people were so ioyfull, that at that presente they let fall all their malice against the Nobilitie and Senate, and brought Camillus home to his house, with greate showtes of ioye, and clapping of handes. The next morning all the people being assembled together in the market place, it was there decreed: that the temple of concorde should be built at the common wealthes charge (according to the vowe Camillus had made) in such a place, as it might be seene from the market place selfe, where all the assemblies for matters of counsell were made. And further, it was ordered that one daye more should be added to the feastes of the LATINES: & that from thenceforth they should solemnise foure festiuall dayes, & should presently make generall sacrifices vnto the goddes, in euerie temple of the citie, to geue them thanckes: and in token of ioye, they should all weare garlandes vpon their heades for this reconciliation. So Camillus proceeding to election, there were chosen two Consuls, Marcus Emilius of the noble Patricians, and Lucius Sextus of the Plebeians or commoners. And this was the laste acte that euer Camillus dyd. For, the next yere after, the plague was in ROME, and tooke awaye an infinite number of people that dyed, besides many magistrates and officers of the citie that departed: among whom, Camillus also left his life. Who notwithstanding he had liued a long time, and had ended a reasonable course of life: yet he was as ready to dye, and as patiently tooke his death, as any man liuing could haue done. Moreouer, the ROMAINES made more mone and lamentation for his death alone, then for all the rest the plague had already consumed.

The ende of Furius Camillus life.

THE LIFE OF Pericles.

A SAR seeing in ROME one daye certain riche & wealthy straungers, hauing litle dogges and munkeyes in their armes, and that they made maruelous much of them, he asked them if the women in their country had no children: wisely reproving them by his question, for that they bestowed their naturall loue & affection vpon brute beasts, which they should with all kindnes and loue bestowe vpon creatures. Nature in like case also, hauing planted in our minds a naturall desire to learne and vnderstand, we are in reason to reprove those that vainly abuse this good desire, fondly disposing it to learne things vaine and vnprofitable: and to cast behinde them in the meane season things honest and necessarie to be learned. For as touching our outward fence, which with passion receaueth impressio of the thing it seeth, peraduenture it wilbe necessarie to consider indifferently the thing seene, whether it will fall out beneficiall or hurtfull vnto him: but so fareth it not with our vnderstanding, for every man maye at his pleasure turne and dispose that to the thinge he taketh delight in, the reason whereof we must allwayes employe to the best parte, and that not only to consider and looke vpon the thing, but also to reape the benefit and commoditie of the thing we see. For like as the eye is most delited with the lightest and freshest cullers: euen so we must geue our mindes vnto those sightes, which by looking vpon them doe drawe profit and pleasure vnto vs. For such effects doth vertue bring: that either to heare or reade them, they doe printe in our hartes an earnest loue and desire to followe them. But this followeth not in all other things we esteeme, neither are we allwayes disposed to desire to doe the things we see well done: but contrary oftentimes, when we like the worke, we mislike the worke man, as commonly in making these perfumes and purple cullers. For both the one, & the other doe please vs well: but yet we take perfumers & diers to be men of a meane occupation. Therefore Antisthenes answered one very wisely, that told him Ismerius was an excellent player of the flute. But yet he is a naughtie man, sayed he: otherwise he could not be so conning at the flute as he is. Euen so dyd Philippe king of MACEDON saye to his sonne Alexander the great on a time: that at a certain feast had song passing sweetely, and like a master of musick: Art thou not ashamed, sonne, to singe so well? It is enough for a King to bestowe his leysure somtime to A heare musitians singe, and he doth much honour to the muses to heare the masters of the science otherwhile, when one of them singeth to excell another. But he that personally shall bestowe his time, exercising any meane science: bringeth his paynes he hath taken in matters vnprofitable, a wimes against him selfe, to proue that he hath bene negligent to learne things honest and profitable. And there was neuer any young gentleman nobly borne, that seeing the image of Iupiter (which is in the cittie of Pisa) desired to become Phidias: nor Polyclitus, for seeing of Luno in the cittie of Aegoss: nor that desired to be Anacreon, or Philemon, or Archilochus, for that they tooke pleasure somtime to reade their workes. For it followeth not of necessity, that though the worke delight, the workeman must needes be payed. And so in like case, such things doe not profit those which behold them, bicause they doe not moue affection in the hartes of the beholders to followe them, neither doe stirre vp affection to resemble them, and much lesse to conformance our selues vnto them. But vertue hath this singular propertie in all her actions: that she maketh the man that knoweth her to affect her so, that straight he liketh all her doings, and desireth to followe those that are vertuous. For, as for riches, we only desire to haue them in possession: but of vertue, we chiefly loue the deedes.

 Wherefore, we are contented to haue goodes from other men: but good deedes we would other should haue from vs. For vertue is of this power, that she allureth a mans minde presently to vse her, that wisely considereth of her, and maketh him very desirous in his harte to followe her: and doth not frame his manners that beholdeth her by any imitation, but by the only vnderstanding and knowledge of vertuous deedes, which sodainly bringeth vnto C him a resolute desire to doe the like. And this is the reason, why me thought I should continnew still to write on the liues of noble men, and why I made also this tenth booke: in the which are contained the liues of Pericles, and Fabius Maximus, who maintained warres against Hanniball. For they were both men very like together in many sundry vertues, and specially in currese and iustice: & for that they could patiently beare the follies of their people, and companions that were in charge of gouernment with them, they were maruelous profitable members for their cuntry. But if we haue sorted them well together, comparing the one with the other: you shall easily iudge that reade our writings of their liues. Pericles was D of the tribe of the Scamanides, of the towne of Cholargys, and of one of the best & most auncient families of the cittie of Athens, both by his father and mother. For Xanthippus his father (who ouercame in battell the lieutenants of the king of Persia in the iorney of Mysala) married Agariste that came of Clithenes, he who draue out of Athens Pisistratus of-spring, and valliantly ouerthrew their tyrannie. Afterwards he established lawes, and orde-ned a very graue forme of gouernment, to mainteine his citizens in peace and concord together. This Agariste dreamed one night, that she was brought a bed of a lyon: and very thortely after she was deliuered of Pericles, who was so well proportioned in all the partes of his bodie, that nothing could be mended, sauing that his head was somewhat to long and out of proportion to the rest of his bodie. And this is the only cause why all the statues & images of him almost, are made with a helmer of his head: bicause the workemen as it should seeme (and so it is most likely) were willing to hide the blemish of his deformitie. But the ATTIC CAN poets dyd call him Schinocephalos, as much to saye, as headed like an onyon. For those of Attica doe sometime name that which is called in the vulgar tongue Scilla, that is to saye, an onyon of barbarie: Schinos. And Cratinus the Comicall poet in his comedie he intituled Chironus, sayed:

Olde Saturne he, and dreadfull dyre debate begotten haue, be vncle them Carnally, this tyrane here, this heavy iollising pate, in courte of goddes so termed vworthely.

And againe also in that which he nameth Nemesis, speaking of him, he sayeth:

Come Iupiter come Iupiter, Come iollish head, and come inkeeper.

And Teleclides mocking him also, sayeth in a place Pericles had a long head.

A Sometimes he standes amazed when he perceiues, that harde it wwere, sufficiently to knowe, in what estate, his gouernment he leaues.
 And then will he, be feldome scene by loure, suche heavy heapes, vnto in his braynes doe growe.
 But yet sometimes, out of that monstrous pate he thundreth fast, and threatneth every state.

And Eupolis in a comedie which he intituled Demi: being very inquisitiue, and asking particularly of every one of the Orators (whom he fayned were returned out of hell) when they named Pericles the last man vnto him, he sayed:

B Truly thou hast now brought, vnto vs here that deuell, the chief of all the captaines, that come from darksome hell.

And as for musicke, the most authors write, that Damon dyd teache him musicke, of whose name (as men saye) they should pronounce the first syllable shorte. Howbeit Aristotle sayeth, that he was taught musicke by Pytholides. Howsoeuer it was, it is certaine that this Damon was a man of deepe vnderstanding, and subtil in matters of gouernment: for, to hide from the people his sufficiency therein, he gaue it out he was a musitian, and dyd resorte vnto Pericles, as a master wrestler, or fencer: but he taught him howe he should deale in matters of state. Notwithstanding, in the ende he could not so conningly conuey this matter, but the people sawe his harping and musicke, was only a viser to his other practise: wherefore C they dyd banish him A THENS for fye yeres, as a man that busilie tooke vpon him to change the state of things, and that fauored tyrannie. And this gaue the Comicall poets matter to playe vpon him finely: among which Plato in a comedie of his, bringeth in a man that af-keth him:

O Chiron, tell me first: art thou in deede the man, which dyd instruct Pericles thus? make answer if thou can.

He was sometime also scholler to the philosopher Zenon, who was borne in the cittie of E-LEA, & taught naturall philosophie, as Parmenides dyd: but his profession was to thwarte and contrary all men, and to alledge a world of obiections in his disputation, which were so intlicate, that his aduersarie replying against him, knewe not howe to answer him, nor to D conclude his argument. The which Timon Philistius witnesseth in these wordes, Zenon was subtill sure, and very eloquent, and craftilie could wounde a man, by waye of argument, if so he wwere disposed, his cunning to deserue, or shoue the sharpnes of his wit, so practise pollicie.

But Anaxagoras Clazomenian was he that was most familiar and conuersant with him, and dyd put in him the maiestie and grauity he shewed in all his sayings, and doings. Who dyd farre excell the common course of ordinarie Orators that pleaded before the people: and to be shorte, he it was that dyd facion his manners, altogether to ceter that graue countenance which he dyd. For they called Anaxagoras in his time, Nis, as much to saye, E as vnderstanding. Either bicause they had his singular wit and capacite in such great admiration, being growen to searche out the cause of naturall things: or that he was the first man, who dyd ascribe the disposition and gouernment of this world, not vnto fortune or fatal necessity, but vnto a pure, simple, and vnderstanding minde, which doth separate as the first mouing cause, the substance of such like partes as are medled and compounded of di-uers substances, in all other bodies throughe the world. Pericles made maruelous muche of Anaxagoras, who had fully instructed him in the knowledge of naturall things, and of those specially that worke aboue in the ayer and firmament. For he gaue not only to haue a great mind and an eloquent tongue, without any affectation, or grosse comely termes: but to a ceteren modest countenance that scanty smiled, very sober in his gait, having a kynde of founde in his voyce that he neuer lost nor altered, and was of very honest behaiour, neuer troubled in his talke for any thing that crossed him, and many other suche like things, as all that sawe them in him, and considered them, could but wonder at him. But for prooffe hereof, the reporte goeth, there was a naughty busy fellowe on a time, that a whole day together dyd nothing but rayle vpon Pericles in the market place, and reuile him to his face, with all the villanous wordes he could vse. But Pericles put all vp quietly, and gaue him not a worde againe, dispatching in the meane time matters of importance he had in hand, vnill night came, that he went softly home to his house, shewing no alteration nor semblance of trouble at all, though this lewde varlet followed him at the heeles, with wordes of open defamacion. And as he was ready to enter in at his owne doores, being darke night, he commaunded one of his men to take a torche, and to bring this man home to his house. Yet the poet Ion sayeth, that Pericles was a very prowde man, and a stately, and that with his grauity and noble minde, there was mingled a certaine scorn and contempt of other: and contrariwise, he greatly prayeth the ciuillitie, humanitie, and curtesie of Cimon, because he could facion him selfe to all companies. But letting passe that which the poet Ion sayed: who would that vertue should be full of tragical discipline, bringing in with it, a certaine satyricall discourse to moue laughter. Nowe Zenon contrariwise dyd counsell all those, that sayd Pericles grauity was a presumption, and arrogance: that they should also followe him in his presumption. For, to counterfeate in that sorte things honest and vertuous, doth secretly with time breede an affection and desire to loue them, and afterwards with custome euen effectually to vse and followe them. So Pericles by keeping Anaxagoras company, dyd not onely profit him selfe in these things, but he learned besides to put awaye all superstitious feare, of celestiall signes and impressions scene in the ayer. For to those that are ignorant of the causes thereof, suche sights are terrible, and to the godly also feareful, as if they were vtterly vndone: and all is, because they haue no certaine knowledge of the reason that naturall philosophy yeldeth, which in steade of a fearefull superstition, would bring a true religion accompanied with assured hope of goodnes. Some saye a man brought Pericles one daye from his farme out of the countie, a rammes head that had but one horne, and that the prognosticator Lampon considering this head, that had but one strong horne in the midst of his forehead, interpreted, that this was the signification thereof. That being two tribes and feuerall factions in the citie of ATHENS touching gouernment, the one of Pericles, and the other of Thucydides: the power of both should be brought into one, and specially into his parte, in whose house this signe dyd happen. Further, it is sayed that Anaxagoras being present, dyd cause the rammes head to be clouen in two peces, and shewed vnto them that stood by, that the brayne of this ramme dyd not fill the panne of his naturall place, but inclosed it selfe in all partes, being narrowe like the poynte of an egge, in that parte where the horne tooke his first roote of budding out. So Anaxagoras was maruelously esteemed at that present by all those that stood by: but so was Lampon, sone after that Thucydides was driuen awaye, and that the gouernment of the whole common weale fell into the handes of Pericles alone. And it is not to be wondered at (in my opinion) that the naturall philosopher and the prognosticator dyd rightly mete together in trothe: the one directly telling the cause, and the other the ende of the euent as it fell out. For the profession of the one, is to knowe howe it commeth: and of the other, wherefore it commeth, and to foretell what it betokeneth. For where some saye, that to shewe the cause, is to take awaye the signification of the signe: they do not consider that in seeking to abolishe by this reason the wonderfull tokens and signes in the ayer, they doe take awaye those also which are done by arte. As the noyle of balons, the lightes of fyre by the sea side, and the shadowes of needles or pointes of dyalles in the sunne: all which things are done by some cause and handy worke, to be a signe and token of some thing. But this argument peraduenture maye serue better in another booke. And nowe againe to Pericles. Whilist he was yet but a young man, the people stood in awe of him, because he somwhat resembled Pisistratus in his countenance: and the auncientest men of the citie also were muche afearde of his softe voyce, his eloquent tongue, and ready vterance: because in those

cles was surnamed Olympius.

A in those he was Pisistratus vp and downe. Moreouer he was very riche and wealthy, and of one of the noblest families of the citie, and those were his friendes also that caried the only swaye and authoritie in the state: whereupon, fearing least they would banishe him with the banishment of Ostracismos; he would not meddle with gouernment in any case, although otherwise he shewed him selfe in warres very valliant and forward, and feared not to venter his person. But after that Aristides was dead, that Themistocles was driuen awaye, and that Cimon being euer in seruice in the warres as generall in forreine countries, was a long time out of Greece: then he came to leane to the tribe of the poore people, preferring the multitude of the poore commonaltie, about the small number of Nobilitie and riche men, the which was directly against his nature. For of him selfe he was not popular, nor meanely geuen: but he dyd it (as it should seeme) to auoyde suspicion, that he should pretend to make him selfe King. And because he sawe Cimon was inclined also to take parte with the Nobilitie, and that he was singularly beloued and liked of all the honeste sorte: he to the contrarie enclined to the common people, purchasing by this meanes safety to him selfe, and authoritie against Cimon. So he presently beganne a newe course of life, since he had raken vpon him to deale in matters of state: for they neuer sawe him afterwards at any time goe into the citie, but to the market place, or to the Senate house. He gaue vp going to all feastes where he was bidden, and left the entertainment of his friendes, their company and familiaritie. So that in all his time wherein he gouerned the common weale, which was a long time, he neuer went out to supper to any of his friendes, vnles it were that he was once at a feast at his nephew Emyrcptolemus marriage: and then he taried there no longer, but while the ceremonie was a doing, when they offer wine to the goddes, and so he rose from the table. For these friendly meetings at suche feastes, doe muche abate any counterfeate maiestie or set countenance: and he shall haue muche a doe to keepe grauity and reputation, shewing familiaritie to euery knowne friende in such open places. For in perfect vertue, those things truly are euer most excellent, which be most common: and in good and vertuous men there is nothing more admirable vnto straungers, then their dayely conuersation is to their friendes. Pericles nowe to preuent that the people should not be glutton with seeing him to ofte, nor that they should come much to him: they dyd see him but at some times, and then he would not talke in euery matter, neither came muche abroade among them, but referred him selfe (as Crisotomus sayed) D they kept the SALAMINIAN galley at ATHENS) for matters of great importance. And in the meane season, in other matters of small moment, he delt by meanes of certaine orators his familiar friendes, amongst whom Ephialtes (as they saye) was one: he who tooke awaye the authoritie and power from the courte of Arcopagus, and dyd geue to muche libertie to the people, as Plato sayed. Vpon which occasion, as the Comickall poets saye, he became so stowte and headstrong, that they could no more holde him backe, then a younge vnbridled colt: and tooke such a corage vpon him, that he would obaye no more, but inuaded the Ile of EVBOEA, and set vpon the other Ilandes. Pericles also because he would facion a phrase of speache, with a kynde of style altogether agreeable to the manner of life and grauitie he had taken vpon him: he gaue him selfe to all matters which he had learned of Anaxagoras, E shadowing his reason of naturall philosophie, with artificiall rhetoricke. For hauing obtayned a deepe vnderstanding by studying of philosophie, and a ready waye effectually to ende any matter, he vnderooke to proue (besides that nature had endued him with an excellent witte and capacitie, as the diuine Plato doth write, to bring any thing to serue his purpose) he dyd so artificially compass it with eloquence, that he farre passed all the orators in his time. And for this cause was he (as they saye) surnamed Olympius, as muche to saye, as heauenly or diuine. But some are of opinion he had that surname, by reason of the common buildings and stately workes he rayled vp in the citie of ATHENS, that dyd muche set forth the fame. Other thinke it was geuen him for his great authoritie and power he had in gouernment, atwell in warres, as in peace. But it is no maraill that this glorie was F geuen him, considering the many other qualities and vertues that were in him. Howbeit the comedies the Poetes caused to be played in those times (in which there were many wordes spoken of him, some in earnest, some in sporte and iest) doe witnesseth

that he had that surname geuen him, chiefly for his eloquence. For it is reported, that he thundered and lightened in his oration to the people, & that his tongue was a terrible lightning. And touching this matter, they tell of an answer Thucydides, Milesius sonne, should pleasantly make concerning the force of Pericles eloquence, Thucydides was a noble man, and had long time contended against Pericles in matters of the common weale. Archidamus, king of LACEDÆMON, asked Thucydides on a time: whether he or Pericles wrestled best. Thucydides made him answer. When I haue geuen him an open fall before the face of the world, he can so excellently deny it, that he maketh the people beleue he had no fall at all, and persuadeth them the contrarie of that they sawe. Notwithstanding he was euer very graue and wise in speaking. For euer when he went vp into the pulpit for orations to speake to the people, he made his prayers vnto the goddes, that nothing might escape his mouth, but that he might consider before whether it would serue the purpose of his matter he treated on: yet are there none of his workes extant in writing, vnles it be some fewe lawes he made, and but very fewe of his notable sayings are brought to light, save only these. He sayed on a time that they must take away the citie of EGINA, because it was a strawe lying in the eye of the haueu PIREÆA. And another time, he sayed that he saw the warres a farre off, coming from PELOPONNESVS. Another time, as he tooke shippes with Sophocles (his companion in commission with him as general of the armie) who commended a fayer young boye they met as they came to the haueu: Sophocles, sayed he, a gouernour must not only haue his handes, but also his eyes cleane. And Sesimbrotus writeth, that in a funerall oration he made in the prayle of those that were slaine in the warre of SAMOS: he sayed they were immortal as the goddes. For we doe not see the goddes (sayed he) as they be, but for the honour that is done to them, and the great happines they enioye, we doe coniecture they are immortal: and the same things are in those that dye in seruice, and defence of their countrie. Nowe where Thucydides doth write the gouernment of the common weale vnder Pericles to be as a gouernment of Nobilitie, and yet had appurance of a popular state: it is true that in effect it was a Kingdome, because one alone dyd rule and gouerne the whole state. And many other saye also, he was the first that brought in the custome to deuide the enemies landes wonne by conquest among the people, and of the common money to make the people see playes and pastimes, and that appointed them rewarde for all things. But this custome was ill brought vp. For the common people that before were contented with litle, and got their liuing paynfully with sweate of their browes: became now to be very vaine, sumptuous, and riotous, by reason of these things brought vp then. The cause of the alteration doth easely appeare by those things. For Pericles at his first coming, fought to winne the fauour of the people, as we haue sayed before, only to get like reputation that Cimon had wonne. But comming farre shorte of his wealth and abilitie, to carie out the porte and charge that Cimon dyd, entertaining the poore, keeping open house to all commers, clothing poore olde people, breaking open besides all inclosures and pales through all his landes, that euery one might with more libertie come in, and take the fruites thereof at their pleasure: and seeing him selfe by these great meanes out gone farre in good will with the common people, by Demonides counsell and procurement (who was borne in the Ile of Ios) he brought in this distribution of the common money, as Aristotle writeth. And hauing wonne in a shorte time the fauour and good will of the common people, by distribution of the common treasure, which he caused to be deuided among them, as well to haue place to see these playes, as for that they had rewarde to be present at the iudgements, and by other suche like corruptions: he with the peoples helpe, dyd inuey against the courte of the Areopagites, wherof he neuer was any member. For it neuer came to be his happe to be yerely gouernour, nor keeper of the lawes, nor King of the sacrifices, nor master of the warres: all which were offices chosen in auncient time by lot. And further, those on whom the lot fell, if they had be-haued them selues well in their office, they were called forwards, & raised to be of the bodie of this courte of the Areopagites. Pericles now by these meanes hauing obtained great credit and authoritie amongst the common people, he troubled the Senate of the Areopagites in suche sorte, that he pluckt many matters from their hearing, by Ephialtes helpe: and

A and in time made Cimon to be banished ATHENS, as one that fauored the EPICURANS, and contraried the common wealth and authoritie of the people. Notwithstanding he was the noblest and richest persone of all the citie, and one that had wonne so many glorious victories, and had so replenished ATHENS with the conquered spoiles of their enemies, as we haue declared in his life: so great was the authoritie of Pericles amongst the people. Nowe the banishment wherewith he was punished (which they called Ostracism) was limited by the lawe for tenne yerres. In which space the LACEDÆMONIANS being come downe with a great armie into the countrie of TANAGRA, the ATHENIANS sent out their power presently against them. There Cimon willing to shewe the ATHENIANS by his deedes, that they had falsely accused him for fauoring the LACEDÆMONIANS: dyd arrie himself, and went on his country mens side, to fight in the companie of his tribe. But Pericles friends gathered together, and forced Cimon to departe thence as a banished man. And this was the cause that Pericles fought that daye more valiantly then euer he dyd, and he wanted the honour and name to haue done more in the persone of him selfe that daye, then any other of all the armie. At that battell also, all Cimons friends, whom Pericles had burdened like wife to fauour the LACEDÆMONIANS doings; dyed euery man of them that daye. Then the ATHENIANS repented them much that they had driuen Cimon away, and wished he were restored, after they had lost this battell vpon the confines of the countrie of ARGIS: because they feared sharpe warres would come vpon them againe at the next spring. Which thing when Pericles perceyued, he fought also to further that the common people desired: wherefore he straight caused a decree to be made, that Cimon should be called home againe, which was done accordingly. Now when Cimon was returned, he aduised that peace should be made betwene both citie: for the LACEDÆMONIANS dyd loue Cimon very well, and contrarily they hated Pericles, and all other gouernours. Some notwithstanding doe write, that Pericles dyd neuer passe his consent to call him home againe, before suche time as they had made a secret agreement amongst them selues (by means of Elpinice Cimons sister) that Cimon should be sent out with an armie of two hundred galleys, to make warres in the king of PARIA his dominions, & that Pericles should remaine at home with the authoritie of gouernment within the citie. This Elpinice (Cimons sister) had once before intreated Pericles for her brother, at such time as he was accused before the iudge of treason. For Pericles was one of the committes, D to whom this accusation was referred by the people. Elpinice went vnto him, & besought him not to doe his worst vnto her brother. Pericles answered her merite. Thou art to old Elpinice, thou art to olde, to goe through with these matters. Yet when his matter came to iudgement, & that his cause was pleaded: he rose but once to speake against him (for his owne discharge as it were) & went his waye when he had sayed, doing lesse hurte to Cimon, then any other of his accusers. How is Idomeneus to be credited now, who accuseth Pericles that he had caused the orator Ephialtes to be slaine by treason (that was his friende, and dyd alwayes counsell him, and take his parte in all kinde of gouernment of the common weale) only for the jealousy and enuie he dyd beare to his glorie? Can but muse why Idomeneus should speake so slanderously against Pericles, vnles it were that his melancholy humour procured suche violent E speech: who though peraduenture he was not altogether blameles, yet he was neuer nobly minded, and had a naturall desire of honour, in which kinde of men such furious cruel passions are feldome seene to breede. But this orator Ephialtes being cruell to those that tooke parte with the Nobilitie, because he would spare nor pardone no man for any offence what soeuer committed against the peoples authoritie, but dyd followe and persecute them with all rigour to the vttermost: his enemies layed waite for him by means of one Aristodemus TANAGRAN, and they killed him by treason, as Aristotle writeth. In the meane time Cimon dyed in the Ile of CYPRVS, being generall of the armie of the ATHENIANS by sea. Wherefore those that tooke parte with the Nobilitie, seeing Pericles was nowe grown very great; and that he went before all other citizens of ATHENS, thincking it good to haue some one to stick on their side against him, and to lessen thereby somewhat his authoritie, that he might not come to rule all as he would: they raised vp against him, one Thucydides, of the towne of ALOPECIA, a graue wise man; and father in lawe to Cimon. This Thucydides had lesse skill of warres then Cimon, but vnderstoode more in ciuill gouernment then he, for that he remained A most parte of his time within the citie: where continually inuaying against Pericles in his pulpit for orations to the people, in shorte time he had stirred vp a like companie against the faction of Pericles. For he kept the gentlemen and richer sorte (which they call Nobilitie) from mingling with the common people, as they were before, when through the multitude of the commons their estate and dignitie was abused, and troden vnderfoote. Moreouer he dyd separate them from the people, and dyd assemble them all as it were into one bodie, who came to be of equall power with the other faction, and dyd put (as a man will saye) a counterpease into the ballance. For at the beginning there was but a litle secret grudge only betwene these two factions, as an artificiall flower set in the blade of a sworde, which made those shewe a litle, that dyd leane vnto the people: and the other also somewhat that fauored the Nobilitie. B But the contention betwene these two persones, was as a deepe cut, which deuided the citie wholly in two factions: of the which the one was called the Nobilitie, and the other the communalitie. Therefore Pericles geuing yet more libertie vnto the people, dyd all things that might be to please them, ordering continuall playes and games in the citie, many teastes, banquetts, and open pastimes to entertaine the commons with such honest pleasures and deuises: and besides all this, he sent yere an armie of three score gallies vnto the warres, into the which he put a great number of poore citizens that tooke paye of the state for nine moneths of the yere, and thereby they dyd learne together, and practise to be good sea men. Furthermore he sent into the countrie of CERRONESES, a thousand free men of the citie to dwell there, and to deuide the landes amongst them: fise hundred also into the Ile of Naxos into the Ile of Andros, two hundred & fiftie: into Thracia, a thousand to dwell with the Bisalties; & other also into Italy, when the citie of Syraris was built againe, which afterwards was furnished the citie of the Hyrians. All this he dyd to ryd the citie of a number of idle people, who through idlenes beganne to be curious, and to desire change of things, as also to provide for the necessitie of the poore townes men that had nothing. For, placing the naturall citizens of Athens nere vnto their subiects and friendes, they serued as a garrison to keepe them vnder, and dyd suppress them also from attempting any alteration or change. But that which delieth most, and is the greatest ornament vnto the citie of Athens, which maketh straungers most to wonder, and which alone doth bring sufficient testimonie, to confirme that which is reported of the auncient power, riches, and great wealth of Greece, to be true and not false: are the stately and sumptuous buildings, which Pericles made to be built in the citie of Athens. For it is the only acte of all other Pericles dyd, and which made his enemies most to spight him, and which they most accused him for, crying out vpon him in all counsailes & assemblies: that the people of Athens were openly defamed, for carying awaye the ready money of all Greece, which was left in the Ile of Delos to be safely kept there. And although they could with good honestie haue excused this facte, saying that Pericles had taken it from them, for feare of the barbarous people, to the ende to laye it vp in a more stronger place, where it should be in better safetie: yet was this to ouergreat an iniurie offered vnto all the rest of Greece, and to manifest a token of tyrannie also, to beholde before their eyes, howe we doe employe the money, which they were informed to gather for the maintenance of the warres against the barbarous people, in gilding, building, and setting forth our citie, like a glorious woman, all to be gawded with golde and precious stones, and howe we doe make images, and build vp temples of wonderfull & infinite charge. Pericles replied to the contrarie, and declared vnto the Athenians that they were not bounde to make any account of this money vnto their friendes and allies, considering that they fought for their safety, & that they kept the barbarous people farre from Greece, without troubling them to set out any one man, horse, or shippe of theirs, the money only excepted, which is no more theirs that payed it, then theirs that receyued it, so they bestowe it to that vse they receyued it for. And their citie being already very well furnished, and provided of all things necessary for the warres, it was good reason they should employe and bestowe the surplus of the treasure in things, which in time to come (and being thoroughly finished) would make their fame eternall. Moreouer he sayed that whilest they continue building, they should

A be presently riche, by reason of the diuersitie of workes of all sortes, and other things which they should haue neede of: and to compasse these things the better, and to set them in hande, all manner of artificers and worke men (that would labour) should be set a worke. So should all the townes men, and inhabitants of the citie, receyue paye and wages of the common treasure: and the citie by this meanes should be greatly beawified, and muche more able to mainteine it selfe. For such as were stronger, and able men of bodie, and of yeres to carie weapon, had paye and entertainment of the common wealth, which were sent abroad vnto the warres: and other that were not meete for warres, as craftes men, and labourers: he would also they should haue parte of the common treasure, but not without they earned it, and by doing somewhat. And this was his reason, and the cause that made him occupie B the common people with great buildings, and deuises of workes of diuers occupations, which could not be finished of long time: to the ende that the citizens remaining at home, might haue a meane and waye to take parte of the common treasure, and enrichethem selues, as well as those that went to the warres, and serued on the sea, or els that laye in garrison to keepe any place or forte. For some gayned by bringing stufte: as stones, brasse, yuorie, gold, ebbany, & cypres. Other got to worke and facion it: as carpinters, grauers, fownders, casters of images, masons, hewers of stone, dyers, goldsmithes, joyners working in yuorie, painters, men that set in sundrie cullers of peeces of stone or wodde, and turners. Other gayned to bring stufte, & to C furnishe them: as marchaunts, mariners, and shippemasters, for things they brought them by sea. And by lande other got also: as carte makers, cartiers, carters, corde makers, sadlers, collermakers, & pyoners to make wayes plaine, & miners, & such like. Furthermore, euery science and crafte, as a captaine hauing souldiers, had also their armie of the worke men that serued them, labouring truly for their liuing, who serued as prestes & iorney men vnder the worke- D masters: so the worke by this meanes dyd disperse abroad a common gayne to all sortes of people and ages, what occupation or trade soeuer they had. And thus came the buildings to rise in greatnes & sumptuousnes, being of excellent workman shippe, & for grace & beawtie not comparable: because euery workman in his science dyd strue what he could to excell others, to make his worke appeare greatest in sight, and to be most workemanly done in shewe. But the greatest thing to be wounded at, was their speede and diligence. For where euery man thought those workes were not likely to be finished in many men liues and ages, & D from man to man: they were all done and finished, whilest one only gouernour continued still in credit and authoritie. And yet they saye, that in the same time, as one Agatharchus boasted him self, that he had quickly painted certen beastes: Zeuxis another painter hearing him, answered, And I contrarie doe reioyce, that I am a long time in drawing of them. For commonly slight and sodaine drawing of any thing, cannot take deepe cullers, nor geue perfect beawty to the worke: but length of time, adding to the painters diligence and labour in making of the worke, maketh the cullers to continue for euer. For this cause therefore the workes Pericles made, are more wonderfull: because they were perfectly made in so shorte a time, and haue continued so long a season. For euery one of those which were finished vp at that time, seemed then to be very auncient touching the beawtie thereof: and yet for the grace & continuance E of the same, it looketh at this daye as if it were but newly done and finished, there is such a certaine kynde of flourishing freshnes in it, which letteth that the iniurie of time cannot impair the sight thereof: As if euery one of those foresaid workes, had some liuing spirite in it, to make it seeme young and fresh: and a soule that liued euer, which kept them in their good continuing state. Now the chief suruey our generall of all these workes, was Phidias, albeit that there were many other excellent worke masters in euery science & occupation. For the temple of Pallas, which is called Parthenon (as a man would saye, the temple of the virgine, and is furnished Heccatompedon, for that it is a hundred foote euery waye) was built by Ictinus, and Callicrates: and the chappell of Eleusim (where the secret ceremonies of the mysteries were made) was first founded by Corabus, who raised vp the first pillars in order, standing beneath F on the ground, and dyd set them vp vnto the master chapprells. But after he was dead, Metagenes, borne in the towne of Xyrtas, turned the arches ouer, and then dyd set the pillars in order also which are aboute: and Xenocles of the towne of Cholargha, was he that made the lantern or toppe of the steeple which couereth the sanctuarie: but the long wall which A Socrates heard Pericles him selfe geue order for the building of it, was done by Callistratus, who vnderooke the worke. Cratinus the Poet, in a comedie he made, laugheth at this worke, to see how slowly it went forward, and how long it was a doing, saying:

*Pericles long a goe, dyd ende this worke begonne:
and build it highe, with glorious wordes, if so it had bene done.
But as for deedes (in dede) he built nothing at all, but let it stande: as yet it stands, much liker for to fall.*

The Odeon.

And as for the Theater or place appointed for musicke, where they heare all musitians playe, and is called Odeon: it is very well made within with diuers seats & degrees, and many ranges of pillars, but the toppe of the rooffe is altogether rounde, which is somewhat hanging & downward round about of it selfe, coming together into one pointe. And it is sayd that this was made after the patterne and faction of king Xerxes royall pavilion, and that Pericles was the first deuiler and maker of it. Wherefore Cratinus in another place of his comedie he maketh of the THACIANS, doth playe very pretily vpon him, saying:

Pericles here doth come, Dan Iupiter surnamed, (and on yong hed) vpon which hath in his great noddell finely framed, The plot of Odeon, vpon he deliuered vnto from banishment, and dangers deepe, vpon heerein he long dyd passe.

Pericles ere hed games for musike.

Pericles was the first that made maruelous earnest labour to the people that they would make an order, that on the daye of the feast called Panathenaea, they would set vp games for musicke. And he him selfe being chosen ruler of these games, as iudge to rewarde the best deseruer: ordained the manner the musitians should euer after keepe in their fingring; playing on their flutes, or vpon the citherne, or other instruments of musicke. So the first games that euer were for musicke, were kept within the Odeon: and so were the other after them also, euer celebrated there. The gate and entring into the castell was made and finished within the space of five yerres, vnder the charge of Minerva, that was master of the workes. And whilst these gates were a building, there happened a wonderfull chaunce, which declared very well that the goddesse Minerva dyd not mislike the building, but that it pleased her maruelously. For one of the most painefullest workemen that wrought there, fell by mischaunce from the height of the castell to the grounde, which fall dyd so fore broose him, and he was so sicke & with all, that the phisitians and surgeons had no hope of his life. Pericles being very sorie for his mischaunce, the goddesse appeared to him in his sleepe in the night, and taught him a medicine, with the which he dyd easely heale the poore brooded man, & that in shorte time. And this was the occasion why he caused the image of the goddesse Minerva (otherwise called of healtie) to be cast in brasse, and set vp within the temple of the castell, neere vnto the altar which was there before, as they saye. But the golden image of Minerva was made by Phidias, and grauen round about the base: Who had the charge in manner of all other workes, and by reason of the good will Pericles bare him, he commaunded all the other workemen. And this made the one to be greatly enuied, and the other to be very ill spoken of. For their enemies gaue it out abroad, that Phidias receyued the gentlewomen of the citie into his house, & vnder culler to goe see his workes, and dyd conuey them to Pericles. Vpon this brute, the Comickall poets taking occasion, dyd cast out many slanderous speeches against Pericles, accusing him that he kept one Menippus wife, who was his friend and lieutenant in the warres: and burdened him further, that Pyrrampes, one of his familiar friends also, brought vp fowle, and specially peacocks, which he secretly sent vnto the women that Pericles kept. But we must not wonder at these Satyres, that make profession to speake slanderously against all the worlde, as it were to sacrifice the iniuries and wronges they cast vpon honorable and good men, to the spight and enuie of the people, as vnto wicked spirites: considering that Stephanobrotus THACIAN durst falsely accuse Pericles of detestable incest, and of abusing his owne finnes wife. And this is the reason, in my opinion, why it is so hard a matter to come to the perfect knowledge of the trothe of aunient things, by the monuments of historiographers: considering long proceffe of time, doth vtterly obscure the trothe of matters, done in former times.

A times. For euery written historie speaking of men that are aliue, and of the time of things, whereof it maketh mention: sometime for hate and enuie, sometime for fauour, or flatterie, doth disguise and corrupt the trothe. But Pericles perceyuing that the orators of Thucydides faction, in their common orations dyd still crie out vpon him, that he dyd vainly waste and consume the common treasure, and that he bestowed vpon the workes, all the whole reuenue of the citie: one daye when the people were assembled together, before them all he asked them, if they thought that the coste bestowed were so muche. The people answered him: a great deale to muche. VVell, said he then, the charges shalbe mine (if you thinke good) and none of yours: provided that no mans name be written vpon the workes, but mine only. VVhen Pericles had sayd so, the people cried out alowde, they would none of that (either be-

B cause that they wondred at the greatnes of his minde, or els for that they would not geue him the only honour and prayse to haue done so sumptuous and stately workes) but willed him that he should see them ended at the common charges, without sparing for any costs. But in the end, falling out openly with Thucydides, & putting it to an aduecture which of them should banish the other, with the banishment of Ostracism: Pericles got the vpper hand, and banished Thucydides out of the citie, & therewithall also ouerthrew the contrarie faction against him. Now when he had rooted out all factions, and brought the citie againe to vnitie & conoord, he founde then the whole power of ATHENS in his handes, and all the ATHENIANS matters at his disposing. And hauing all the treasure, armour, gallyes, the lles, and the sea, and a maruelous seignorie and Kingdome (that dyd enlarge it selfe partlye ouer the GRECIANS, and partlye ouer the barbarous people) so well fortified and strengthened with the obedience of nations subiect vnto them, with the friendship of Kings, & with the alliance of diuers other Princes & mightie Lords: then from that time forward he beganne to change his manners, and from that he was wont to be toward the people, and not so easely to graunt to all the peoples willes and desires, no more then as it were to contrarie windes. Furthermore he altered his our gentle and popular manner of government which he vfed vntill that time, as to delicate & to effeminate an harmonie of musike, and dyd conuert it vnto an imperious gouernment, or rather to a kingly authoritie: but yet held still a direct course, and kept him selfe euer vpright without fault, as one that dyd, sayd, and counseled that, which was most expedient for the common weale. He many times brought on the people by persuasions and reason, &

D be willing to graunt that he preferred vnto them: but many times also, he draue them to it by force, & made them against their willes doe that, which was best for them. Following therein the deuise of a wise phisitician: who in a long and changeable disease, doth graunt his patient sometime to take his pleasure of a thing he liketh, but yet after a moderate sorte: and another time also he doth geue him a sharpe or bitter medicine that doth vex him, though it heale him. For as it falleth out commonly vnto people that enioye so great an empire: many times misfortunes doe chaunce, that fill them full of sundrie passions, the which Pericles alone could finely steere and gouerne with two principall rudders, feare, and hope: bridling with the one, the fierce & insolent rathernes of the common people in prosperitie, and with the other comforting their grief and discouragement in aduersitie. Wherein he manifestly proued,

E that rethorike and eloquence (as Plato sayeth) is an arte which quickeneth mens spirites at her pleasure, and her chiefe skill is, to knowe howe to moue passions and affections thoroughly, which are as stoppes and foundes of the soule, that would be played vpon with a fine fingered hande of a conning master. All which, not the force of his eloquence only brought to passe, as Thucydides witnesseth: but the reputation of his life, and the opinion and confidence they had of his great worthines, because he would not any way be corrupted with gifts, neither had he any couetousnes in him. For, when he had brought his citie not only to be great, but exceeding great and wealthy, and had in power and authoritie exceeded many Kings and tyrannes, yea euen those which by their willes and testaments might haue left great possessions to their children: he neuer for all that increased his fathers goodes and patrimonie left him, the value

F of a grote in siluer. And yet the historiographer Thucydides doth set forth plainly enough, the greatnes of his power. And the Comickall poets also of that time doe reporte it maliciously vnder couert words, calling his familiar friends, the newe Pisistratides: saying, howe they must make him sweare and protest he would neuer be King, geuing vs thereby to vnderstand; that his authoritie was to exceeding great for a popular gouernment. And Teleclides (amongst others) sayeth that the ATHENIANS had put into his hands the reuenue of the townes & cities vnder their obedience, and the townes them selues, to binde the one, and to lose the other, & to pull downe their walles, or to build them againe at his pleasure. They gaue him power, to make peace and alliance: they gaue all their force, treasure, & authoritie, and all their goodes, wholly into his hands. But this was not for a litle while, nor in a geere of fauour, that should continue for a time: but this helde out forty yeres together, he being alwayes the chief of this citie amongst the Ephialtes, the Leocrates, the Mironides, the Cimons, the Tolmides, & the Thucydides. For after he had preuailed against Thucydides, & had banished him: he yet remained chief about all other, the space of fifteene yeres. Thus hauing attained a regall dignitie to commaunde all, which continued as aforesaid, where no other captaines authoritie endured but one yere: he euer kept him selfe vpright from bribes and money, though otherwise he was no ill husband, and could warily looke to his owne. As for his landes and goodes left him by his parents, that they miscaired not by negligēce, nor that they should trouble him much, in buying him selfe to reduce them to a value: he dyd so husband them, as he thought was his best and easiest waye. For he solde in grosse euer the whole yeres profit and commoditie of his landes, and afterwards sent to the market daylie to buye the cates, and other ordinarie prouision of householde. This dyd nor like his sonnes that were men growen, neither were his women contented with it, who would haue had him more liberall in his house, for they complained of his ouerhard and straight ordinarie, because in so noble and great a house as his, there was neuer any great remaine left of meate, but all things receyued into the house, ranne vnder accompt, & were deliuered out by proportion. All this good husbandrie of his, was kept vpright in this good order, by one Euangelus, Steward of his house, a man very honest and skillfull in ordering his householde prouision: and whether Pericles had brought him vp to it, or that he had it by nature, it was not knowne. But these things were farre contrarie to *Anaxagoras*s wisdom. For he despising the world, and casting his affection on heavenly things: dyd willingly forsake his house, and suffered all his lande to runne to layes and to pasture. But (in my opinion) great is the diuerfite betwene a contemplatiue life, and a ciuill life. For the one employeth all his time vpon the speculation of good and honest things: and to attaine to that, he thinketh he hath no neede of any exteriour helpe or instrument. The other applying all his time vpon vertue, to the common profit & benefit of men: he thinketh that he needeth riches, as an instrument not only necessarie, but also honest. As, looke vpon the example of Pericles: who dyd relieue many poore people. And Anaxagoras specially among other: of whom it is reported, that Pericles being occupied about matters of state at that time, hauing no leysure to thinke vpon Anaxagoras, he seeing him selfe old & forsaken of the world, layed him downe, and couered his head close, determining to starue him selfe to death with hunger. Pericles vnderstanding this, ranne presently to him as a man halfe cast awaye, and prayed him as earnestly as he could, that he would dispose him selfe to liue, being not only forie for him, but for him selfe also, that he should lose so faithfull and wise a counsellor, in matters of state and gouernment. Then Anaxagoras shewed his face, and tolde him: O Pericles, those that will see by the light of a lampe, must put oyle to it, to make the light burne. Now beganne the LACEDÆMONIANS to growe iecalous, of the greatnes of the ATHENIANS, wherefore Pericles to make the ATHENIANS hartes greater, and to drawe their mindes to great enterprises: set downe an order they should send ambassadours, to persuaide all the GRECIANS (in what part soeuer they dwelt in EVROPE, of ASIA, atwell the litle as the great cities) to send their deputies vnto ATHENS, to the generally assembly that should be holden there, to take order for the temples of the goddes which the barbarous people had burnt, and touching the sacrifices they had vowed for the preservation of GREECE, when they gaue battell vpon them: and touching sea matters also, that every man might sayle in safetie where he would, & that all might liue together in good peace & loue, one with another. To performe this commission, twenty perones were sent of this embassate, every one of them being fiftie yeres of age and upward. Whereof fise of them went to the *DORIAN*s, dwelling in ASIA, and to the inhabitants of the

Isles, euen vnto the Isles of LESBOS, & of the RHODES. Fise other went through all the country of HELLESPONT, and of THRACIA, vnto the citie of BIZANTIUM. Other fise were commaunded to goe into BOEOTIA, into PHOCIDES, and through all PELOPONNESVS, & from thence by the countrie of the LOCRIANS, into the vplande countrie adioyning to it, vntill they came into the country of ACARNANIA, & of AMBRACIA. And the other fise went first into the Ile of EVBOA, and from thence vnto the ORIENTIANS, and through all the gulfes of MALBA, vnto the PHYTIOTES, vnto the ACHAIANS, and the THESSALIANS: declaring to all the people where they came, the ATHENIANS commission, persuaiding them to send vnto ATHENS, and to be present at the counsell which should be holden there, for the pacification & vnion of all GREECE. But when all came to all, nothing was done, & the sayed cities of GREECE dyd not assemble, by practise of the LACEDÆMONIANS (as it is reported) who were altogether the let: for the first refusal that was made of their summonns, was at PELOPONNESVS. This haue I written to make *Pericles*s noble corage to be knowne, and howe prououde a wife man he shewed him selfe vnto the world. Furthermore, when he was chosen generally in the warres, he was much esteemed, because he euer tooke great regarde to the safetie of his souldiers. For by his good will he would neuer hazard battell, which he sawe might fall out doubtfull, or in any thing dangerous: and moreouer, he neuer prayed them for good generally, neither would he followe them that had obteined great victories by hazard, howsoever other dyd esteeme or comend them. For he was wont to saye, that if none but him self dyd leade them to the shambles, as much as laye in him, they should be immortal. And when he sawe Tolmides, the sonne of Tolmaus (trusting to his former victories, and the praise & commendation of his good seruice) dyd prepare vpon no occasion, and to no purpose, to enter into the countrie of BOEOTIA, & had procured also a thousand of the lustiest & most valliant men of the citie, to be contented to goe with him in that iorney, ouer and about the rest of the armie he had leaued: he went about to turne him from his purpose, and to keepe him at home, by many persuaasions he vsed to him before the peoples face, and spake certen wordes at that time, that were remembered long after, and these they were. That if he would not beleeue Pericles counsell, yet that he would tarie time at the least, which is the wisest counsellor of men. These wordes were pretillie liked at that present time. But with in fewe dayes after, when newes was brought that Tolmides selfe was slaine in a battell he had lost, neere vnto the citie of CORONEA, wherein perished also, many other honest & valliant men of ATHENS: his wordes spoken before, dyd then greatly increase Pericles reputation & good will with the common people, because he was taken for a wife man, and one that loued his citizens. But of all his iornes he made, being generally ouer the armie of the ATHENIANS: the iorney of CHERRONESVS was best thought of and esteemed, because it fell out to the great benefit and preservation of all the GRECIANS inhabiting in that countrie. For besides that he brought thither a thousand citizens of ATHENS to dwell there (in which doing he strengthened the cities with so many good men) he dyd fortifie the barre also, which dyd let it from being of an Ile, with a fortification he drue from one sea to another: so that he defended the countrie against all the inuasions and piracies of the THACIANS inhabiting thereabouts, & deliuered it from extreme warre, with the which it was plagued before, by the barbarous people their neighbours, or dwelling amongst them, who only liued vpon piracie, and robbing on the seas. So was he likewise much honored & esteemed of strangers, when he dyd enuironne all PELOPONNESVS, departing out of the haven of PEGAS, on the coast of MEGARA, with a flecte of a hundred gallyes. For he dyd not only spoyle the townes all alonge the sea side, as Tolmides had done before him: but going vp further into the mayne lande, farre from the sea, with his souldiers he had in the gallyes, he drave some of them to retire within their walles, he made them so affrayed of him: and in the countrie of NEMEA, he ouercame the SYCTONIANS in battell, that taried him in the field, and dyd erect a pillar for a notable marke of his victorie. And imbarcking in his shippes a newe supply of souldiers which heooke vp in ACHAIA, being friends with the ATHENIANS at that time: he passed ouer to the firme lande that laye directly against it. And pointing beyond the mouth of the riuier of Achelous, he invaded the countrie of ACARNANIA, where he shut vp the ORNEADES within their walles. And after he had laid waste and destroyed all the champion countrie, he returned home againe to ATHENS hauing shewed him selfe in this iorney, a dreadfull captaine to his enemies, and very careful for the safety of his souldiers. For there fell out no manner of misfortune all this iorney (by chaunce or otherwise) vnto the souldiers vnder his charge. And afterwarde, going with a great nauie maruelous well appointed vnto the realme of PONTVS, he dyd there gently vie and increate the cities of GRECE, and graunted them all that they required of him: making the barbarous people inhabiting thereabouts, and the Kings and Princes of the same also, to know the great force & power of the ATHENIANS, who failed without feare all about where they thought good, keeping all the coastes of the sea vnder their obedience. Furthermore, he left with the SINOPIANS thirteene gallyes, with certen number of souldiers vnder captaine Lamachus, to defend them against the tyranne Timistilus: who being expulsd, and driuen away, with those of his faction, Pericles caused proclamation to be made at ATHENS, that sixe hundred free men of the citie, that had any desire to goe, without cōpulsion, might goe dwell at SINOPA, where they should haue deuided among them, the goodes & landes of the tyranne & his followers. But he dyd not followe the foolish vaine humours of his citizens, nor would not yeld to their vsuallie couetousnes, who being set on a iolitie to see them selues so strong, and of suche a power, and besides, to haue good lucke, would needes once againe attempt to conquer EGYPT, and to reuolte all the countries vpon the sea coastes, from the empire of the king of PERSIA: for there were many of them whose mindes were maruelously bent to attemp the vnfortunate enterprise of entering SICILIA, which Alcibiades afterwarde dyd muche pricke forward. And some of them dreamed besides, of the conquest of THYSCAN, & the empire of CARTHAGE. But this was not altogether without some likelyhood, nor without occasion of hope, considering the large boundes of their Kingdome, & the fortunate estate of their affayres, which fell out according to their owne desire. But Pericles dyd hinder this going out, and cut of altogether their curious desire, employing the most parte of their power and force, to keepe that they had already gotten: iudging it no small matter to keepe downe the LACEDÆMONIANS from growing greater. For he was alwayes an enemy to the LACEDÆMONIANS, as he shewed him selfe in many things, but specially in the warre he made, called the holy warre. For the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing put the PHOCIANS from the charge of the temple of Apollo, in the citie of DELPHES, which they had vsurped, & hauing restored the DELPHIANS againe vnto the same: so sone as they were gone thence, Pericles went also with another armie, & restored the PHOCIANS again. And where as the LACEDÆMONIANS had caused to be grauen in the forehead of a woulfe of brasse, the priuiledge the DELPHIANS had graunted them, to be the first that should make their demaundes of the oracle: he hauing attained the like priuiledge of the PHOCIANS, made his image also to be grauen on the right side of the same image, of the brasse woulfe. Nowe howe wisely Pericles dyd gouerne GRECE by the power of the ATHENIANS, his deedes doe plainly shewe. For first of all, the countrie of EVBOA dyd rebell, against whō he brought the armie of the ATHENIANS. And sodainely in the necke of that, came newes from another coaste, that the MEGARIANS also were in armes against them: and howe that they were already entered into the countrie of ATTICA with a great armie, led by Plistoxas, king of LACEDÆMON. This occasion drewe him home. Eward againe, and so he marched backe with speede into his countrie, to make preparation to encounter his enemies, that were already entered into the territories of ATTICA. He durst not offer them battell, being to great a number of valliant souldiers: but hearing that king Plistoxas was yet but a young man, and was ruled altogether by Cleandrides counsell and direction (whom the Ephores had placed about him to counsell & direct him) he sought priuile to corrupt Cleandrides. When he had wonne him fowle with his money, he perswaded him to drawe backe the PELOPONNESIANS out of their countrie of ATTICA: and so he dyd. But when the LACEDÆMONIANS sawe their armie called, & that the people were gone their waye, euery man to his owne citie or towne: they were so mad at it, that the King was condemned in a great fume. The King being vnable to answer his fine, which was so extreme great: he was driuen to absent him self from LACEDÆMON. Cleandrides on the other side, if he had not died in time, euen for spight had bene condemned to death. This Cleandrides was Gylippus father, that that afterwards ouercame the ATHENIANS in SICILIA, in whom it seemed nature bred couetousnes, as a disease inheritable by succession from father to the sonne. For he being shamefully conquered also, for certen vile partes he had played, was likewise banished from SPARTA: as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lyfander. And Pericles deliuering up the accōpt of his charge, and setting downe an article of the expence of tenne talentes he had employed, or should employe in needefull causes: the people allowed them him, neuer asking question how, nor which waye, nor whether it was true that they were bestowed. Now there are certen writers (among whom the philosopher Theophrastus is one) who write that Pericles lent yerely vnto SPARTA tenne talents, with the which he entertained those that were in authoritie there, because they should make no warres with them: not to buye peace of them, but time, that he might in the meane season, with better commoditie, and that leysure, prouide to mainteine the warres. After that as the armie of the PELOPONNESIANS were out of the countrie of ATTICA, he returned againe against the rebels, & passed into the Ile of EVBOA with fiftie sayle, & sixe thousand footemen well armed: & there he ouercame all the cities that had taken armes against him, and draue away the Hypobates, who were the most famous men of all the CHALCIDIANS, as well for their riches, as for their vallianties. He draue away also all the HESPERIANS, whom he chased cleane out of all the countrie, and placed in their citie, only the citizens of ATHENS. And the cause why he delt so rigorously with them was, because they hauing taken a gallye of the ATHENIANS prisoner, had put all the men to death that were in her. And peace being concluded afterwarde betwene the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS for thirte yeres: he proclaimed open warres against those of the Ile of SAMOS, burdening them, that they being commaunded by the ATHENIANS, to pacifie the quarrells which they had against the MILLESIANS, they would not obey. But because some hold opinion, that he tooke vpon him this warre against SAMOS, for the loue of Aspasia: it shall be no great digression of our storie, to tell you by the waye, what manner of woman she was, & what a maruelous gite and power she had, that she could entangle with her loue the chiefe rulers and gouernours at that time of the common weale, and that the philosophers them selues dyd so largely speake & write of her. First of all, it is certain that she was borne in the citie of MILLETVM, and was the daughter of one Asiochus: the following the steppes and example of an olde curisun of IONIA, called Thargelia, gaue her selfe only to entertaine the greatest persons & chiefe rulers in her time. For this Thargelia being passing fayer, and carying a comely grace with her, hauing a sharpe wit and pleasant tongue: she had the acquaintance and friendship of the greatest personages of all GRECE, and wanne all those that dyd haunte her company to be at the king of Persiaes commaundement. So that she sowed through all the cities of GRECE, great beginnings of the faction of the MADs: for they were the greatest men of power & authoritie of euery citie that were acquainted with her. But as for Aspasia, some saye that Pericles resorted vnto her, because she was a wise woman, and had great vnderstanding in matters of state and gouernment. For Socrates him selfe went to see her somtimes with his friends: and those that vsed her company also, brought their wiues many times with them to heare her talke: though her traine about her were to entertaine such as would warme them by their fire. Aeschines writeth, that Lyficles a graier, being before but a meane man, and of a clubbie nature, came to be the chief man of ATHENS, by frequenting the companie of Aspasia, after the death of Pericles. And in Platoes booke intituled Memexenus, although the beginning of it be but pleasantly written, yet in that, this storie is written truly: that this Aspasia was repaired vnto by diuers of the ATHENIANS, to learne the arte of rethorike of her. Yet notwithstanding it seemeth most likely that the affection Pericles dyd beare her, grew rather of loue, then of any other cause. For he was married vnto a kinsewoman of his owne, and that before was Hipponicus wife, by whom he had Callias, surmamed the rich: & had afterwarde by Pericles, Xantippus and Paralus. But not liking her companie, he gaue her with her owne good will and consent vnto another, and married Aspasia whom he dearly loved. For euery when he went abroad, & came home againe, he saluted her with a kisse. Whereupon in the ancient comedies, she is called in many places, the newe Omphale, and somtimes Deianira, and somtimes Iuno. But Cratinus plainly calleth her whore in these verses:

Pericles married Aspasia the famous curisun.

His Iuno she him brought, Aspasia by name, Which was in deede an epier, whose, and past all kinds of shame,
 And it seemeth that he had a bastard: for Eupolis in a comedie of his called Demofili, bringeth him in asking Pyronides these words: Pyronides what dost thou say to this? Pyronides saith: He praye thee: is my bastard sonne yet alive?
 And then Pyronides answered him: A perfect man long since, he surely had bene founde, if that this leuicide, and naughty whore his vertue had not drowned.
 To conclude, this Aspasia was so famous, that Cyrus (he that fought against king Artaxerxes his brother, for the empire of PERSIA) called Aspasia his best beloued of all his concubines, which before was called Milto, and was borne in PROCIDES, being Hermotimus daughter. And Cyrus being slayne in the field, Aspasia was caried to the King his brother, with whom afterwards she was in great fauour. As I was writing this life, this storie came in my minde, and me thought I should haue delt hardly, if I should haue left it vnwritten. But to our matter againe, Pericles was charged that he made warres against the SAMIANs, on the behalf of the MILESIANs, at the request of Aspasia: for these two cities were at warres together, for the citie of PRIEN, but the SAMIANs were the stronger. Now the ATHENIANs commaunded them to laye a side their armes, and to come and pleade their matter before them, that the right might be decided: but they refused it vnto. Wherefore Pericles went thither & tooke awaye the government of the small number of Nobilitie, taking for ostages, fiftie of the chiefest men of the citie, and so many children besides, which he left to be kept in the Ile of LEMNOS. Some saye euery one of these ostages offered to geue him a talent: and besides those, many other offered him the like, fuche as would not haue the soueraine authoritie put into the handes of the people. Moreouer Pissuthnes the PERSIAN, lieutenant to the king of PERSIA, for the good will he bare those of SAMOS, dyd lend Pericles tenne thousand crownes to releafe the ostages. But Pericles neuer tooke pennie: and hauing done that he determined at SAMOS, and established a popular government, he returned againe to ATHENS. Notwithstanding, the SAMIANs rebelled immediatly after, hauing recouered their ostages againe by meanes of this Pissuthnes, that stalle them awaye, and dyd furnishe them also with all their munition of warre. Whereupon Pericles returninge against them once more, he founde them not idle, nor amazed at his coming, but resolutely determined to receyue him, and to fight for the seigniorie by sea. So there was a great battell fought betwene them, neere the Ile of TRACIA. And Pericles wanne the battell: hauing with foure and fortie sayle only nobly overcome his enemies, which were three score & tenne in number, whereof twenty of them were shippes of warre. And so following his victorie forthwith, he wanne also the porte of SAMOS, and kept the SAMIANs besieged within their owne citie: where they were yet so bolde, as they would make salies out many times, and fight before the wallles of the citie. But when there arriued a newe supplie of shippes bringing a greater ayde vnto Pericles: then were they shut vp of all sides. Pericles then taking three score gallies with him, lanchd out into the sea, with intent (as some saye) to goe mete certen shippes of the PHOENICIANs (that came to ayde the SAMIANs) as farre from SAMOS as he could: or as Selembrotus sayeth, to goe into CYPRUS, for which me thinketh is not true. But whatsoeuer was his intent, he committed a foule fault. For Melissus (the sonne of Ithagene, a great philosopher) being at that time generall of the SAMIANs: perceyuing that fewe shippes were left behinde at the siege of the citie, and that the captaines also that had the charge of them were no very expert men of warre, perswaded his cittizens to make a salye vpon them. Whereupon they fought a battell, and the SAMIANs ouercame: the ATHENIANs were taken prisoners, and they suncke many of their shippes. Nowe they being lordes againe of the sea, dyd furnishe their citie with all manner of munition for warres, whereof before they had great want. Yet Aristotle writeth that Pericles selfe was once overcome in a battell by sea by Melissus. Furthermore the SAMIANs, to be euen with the ATHENIANs for the iniurie they had receyued of them before: dyd brande them in the forehead with the stampe of an owle, the owle being then the stampe of their coyne at ATHENS, euen as the ATHENIANs had branded the SAMIAN prisoners before with the stampe

A of Samena. This Samena is a kynde of a shippe amongst the SAMIANs, lowe afore, and well layed out in the midde shippe, so that it is excellent good to rise with the waues of the sea: and is very swifte vnder sayle: and it was so called, bicause the first shippe that was made of this facion, was made in the Ile of SAMOS, by the tyranne Polygerates. It is layed that the poet Aristophanes, covertly conueying the stampe of the SAMIANs, speaking merylie in a place of his comedies sayeth:

Pericles being aduertised of the ouerthrowe of his armie, returned presently to the rescue. Melissus went to mete him, and gaue him battell: but he was ouerthrowen, and driuen backe into his citie, where Pericles walled them in round about the citie, desiring victorie rather by time and charge, then by daunger, and losse of his souldiers. But when he sawe that they were wearie with tract of time, and that they would bring it to hazard of battell, and that he could by no meanes withholde them: he then deuided his armie into eight companies, whom he made to drawe los, and that companie that lighted on the white beane, they should be quiet & make good cheere, while the other feuen fought. And they saye that from thence it came, that when any haue made good cheere, & taken pleasure abroad, they doe yet call it a white daye, bicause of the white beane. Ephorus the historiographer writeth, that it was there, where first of all they beganne to vse engines of warre to plucke down great wallles, and that Pericles vied first this wonderfull inuention: & that Artemon an engineer was the first deuiler of them, He was caried vp and downe in a chayer, to set forward these workes, bicause he had a lame legge: and for this cause he was called Periphoretos. But Heraclides Ponticus confuteth Ephorus therein, by the verses of Anacreon, in the which Artemon is called Periphoretos, many yeres before this warre of SAMOS beganne: & sayeth that this Periphoretos was a maruelous tender man, and so foolishly afraid of his owne shadowe, that the most parte of his time he sturred not out of his house, & dyd sit allwayes hauing two of his men by him, that held a copper target ouer his head, for feare least any thing should fall vpon him. And if vpon any occasion, he were driuen, to goe abroad out of his house: he would be caried in a litle bed hanging neere the grounde, & for this cause he was furnamed Periphoretos. At the last, at nine moneths ende the SAMIANs were compelled to yeld. So Pericles tooke the citie, & rased their wallles to the grounde: he brought their shippes awaye, and made them paye a maruelous great tribute, whereof parte he receyued in hande, & the rest payable at a certen time, taking ostages with him for assurance of payment. But Durris the SAMIAN dilateth these matters maruelously pittiefully, burdening the ATHENIANs, and Pericles self with vnnaturall crueltie: whereof neither Thucydides, nor Ephorus, nor Aristotle him selfe maketh mention: And suer I cannot beleue, it is true that is writte. That he brought the captaines of the gallies, & the souldiers them selues of SAMIA, into the market place of the citie of MILETYM: where he made them to be bound fast vnto bordes for the space of tenne dayes, & at the ende of the same, the poore men halfe dead, were beaten downe with clubbes, and their heads passed in peeces: and afterwards they threw out their bodies to the crows, & would not burie them. So Durris being accustomed to ouerreach, & to lye many times in things nothing touching him: seemeth in this place out of E all reason to aggravate the calamities of his countrie, only to accuse the ATHENIANs, and to make them odious to the world. Pericles hauing wone the citie of SAMOS, he returned againe to ATHENS, where he dyd honorably burie the bones of his flaine cittizens in this warre: and him self (according to their manner & custome) made the funeral oration for the which he was maruelously esteemed. In fuche sorte, that after he came downe from the pulpit where he made his oration: the ladies & gentlewomen of the citie came to salute him, & brought him garlands to put vpon his head, as they doe to noble coqueuers when they returne from games, where they haue wonne the price. But Elpinice coming to him, sayed. Surely Pericles, thy good seruice done, deserueth garlands of triumph: for thou hast lost vs many a good and valiant citizen, not fighting with the MEDES, the PHOENICIANs, and with the barbarous people as my brother Cimon dyd, but for destroyng a citie of our owne nation and kynted Pericles to these wordes, softly answered Elpinice, with Archilocus verse, smyling: Archaia Melibolus

But Ion writeth, that he greatly gloried, and stooode muche in his owne conceipt; after he had subdued the SAMIANS, saying: Agamemnon was tenne yerres taking of a citie of the barbarous people: and he in nine moneths only had wonne the strongest citie of the whole nation of IONIA. In deede he had good cause to glorie in his victorie: for truly (if Thucydides reporte be true) his conquest was no lesse doubtfull, then he founde it dangerous. For the SAMIANS had almost bene lordes of the sea, and taken the seigniorie thereof from the ATHENIANS. After this, the warres of PELOPONNESVS being whotte againe, the CORINTHIANS invading thilanders of CORPHV: Pericles dyd persuade the ATHENIANS to send ayde vnto the CORPHIANS, and to ioyne in league with that lland, which was of great power by sea, saying: that the PELOPONNESIANS (before it were long) would haue warre with them. The ATHENIANS consented to his motion, to ayde those of CORPHV. Whereupon they sent thither Lacedemonius (Cimon sonne) with tenne gallyes only for a mockery: for all Cimon's familie and friendes, were wholly at the LACEDEMONIANS deuotion. Therefore dyd Pericles cause Lacedemonius to haue so fewe shippes deliuered him, and further, sent him thither against his will, to the ende that if he dyd no notable exploit in this seruice, that they might then the more iustly suspect his good will to the LACEDEMONIANS. Moreover whilst he liued, he dyd euer what he could, to keepe Cimon's children backe from rising: bicause that by their names they were no naturall borne ATHENIANS, but straungers.

For the one was called Lacedemonius, the other Thessalus, and the third Elius: and the mother to all them three, was an ARCADIAN woman borne. But Pericles being blamed for that he sent but tenne gallyes only, which was but a slender ayde for thole that had requested them, and a great matter to them that spake ill of him: he sent thither afterwards a great number of other gallyes, which came when the battell was fought. But the CORINTHIANS were maruelous angrie, and went & complained to the counsell of the LACEDEMONIANS, where they layed open many grieuous complaints and accusations against the ATHENIANS, and so dyd the MEGARIANS also: alledging that the ATHENIANS had forbidden them their hauens, their staples, and all trafficke of marchaundise in the territories vnder their obedience, which was directly against the common lawes, and articles of peace, agreed vpon by othe amongst all the GRECIANS. Moreover the EGINETES finding them selues very ill and cruelly handled, dyd send secretly to make their mone & complaints to the LACEDEMONIANS, being asfeard openly to complaine of the ATHENIANS. While these things were a doing, the citie of POTIDEA, subiect at that time vnto the ATHENIANS (and was built in olde time by the CORINTHIANS) dyd rebell, and was besieged by the ATHENIANS, which dyd hasten on the warres. Notwithstanding this, ambassadours were first sent vnto ATHENS vpon these complaints, & Ambidamus, king of the LACEDEMONIANS, dyd all that he could to pacifie the most parte of these quarrells and complaints, intreating their friendes and allies. So as the ATHENIANS had had no warres at all, for any other matters wherewith they were burdened, if they would haue graunted to haue reuoked the decree they had made against the MEGARIANS. Whereupon Pericles, that aboue all other fload most against the reuocation of that decree, & that dyd stirre vp the people, & made the stand to that they had once decreed, & ordered, against the MEGARIANS: was thought the only original cause & author of the PELOPONNESIAN warres.

For it is sayed that the LACEDEMONIANS sent ambassadours vnto ATHENS for that matter only. And when Pericles alledged a lawe, that dyd forbid them to take away the table, wherupon before time had bene written any common law or edict: Polarches, one of the LACEDEMONIAN ambassadours, sayed vnto him. Well, said he, take it not away then, but turne the table only: your lawe I am luter forbiddeh not that. This was pleasauntly spoken of the ambassadour, but Pericles could neuer be brought to it for all that. And therefore it seemeth he had some secret occasion of grudge against the MEGARIANS: yet as one that would finely conuey it vnder the common cause & cloke, he tooke fro them the holy fads they were breaking vp. For to bring this to passe, he made an order, that they should send an herald to summonne the MEGARIANS to let the land alone, & that the same herald should goe also vnto the LACEDEMONIANS to accuse the MEGARIANS vnto the. It is true that this ordinance was made by Pericles meanes, as also it was most iust & reasonable: but it befell so, that the messenger they sent thither dyed Pericles, author of the warre against Peloponnesus.

Pericles made lawe against the Megarians.

A And nor without suspition that the MEGARIANS made him awaye. Wherefore Charinus made a lawe presently against the MEGARIANS: that they should be proclaimed mortall enemies to the ATHENIANS for euer, without any hope of after reconciliation. And also if any MEGARIAN should once put his foote within the territories of ATTICA, that he should suffer the paynes of death. And moreover, that their capitaines taking yerely their ordinary othe, should sweare among other articles, that twise in the yere they should goe with their power, and destroy some parte of the MEGARIANS lande. And lastly, that the heraulde Anthemocritus should be buried by the place called then the paper Thrasimenos, and now called, Dipylon. But the MEGARIANS stowtely denying, that they were any cause of the death of this Anthemocritus: dyd altogether burden Aspasia and Pericles with the same, alledging for B prooff thereof, Aristophanes verses the Poet, in his comedie he intituled the Acharnes, which are so common, as euery boye hath them at his tongues ende.

*The young men of our lande (to drunken bybbling bent) ranne out one daye unruly, and towards Megara went.
From whence in their outrage, by force they tooke awaye, Simatha noble curtsian, as she dyd sorte and playe.
VWherevwith enraged all (with pepper in the nose) the proude Megarians came to vs, as to their mortall foes, And tooke by the the awaye, of harlots eke a payer, attending on Aspasia, which were both young and fayer.*

C But in very deede, to tell the originall cause of this warre, and to deliuer the trothe thereof, it is very harde. But all the historiographers together agree, that Pericles was the chiefeft author of the warre: bicause the decree made against the MEGARIANS, was not reuoked backe againe. Yet some holde opinion, that Pericles dyd it of a noble minde and iudgement, to be constant in that he thought most expedient. For he iudged that this commaundement of the LACEDEMONIANS was but a triall, to proue if the ATHENIANS would graunte them: and if they yelded to them in that, then they manifestly shewed that they were the weaker. Other contrarie saye, that it was done of a selfe will and arrogancie, to shewe his authoritie and power, and howe he dyd despise the LACEDEMONIANS. But the shrowdest proff of all, that bringeth best authoritie with it, is reported after this sorte. Phidias the image maker (as we haue tolde you before) had vndertaken to make the image of Pallas: and being Pericles friende, was in great estimation about him. But that procured him many ill willers. Then they being desirous to heare by him what the people would iudge of Pericles: they intified Menon, one of the worke men that wrought vnder Phidias, and made him come into the market place to praye assurance of the people that he might openly accuse Phidias, for a faulte he had committed about Pallas image. The people receyued his obedience, and his accusation was heard openly in the market place, but no mention was made of any theft at all: bicause that Phidias (through Pericles counsell & deuile) had from the beginning layed on the gold vpon the image, that it might be taken of, & wayed euery whitte. Whereupon Pericles openly sayed vnto his accusers, take of the golde & way it. The glorie of his works dyd purge chase him this enuie. For he hauing graue vpon the scutcheion of the goddesse, the battell of the AMAZONS, had cut out the portraiture of him self maruelous liuely, vnder the persone of an olde balde man, lifting vp a great stone with both his handes. Further he had cut out Pericles image, excellently wrought & artificially, seeming in maner to be Pericles self, fighting with an AMAZON in this sorte. The AMAZONS had being liue vp high, holdeth a dart before Pericles face, so passing cunningly wrought, as it seemed to shadowe the likenes & resemblance of Pericles: and yet notwithstanding appeareth plainly to be Pericles self on either side of the portraiture. So Phidias was clapt vp in prison, & there dyed of a sicknes, or els of poyson (as some saye) which his enemies had prepared for him: & all to bring Pericles into further suspition, & to geue them the more cause to accuse him. But howeouer it was, the people gaue Menon his freedome, & set him free for paymēt of all subsidies, following the order Glycon made, and gaue the capitaines charge they should see him safely kept, and that he tooke no hurte. to Pericles, and receyued citizens wiues into her houle, which Pericles kept. And Diopithes at the same time made a decree, that they should make searche and enquire for hereticks that dyd not beleue in the goddess, and that taught certaine newe doctrine and opinion touching the operations of things aboue in the element, turning the suspition vpon Pericles; bicause of Anaxagoras. The people dyd receyue and confirme this inquisition: and it was moued also then by Dracontides, that Pericles should deliuer an account of the money he had spent, vnto the handes of the Prytanis, who were treasurers of the common fines and reuenues, and that the iudges deputed to geue iudgement, should geue sentence within the citie vpon the altar.
But Agnon put that worde out of the decree, and placed in stead thereof, that the cause should be iudged by the fiftene hundred iudges, as they thought good, if any man brought this action for theste, for batterie, or for iniustice. As for Aspasia, he saued her, euen for the verie pittie and compassion the iudges tooke of him, for the teares he shed in making his humble fyle for her, all the time he pleaded her case: as Æschines writeth. But for Anaxa-goras, fearing that he could not doe so muche for him: he sent him out of the citie, and him self dyd accompany him. And furthermore, seeing he had incurred the ill will of the people for Phidias facte, and for this cause fearing the issue of the iudgement: he set the warres a fyre agaïne, that allwayes went backward, and dyd but smoke a litle, hoping by this meanes to weare out the accusations against him, and to roote out the malice some dyd beare him. For the people hauing waighte matters in hande, and very dangerous also: he knewe they would put all into his handes alone, he hauing wonne alreadye fuche great authoritie and reputation among them. And these be the causes why he would not (as it is sayd) suffer the ATHENIANS to yeld vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS in any thing: howbeit the trothe cannot certainly be knowne. But the LACEDÆMONIANS knowing well, that if they could weede out Pericles, and ouerthrowe him, they might then deale as they would with the ATHENIANS: they commaunded them they should purge their citie of Cylons rebellion, bicause they knew well enough that Pericles kynne by the mothers side were to be touched withall, as Thucydides declareth. But this practise fell out contrarie to their hope, and expectation, that were sent to ATHENS for this purpose. For, vnto the haue brought Pericles into further suspition and displeasure, the citizens honoured him the more, and had a better affiaunce in him then before, bicause they saue his enemies dyd so much feare and hate him. Wherefore, before king Archidamus entred with the armie of the PELOPONNESIANS into the countrie of ATTICA, he tolde the ATHENIANS, that if king Archidamus fortunèd to waite and destroye all the countrie about, and should spare his landes and goodes for the olde loue and familiaritie that was betweene them, or rather to geue his enemies occasion falsly to accuse him: that from thenceforth, he gaue all the landes and tenements he had in the countrie, vnto the common wealthe. So it fortunèd, that the LACEDÆMONIANS with all their friends and confederates, brought a maruelous armie into the countrie of ATTICA, vnder the leading of king Archidamus: who burning & spoyleing all the countries he came alongest, they came vnto the towne of ACHARNES, were they incamped, supposing the ATHENIANS would neuer suffer them to approche so neere, but that they would giue them battell for the honour and defence of their countrie, and to shewe that they were no cowards. But Pericles wisely considered howe the daunger was to great to hazard battell, where the losse of the citie of ATHENS stoode in perill, seeing they were three score thousand foote of the PELOPONNESIANS, & of the BORO-TIANS together: for so many was their number in the first voyage they made against the ATHENIANS. And as for those that were very desirous to fight, and to put them selues to any hazard, being mad to see their countrie thus wasted and destroyed before their eyes, Pericles dyd comforte and pacifie them with these wordes. That trees being cut and hewen downe, dyd spring againe in shorte time: but men being once dead, by no possibilitie could be brought a-gaïne. Therefore he neuer durst assemble the people in counnell, fearing least he should be inforced by the multitude, to doe some thing against his will. But as a wife man of a shippe, when he seeth a storme coming on the sea, doth straight geue order to make all things safe in

A the shippe, preparing euery thing readie to defend the storme, according to his arte and skill, not harkening to the passengers fearefull cries and pittiefull teares, who thinke them selues cast away: euen so dyd Pericles rule all things according to his wisdom, hauing walled the citie substantially about, and set good watche in euery corner: and passed not for those that were angrie & offended with him, neither would be perswaded by his friends earnest requests & intreaties, neither cared for his enemies threats nor accusations against him, nor yet reckoned of all their foolish scoffing songes they songe of him in the citie, to his shame and re-proche of gouernment, saying that he was a cowardly capitaine, and that for daftardlines he let the enemies take all, and spoyle what they would. Of which number Cleon was one that most defamed him, and beganne to enter into some pretie credit and fauour with the common people, for that they were angrie, and misliked with Pericles: as appeareth by these flaun-derous verses of Hermippus, which were then abroad:

*O King of Satyres thou, who vwith such manly speache of bloudy warres and doughty dedes, dost aslie to vs preache: VVhy art thou nowre afraied, to take thy launce in hande, or vwith thy pike against thy foes, courageously to stand?
Synce Cleon florvte and fierce, doth aslie thee prouoke, VVith biting vvordes, vvith trenchant blades, & deadly daunting stroke.*

All these notwithstanding, Pericles was neuer moued any thing, but with silence dyd paciently beare all injuries and scoffings of his enemies, and dyd fend for all that a naue of a C hundred sayle vnto PELOPONNESVS, whether he would not goe in person, but kept him self at home, to keepe the people in quiet: vntill such time as the enemies had raised their campe, and were gone away. And to entertaine the common people that were offended and angrie at this warre: he comforted the poore people againe, with causing a certen distribution to be made amongst them of the common treasure, and diuision also of the landes that were got by conquest. For after he had driuen all the ÆGINETES out of their countrie, he caused the whole Ile of ÆGINA to be deuided by lot amongst the citizens of ATHENS. And then it was a great comforte to them in this aduersitie, to heare of their enemies hurte and losse in fuche manner as it dyd fall out. For their armie that was sent by sea vnto PELOPONNESVS, had wasted and destroyed a great parte of the champion countrie there, and had sacked be-D sides many small cities and townes, Pericles selfe also entring into the MEGARIANS countrie by lande, did waste the whole countrie all afore him. So the PELOPONNESIANS receyuing by sea asmuche hurte and losse at the ATHENIANS hands, as they before had done by lande vnto the ATHENIANS: they had not holden out warres so long with the ATHENIANS, but would fone haue geuen ouer (as Pericles had tolde them before) had not the goddess aboute secretly hindered mans reason and pollicie. For first of all there came such a sore plague among the ATHENIANS, that it tooke awaye the flower of ATHENS youth, and weakened the force of the whole citie besides. Furthermore the bodies of them that were left aloue being infected with this disease, their hartes also were so sharply bent against Pericles, that the sicknes hauing troubled their braynes, they fell to flat rebellion against him, as the patient against his E physician, or children against their father, euen to the hurting of him, at the prouocation of his enemies. Who bruted abroad, that the plague came of no cause els, but of the great multitude of the coity men that came into the citie on heapes, one vpon anothers necke in the harte of the sommer, where they were compelled to lye many together, smothered vp in lide tentens and cabines, remaining there all daye long, cowering downewardes, and doing nothing where before they liued in the countrie in a freshe open ayre, and at libertie. And of all this, saye they, Pericles is the only cause, who procuring this warre, hath pent and throwded the country men together within the walles of a citie, employing them to no manner of vse nor seruice, but keeping them like sheepe in a pinnefolde, maketh one to poysen another with the infection of their plague fores ronning vpon them, and geuing them no leaue to chaunge F ayar, that they might so muche as take breathe abroad. Pericles to remedy this, and to doe their enemies a litle mischief: armed a hundred and fiftie shippes, and shipped into them a great number of armed footemen and horsemen also . Hereby he put the citizens in good hope, and the enemies in great feare, feeling fo great a power . But when he had shipped all his men, and was him selfe also in the admirall ready to hoyle sayle : sodainly there was a great eclypse of the funne, and the daye was very darke, that all the armie was striken with a maruelous feare, as of some daungerous and very ill token towards them . Pericles seeing the master of his gallye in a maze withall, not knowing what to doe : cast his cloke ouer the masters face, and hid his eyes, asking him whether he thought that any hurte or no . The master aunswered him, he thought it none . Then sayed Pericles againe to him . There is no difference betwene this and that, sauing that the bodye which maketh the darknes is greater, then my cloke which hideth thy eyes . These things are thus disputed of in the schooles of the philosophers . But Pericles hoyfing sayle notwithstanding, dyd no notable nor special seruise, aunswerable to so great an armie and preparation . For he laying seige vnto the holy cittie of EPIDAVRUM, when euery man looked they should haue taken it, was compelled to rayse his seige for the plague that was so vehement : that it dyd not only kill the ATHENIANS them selues, but all other also (were they neuer so fewe) that came to them, or neere their campe . Wherefore perceyuing the ATHENIANS were maruelously offended with him, he dyd what he could to comforte them, and put them in harte againe : but all was in vaine, he could not pacifie them . For by the most parte of voyces, they depriued him of his charge of generall, and condemned him in a maruelous great fine & summe of money, the which those that tell the least doe write, that it was the summe of fiftene talentes : and those that say more, speake of fittie talentes . The accuser subscribed in this condemnation, was Cleon, as Idomenus, or Simmias saye, or as Theophrastus writeth : yet Heraclides Ponticus sayeth, one Lacratidas . Nowe his common grieues were sone blown ouer : for the people dyd easely let fall their displeasures towards him, as the waspe leaueh her stinge behinde her with them the hath stong . But his owne priuate affayers and household causes were in very ill cafe : both for that the plague had taken away many of his friends and kinsmen from him, as also for that he and his house had continued a long time in disgrace . For Xanthippus Pericles sonne & heire) being a man of a very ill disposition and nature, and hauing married a young woman very prodigall and lauiſhe of expence, the daughter of Isander, sonne of Epilycus : he grudged much at his fathers hardnes, who scanty gaue him money, and but litle at a time . Whereupon he sent on a time to one of his fathers friendes in Pericles name, to praye him to lend him some money, who sent it vnto him . But afterwards when he came to demaunde it againe, Pericles dyd not only refuse to paye it him, but further, he put him in sute . But this made the young man Xanthippus so angrie with his father, that he spake very ill of him in euery place where he came : and in inockery reported howe his father spent his time when he was at home, and the talke he had with the Sophisters, and the master rethoricians . For a mischance fortuneing on a time, at the game of throwing the darte, who should throwe best, that he that threwe, dyd vnfortunatly kill one Epitimus a THESSALIAN : Xanthippus went prating vp and downe the towne, that his father Pericles was a whole daye disputing with Protagoras the Rethorician, to knowe which of the three by lawe and reason should be condemned for this murder . The darte : he that threwe the darte : or the deuiler of that game . Moreover E Stesimbrotus writeth, that the brute that ranne abroade through the cittie, howe Pericles dyd keepe his wife, was sowne abroade by Xanthippus him selfe . But so it is, this quarrell & hate betwext the father and the sonne continued without reconciliation vnto the death . For Xanthippus dyed in the great plague, and Pericles owne sister also : moreover he lost at that time by the plague, the more parte of all his friends and kinsfolkes, and those specially that dyd him greatest pleasure in gouerning of the state . But all this dyd neuer pull down his countenance, nor any thing abate the greatnes of his minde, what misfortunes soeuer he had susteined . Neither sawe they him weepe at any time, nor mourne at the funeralles of any of his kinsmen or friendes, but at the death of Paralus, his younger and lawfull begotten sonne : for, the losse of him alone dyd only melt his harte . Yet he dyd stroue to shewe his naturall constancie, and to keepe his accustomed modestie . But as he would haue put a garland of flowers vpon his head, forsoe dyd fo pierce his harte when he sawe his face, that then he burst out in teares, and

A and cryed a mayne : which they neuer sawe him doe before, all the dayes of his life . Furthermore the people hauing proued other captaines and gouernours, and finding by experience that there was no one of them of iudgement and authoritie sufficient, for so great a charge : In the ende, of them selues they called him againe to the pulpit for orations to heare their counsells, and to the state of a captaine also to take charge of the state . But at that time he kept him selfe cloſe in his house, as one bewailing his late grieuous losse and sorowe . Howbeit Alcibiades, and other his familiar friendes, perswaded him to shewe him selfe vnto the people : who dyd excuse them selues vnto him, for their ingratitude towards him . Pericles then taking the government againe vpon him, the first matter he entred into was : that he prayed them to reuoke the statute he had made for bafe borne children, fearing least his lawfull heires would sayle, and so his house and name should fall to the ground . But as for that lawe, thus it stood . Pericles when he was in his best authoritie, caused a lawe to be made, that they only should be counted citizens of ATHENS, which were naturall ATHENIANS borne by father and mother . Not long time after, it fortuned that the king of EGYPT hauing sent a gifte vnto the people of ATHENS, of forty thousand bushells of corne, to be distributed among the citizens there : many by occasion of this lawe were accused to be bafe borne, and specially men of the bafe sorte of people, which were not known before, or at the least had no reckoning made of them, and so some of them were falsely and wrongfully condemned . Whereupon so it fell out, that there were no lesse then fise thousand of them conuicted and solde for slaues : and they that remained as free men, and were iudged to be naturall citizens, amownted to the number of fourteene thousand and fortie persones . Now this was much unlike : of the people, that a lawe enacted, and that had bene of suche force, should by the selfe maker and deuiler of the same be againe reuoked and called in . Howbeit Pericles late calamitie that fortuned to his house, dyd breake the peoples hardened hartes against him . Who thinking these sorowes smarte, to be punishment enough vnto him for his former pryde, and iudging that by goddes diuine iustice and permission, this plague and losse fell vpon him, and that his request also was tolerable : they suffered him to enrolle his bafe borne sonne in the register of the lawfull citizens of his familie, geuing him his owne name, Pericles . It is the selfe same Pericles, who after he had overcome the PELOPONNESIANS in a great battell by sea, neere vnto the Iles ARGINUSES, was put to death by sentence of the people, with the other captaines his companiōs . Now was Pericles at that time infected with the plague, but not so vehemently as other were, rather more temperately : & by long space of time, with many alterations and chaunges, that dyd by litle and litle decaye, and consume the strength of his bodie, and overcame his senses and noble minde . Therefore Theophrastus in his morales declareth, in a place where he disputeth, whether mens manners doe chaunge with their misfortunes, and whether corporall troubles and afflictions doe so alter men, that they forget vertue, and abandon reason : that Pericles in this sickness shewed a friende of his that came to see him, I cannot tell what a preferring charme the women had tyed (as a carkanet) about his necke, to let him vnderstand he was very ill, since he suffered them to apply suche a fooliſhe bable to him . In the ende, Pericles drawing fast vnto his death, the Nobilitie of the cittie, and such his friendes as were left aliue, standing about his bed, beganne to speake of his vertue, and of the great authoritie he had borne, considering the greatnes of his noble actes, and counting the number of his victories he had wonne (for he had wonne nine foughten battells being generall of the ATHENIANS, and had set vp so many tokens and triumphes in honour of his cuntrye) they reckoned vp among them selues all these matters, as if he had not vnderstoode them, imagining his senses had bene gone . But he contrariſe being yet of perfect memorie, heard all what they had sayed, and thus he beganne to speake vnto them . That he marueled why they had so highly prayed that in him, which was common to many other captaines, and wherein fortune delt with them in equalitie a like, and all this while they had forgotten to speake of the best & most notable thing that was in him, which was : that no ATHENIAN had euer worne blacke gowne through his occasion . And suer fo was he a noble and worthy person . For he dyd not only shewe him selfe mercifull and courteous, euen in most weightie matters of government, among so enuious people and hateful enemies: but he had this iudgement also to thincke, that the most noble actes he dyd were these, that he neuer gaue him selfe vnto hatred, enuie, nor choller, to be reuenged of his most mortall enemy, without mercy shewed towards him, though he had committed vnto him suche absolute power and sole gouernment among them. And this made his surname to be Olympius (as to saye, diuine or celestiall) which otherwise for him had bene to proude and arrogant a name, because he was of so good and gentle a nature, and for that in so great libertie he had kept cleane handes & vndeiled: euen as we esteeme the goddess authors of all good, and causers of no ill, and so worthy to gouerne and rule the whole monarchie of the world. And not as Poets saye, which doe confounde our wittes by their follies, and sonde faynings, and are also contrarie to them selues, considering that they call heauen (which containeth the goddess) the euerlasting seare, which trembleth not, and is not driuen nor moued with windes, neither is darkened with cloudes, but is allwayes bright and cleare, and at all times shynyng equally with a pure bright light, as being the only habitation and mansion place of the eternall God, only happy and immortall. And afterwarde they describe it them selues, full of dissensions, of enmities, of anger and passions, which doe nothing become wise and learned men. But this discourse peraduenture would be better spoken of in some other booke. Nowe, the troubles the ATHENIANS felt immediately after Pericles death, made them then lament the losse of so noble a member. For those who vnpatiently dyd brooke his great authoritie while he liued, because it drowned their owne: when they came after his death to proue other speakers and gouernours, they were compelled then to confesse, that no mans nature liuing could be more moderate nor graue, with lenitie and mercie, then his was. And that most hated power, which in his life time they called monarchie, dyd then most plainly appeare vnto them, to haue bene the manifest ramper and bullwarke of the safetie of their whole state and common weale: suche corruption and vice in gouernment of the state, dyd then spring vp immediately after his death, which when he was aliue, he dyd euer suppress and keepe vnder in suche sorte, that either it dyd not appeare at all, or at the least it came not to that hed and libertie, that suche faultes were committed, as were vnpossible to be remedied.

Fabius Maximus.

HAVING already declared vnto you such things worthy memorie as we could collect, and gather of the life of Pericles: it is now good time we should proceede to write also of the life of Fabius Maximus. It is sayed the first Fabius, from whom the house and familie of the Fabians dyd descend (being the greatest & noblest house of all other in ROME) was begotten by Hercules, whom he gatte of a Nympe (or as other saye, a woman of the coutrie) by the riuer of Tyber. And some saye, that the first of this house, were called at the beginning Fodians, because they dyd hunte wilde beastes, with pittefalls and ditches: For vnto this present the ROMAINES call ditches, Fosse: and to digge Fodere. Since that time, the two second letters haue bene chaunged, and they haue called them Fabians. But how foueuer it was, this is certaine, that many noble men haue come out of that house: and among other, there was one of that house called Fabius Rullus, whom the ROMAINES for his noble after dyd surname Maximus, very great. After him Fabius Maximus, whose life we haue now in hande, was the fourth lineally descended of the same line, and he was surnamed Verrucosus, because of a certen birth marke he had vpon one of his lippes, like a litle wart. And he was also surnamed Onicula, a litle lamme, for his softnes, slownes, and grauity of his doings whilest he was a childe. But because of nature he was dull, still, and very silent, and that he was seldom seene to playe at any pastime among the boyes, and for that they sawe he was but of slowe capacitie, and hard to learne and conceyue, and withall that the boyes might doe to him what they would, he was so lowly to his fellowes: this made men iudge that looked nor into him, that he would proue a very foole and nigeot. Yet other were of contrarie opinion of him: who considering more deeply the man, perceyued in his nature a certen secreet constancie & the maiestie of a lyon. But Fabius selfe when he was called to serue the common weale, dyd quickly shewe to the world, that which they tooke for dullnes in him, was his grauitie, which neuer altered for no cause or respect: and that which other iudged fearefulness in him, was very wisdom. And where he shewed him selfe not hastie, nor sodaine in any thing: it was found in him an assured and settled constancie. Wherefore when he came to consider the great foueraintie of their common weale, and the continuall warres it was in: he dyd vfe his bodie to all hardnes, and brought vp him selfe therewithall, that he might be the better able to serue in the field: and he gaue him selfe much to eloquence also, as a necessary instrument to persuade souldiers vnto reason. His tongue likewise did agree with his conditions, and manner of life. For he had no manner of affectation, nor counterfeited finenes in his speech, but his words were euer very graue and profound, and his sentences euen graffe in him by nature, and (as some saye) were much like Thucydides sayings. As appeareth in a funeral oration he made before the people in the praise of his sonne, who dyed when he came out of his Consulshippe, which is yet extant to be seene. Now as for him, hauing bene fve times chosen Consul, in his first yere of his Consulshippe, he triumphed ouer the LIGURIANS (which be people of the mountaines, and vpon the coast of GENVA) who being ouerthrowen by him in a great battell, where they had lost many men, they were compelled to goe their waye, & to take the ALPES for their succour, & durst no more appeare vpon the borders of ITALIE, whereupon they dyd confine. Hannibal entring ITALY afterwards with a great armie, and hauing wonne the first battell neere vnto the riuer of TREBIA: he passed further, and went through TVSCAN, wasting and distroying all the countrie as he passed by. This made ROME quake for feare. Besides they sawe many signes and tokens, some common vnto them, as thundering, lightning, & such other like: but other also more strange, neuer seene nor heard of before. For it was reported that certen targets were waxen all bloudie of them selues, & that about the cittie of ANTIVM they found wheate eares, which were all bloudie when they were reaped: that there fell from heauen, burning stones all in a flame of fire: and in the countrie of the PHALERIANS how the element seemed to open, and many litle written scrolles fell downe vpon the ground, in one of the which were written these wordes, worde for worde: Mars doth now handle his weapons. C But all these signes and wonders dyd nothing appawle nor daunte the boldnes of Caius Flaminius, Consul then: who besides the natural great courage, & aspiring minde he had to honour, yet was it beyond all reason increased in him, by the wonderfull good successe he had before. For, notwithstanding the Senate called him home againe, and that his fellowe Consul stoode against his intent: he for all that dyd geue battell to the GAULS, in despite of them all, and wanne the victorie. Likewise, though all these signes & wonders in the ayre, dyd greatly trouble, and amaze multitudes of people: yet did they nothing trouble Fabius, for he sawe no apparent cause to be troubled withall. But he vnderstanding the small number of his enemies, and the lacke of money that was among them: gaue counsell, and was of opinion they should patiently forbear a litle, and not to hazard battell against a man, whose armie hadde bene long D trained in warres, and by many foughten fields was grown valliant and expert. Moreover, he thought good they should send ayde to their subiects, and other their allies and confederates, as neede required, to keepe their cities still vnder their obedience: and in the meane season by tract of time, to weare out Hanniballs force and power, which was like strawe set a fire, that straight geueth forth a blase, and yet hath no substance to holde fire long. When Fabius had thus layed enough to persuade Flaminius, yet it would not sincke into Flaminius heade: for, sayeth he, I will not tarie vntill the warres come to ROME gates, neither will I be brought to fight vpon the walles of the cittie, to defend it, and as Camillus dyd, that fought within the cittie selfe in olde time. Whereup on he commaunded his captaines to set out their bandes to the field, and he him selfe tooke his horse backe: which vpon the sodaine, without any cause E was so feard, and tooke so on with him selfe, that he cast the Consul to the ground with his heade forward. For all this fall he would not change his minde, but helde on his iorney toward Hannibal, and presented him battell in TVSCAN, by the lake called Thrasimena, which is the lake of PERVISA. This battell was so fiercely fought on both sides, that notwithstanding there was such a terrible earthquake therewith, that some cities were ouerthrowen and turned topsi turuey, some riuers had their streames turned against their course, and the foote of the mountaines were tome in fonder, and broken open: yet not one of them that were fighting, heard any such thing at all. Flaminius the Consul selfe was slaine at that battell, after he had in his owne persone done many a valliant acte, and many of the worthiest gentlemen and valliantest souldiers of his armie laye dead about him: the residue being fled, the slaughter F was great, for the bodies slaine were fiftene thousand, and so many prisoners left aliuie. After this ouerthrowe, Hannibal made all the searche he could possible to finde the bodie of Flaminius, Annus, to burie him honorably, because of his valliantnes: but he could neuer be founde amongest the dead bodies, neither was it euer heard what became of it. Now as touching the first ouerthrowe at TREBIA, neither the generall that wrote it, nor the poet that brought the first newes to ROME, tolde the trothe of it as it was, but sayned that the ende was doubtfull, and that they could not tell who had the best. But of this battell, so fone as the pretor Pomponius had receyued the newes, he called all the people to counsell, where without disguising or dissembling at all, he playnely sayed thus vnto them. My Lordes, we have lost the battell, our armie is ouerthrowen, and the Consul him selfe is slaine in the field: wherefore consider what you haue to doe, & prouide for your safety. These wordes spoken to the people, as it had bene a boysterous storme of weather that had fallen on them from B the sea, to put them in daunger, dyd so terrifie the multitude, and trouble the whole cittie for feare: that they were all in a maze, and knewe not what to determine. Yet in the ende they all agreed, that it stoode them vpon to haue a chief magistrate, called in Latin Dictator, that should be a man of corage, and could stowtely vse it without sparing or fearing any persone. And for this, Fabius Maximus was thought the only man mete to be chosen, as he, whose noble corage and graue behauiour was aniuersable, to the dignitie and fourraintie of the office: and moreover, that to his grauity and wisdom there was ioyned (by reasonable age) strength of bodie, and valliantnes with experience. This counsell being confirmed by them all, Fabius was chosen Dictator, who named Lucius Minutius generall of the horsemen. Then he first required the Senate, that they would graunte him he might C haue his horse in the warres: the which was not lawfull for the Dictator, but expressly forbidden by an auncient order. Either because they thought the chiefeest force of their armie dyd consist in their footemen, which caused the making of this lawe: whereby the generall should be amongest them in the daye of the battell, and in no wise should forsake them. Or els because the authoritie of this magistrate in all other things was so great, that it was in manner after the state of a King: yet all this notwithstanding, they were willing therunto, and that the Dictator should haue absolute power ouer the people. Fabius at his first coming, because he would shewe the maiestie and dignitie of his office, and that euery man should be the more obedient and readie at his commaundement: when he went abroad, he had foure and twentie sergeants before him, carying the bundells of rodde, and axes, D And when one of the Consuls came to him, he sent a sergeant to commaund his bundell of rodde that were caried before him, to be put downe, and all other tokens of dignitie to be layed a side: and that he should come and speake with him, as a priuate man. And first to make a good foundation, and to beginne with the seruice of the goddes: he declared vnto the people, that the losse they had receyued, came through the rashenes and willfull negligence of their captaine, who made no reckoning of the goddes nor religion: and not through any default and cowardlines of the souldiers. And for this cause he dyd persuade them not to be afrayed of their enemies, but to appeale the wrath of the goddes, and to serue and honour them. Not that he made them hereby superstitious, but dyd confirme their valiancy with true religion and godlines: and besides dyd viterly take awaye and awayne their feare E of their enemies, by geuing them certaine hope and assurance of the ayde of the goddes. Then were the holy bookes of the Sibylles prophesies perused, which are kept very secret: and therein they founde certaine auncient prophesies and oracles, which spake of the present misfortunes of the time. But what were contained therein, it is not lawfull to be vtered to any persone. Afterwards the Dictator, before the open assembly of the people, made a solemne vowe vnto the goddes, that he would sacrifice all the profits and frutes that should fall the next yere, of sheepe, of fowes, of milche kyne, and of goates in all the mountaines, champion countrie, riuers, or meadowes of ITALIE. And he would celebrate playes of musike, & shewe other fighthes in the honour of the goddes, and would bestowe vpon the same the summe of three hundred three & thirtie Sestericians, & three hundred three & thirtie Romaine pence, & F a third parte ouer. All which summe reduced into Graecian money, amounteth to foure score three thousand, five hundred, and foure score, and three sliuer drachimas, & two obolos. Now it were a hard thing to tell the reason why he doth mention this summe so precisely, and why R he dyd deuise it by three, vnles it were to extolle the power of the number of three: bicaufe it is a perfect number by the nature, and is the first of the odde numbers, which is the beginning of diuers numbers, and conteineth in it self the first differences, and the first elements and principles of all the numbers vnited and ioyned together. So Fabius hauing brought the people to hope, and trust to haue the ayde and fauour of the goddes: made them in the ende the better disposed to liue well afterwards. Then Fabius hoping after victorie, and that the goddes would fend good lucke and prosperitie vnto men, through their valliantes and wisdom: dyd straight let forwards vnto Hannibal, not as minded to fight with him, but fully resolved to weare out his strength and power, by delays and tract of time: and to increase his pouterie by the long spending of his owne money, and to consume the small number of his people, with the great number of his souldiers. Fabius camped allwayes in the strong and high places of the mountaines, out of all daunger of his enemies horsemen, and coasted still after the enemy: so that when Hannibal stayed in any place, Fabius also stayed: if Hannibal remoued, he followed him straight, and would be allwayes neere him, but neuer forsooke the hilles, neither would he come so neere him, as that he should be enforced to fight against his will. Yet allwayes he followed the enemy at his tayle, and made him euer afeard of him, thincking full that he sought to get the vantage, to geue the charge vpon him. Thus by delaying, and prolonging the time in this sorte: he became disliked of euery bodye. For euery man both in his owne campe, and abroade, spake very ill of him openly: and as for his enemies, they tooke him for no better, then a rancke coward, Hannibal only excepted. But he perceyuing his great reach and policie, and foreseeing the manner of fight, save there was no remedy, but by playne force or slight to bring him to the fight: for otherwise his delaye would ouerthrowe the CARTHAGINIANS, when they should not come to handy strokes with him, wherein only consisted all their hope and strength, and in the meane time his souldiers should fall away, and dye, and his money was scante, and him selfe should growe the weaker. Thereupon Hannibal beganne to bethinke him, and deuise all the stratagemes and policies of warre he could imagine: and like a cunning wrestler, to seeke out all the trickes he could to geue his aduersarie the falle. For sodainely he would goe and geue alarm to his campe: by and by againe he would retire. Another time he would remoue his campe, from one place to another, and geue him some aduantage, to see if he could plucke his lingring deuise out of his head, and yet to hazard nothing. But as for Fabius, he continued still resolute in his first determination: that delaye of fight was the best waye so to ouerthrowe him. Howbeit Minutius, generall of his horsemen, dyd trouble him muche. For he being earnestly bent to fight without discretion, and brauing of a lustie courage, crept into opinion with the souldiers, by his whotte furie and desire to fight. Which wrought muche in them, and so sturred vp their corages, that they mocked Fabius: altogether: and called him Hanniballs schoolemaster: and contrariwise they commended Minutius, for a valliant captaine, and worthy ROMAINE. This made Minutius looke highe, and haue a prowde opinion of him selfe, mocking Fabius: bicaufe he euer lodged on the hilles, with saying, the Dissator would make them goodly sportes, to see their enemies waste and burne ITALY before their face. Moreover, he asked Fabius friends, whether he would in the ende lodge his campe in the skye, that he dyd clyme vp so highe vpon mountaines, mistrusting the earth: or els that he was so affrayed, his enemies would finde him out, that he went to hyde him selfe in the clowdes. Fabius friends made reporte of these ieauses, and aduised him rather to hazard battell, then to beare such reproachefull wordes as were spoken of him. But Fabius answered them. If I should yde to that you counsell me, I should shewe my selfe a greater coward then I am taken for now: by leauing my determination, for feare of their mockes and spightfull wordes. For it is no shame for a man to stand fearefull, and ielous, of the welfare and safetie of his cuntry: but otherwise to be afeard of the wagging of euery strawe, or to regard euery common prating, it is not the parte of a worthy man of charge, but rather of a base minded person, to seeke to please those whom he ought to commaunde and gouerne, bicaufe they are but fooles. After this, Hannibal chaunced to fall

A fall into a great error. For intending to leaue Fabius to bring his armie into the playnes, where there was plentie of vittells, and store of pasture to feede his horse and cattell: he commaunded his guydes to bring him straight after supper, into the playne of CASINVM. They mistaking his wordes, and not vnderstanding well what he sayed, bicaufe his ITALIAN tongue was but meane: tooke one thing for another, and so brought him and his armie to the ende of a feild neere the citie of CASILINVM, through the midst of the which runneth a riuer, the ROMAINS call Fulturnus. Nowe the cuntry lying by it, was a valley compassed in with mountaines round about, sauing that the riuer went to the sea: where leauing his owne bankes, it spreadeth abroade into the marishes, and bankes of sande very deepe, and in the ende fell into that parte of the sea which is most dangerous, and there was neither succour nor couert. Hannibal being now fallen as it were into the bottome of a sacke, Fabius that knewe the cuntry, and was very perfect in all the wayes thereabouts, followed him steppe by steppe, and stopped his passage, where he should haue come out of the valley, with foure thousand footemen, which he planted there to keepe the straight, and disposed the rest of his armie vpon the hangings of the hilles, in the most apt and fit places all about. Then with his light horse men he gaue a charge, vpon the rereward of his enemies battell: which put all Hanniballs armie by and by out of order, and so there were slaine eight hundred of his men. Whereupon Hannibal would haue remoued his campe thence immediatly, and knowing then the faulte his guydes had made, taking one place for another, and the daunger wherein they had brought him: he roundly trusted them vp, and honged them by the neckes. Now to force his enemies to come downe from the toppes of the hilles, and to winne them from their strength, he sawe it was vnpossible, and out of all hope. Wherefore, perceyuing his souldiers both affrayed and discouraged, for that they sawe them selues hemmed in on all sides, without any order to escape: Hannibal determined to deceyue Fabius by a deuise. He caused straight two thousand oxen to be chosen out of the heard, which they had taken before in their spoyle, and tyed to their hornes light bundells of reedes, and fallowe faggottes, or bunches of the dead cuttings of vines: and commaunded the drouers that had the charge of them, that when they sawe any signall or token lift vp in the ayer in the night, they should then straight set fire on those bundels and bunches, and driue vp the beastes to the hilles, toward the wayes where the enemies laye. D Whilest these things were a preparing, he on the other side ranged his armie in order of battell: and when night came, caused them to marche fayer and softly. Now these beastes, whilest the fyre was but litle that burnt vpon their hornes, went but fayer and softly vp the hill from the foote of the mountaines from whence they were driuen. In so muche as the heard men that were on the toppe of the mountaines, wondred maruelously to see suche flames and fires about the hornes of so many beastes, as if it had bene an armie marching in order of battell with lightes and torches. But when their hornes came to be burnt to the stumps, and that the force of the fyre dyd fyre their very fleshe: then beganne the oxen to fight together, and to shake their heades, whereby they dyd set one another a fyre. Then left they their softe pace, & went no more in order as they dyd before, but for the extreme payne they felt, beganne to runne here and there in the mountaines, carying fyre still about their hornes, and in their tayles, and set fyre of all the boughes and coppies they passed by. This was a straunge sight to looke vpon, and dyd muche amaze the ROMAINS that kept the passages of the mountaines, for they thought they had bene men that ranne here and there with torches in their handes. Whereupon they were in a maruelous feare and trouble, supposing they had bene their enemies that ranne thus towards them, to enuironne them of all sides: so as they durst no more keepe the passages which they were commaunded; but forsaking the straights, beganne to flye towards their mayne and great campe. Thereupon Hanniballs light horse men immediatly possessed the straights that were kept: by reason whereof, all the rest of his armie marched out at their ease and leysure, without feare or daunger, notwithstanding that they were loden and troubled with maruelous great spoyle, and of all kynde of fortes. Fabius then perceyued very well the same night, that it was but a slight of Hannibal: for some of the oxen that fled here and there fell vpon his armie. fearing to fall vpon some ambushe by reason of the darke night, he kept his men in battell a raye, without furring, or making any noise. The next morning by breake of daye, he beganne to followe his enemy by the tracke, and fell vpon the tayle of the rereward, with whom he skirmished within the straite of the mountaines: and so dyd distresse somewhat Hannibal armie. Hannibal thereupon sent out of his vanguard a certaine number of Spaniards (very lusty and nymble fellows, that were vsed to the mountaines, and acquainted with climbing vp vpon them) who coming downe, and setting vpon the ROMAINES, that were heauy armed, slue a great number of them, and made Fabius to retire. Thereupon they despised Fabius the more, and thought worke of him then they dyd before: because his pretence and determination was not to be brought to fight with Hannibal, but by wisdom and policie to overthrow him, where as he him selfe by Hannibal was first finely handled and deceyued. Hannibal then to bring Fabius further in disliking and suspition with the ROMAINES, commaunded his souldiers when they came neere any of Fabius landes, that they should burne and destroye all round about them, but gaue them in charge in no wise to meddle with Fabius landes, nor any thing of his, and dyd purposely appointe a garrison to see that nothing of Fabius should miserie, nor yet take hurte. This was straight caried to ROME, which dyd thereby the more incense the people against him. And to helpe it forward, the Tribunes neuer ceased crying out vpon him in their orations to the people, and all by Metellus speciall procurement and persuation: who of him selfe had no caule to mislike with Fabius, but only because he was Minutius kinleman (generall of the horsemen) and thought that the ill opinion they bare to Fabius, would turne to the prayle and aduancement of Minutius. The Senate also were much offended with Fabius, for the composition he made with Hannibal, touching the prisoners taken of either side. For it was articulated betweene them, that they should chaunge prisoners, deliuering man for man, or els two hundred and fiftie silver drachmas for a man, if the one chaunced to haue more prisoners then the other. When exchange was made betweene them, it appeared that Hannibal had left in his handes of ROMAINES prisoners, two hundred and fortie more, then Fabius had to exchange of his. The Senate commaunded there should be no money sent to redeeme them, and greatly founde faulte with Fabius for making this accord: because it was neither honorable, nor profitable for the common weale to redeeme men that cowardly suffered them selues to be taken prisoners of their enemies. Fabius vnderstanding it, dyd patiently beare this displeasure conceyued against him by the Senate. Howbeit hauing no money, and meaning to keepe his worde, and not to leaue the poore citizens prisoners behinde him: he sent his sonne to ROME, with commission to sell his landes, and to bring him money immediatly. The young man went his waye to ROME, and sold his fathers farmes, and brought him money forthwith to the campe: Fabius therewith redeemed the prisoners, and sent their ranfome vnto Hannibal. Many of the prisoners whom he had redeemed, offred to repaye him their ranfome: but he would neuer take any thing againe, and gaue them all their ranfome freely. Afterwards being called to ROME by the priestes to doe certaine solemne sacrifices, he left the armie in charge with Minutius, to gouerne the same in his absence, with condition not to set vpon the enemy, nor to fight with him at all: the which not only by his authoritie he dyd expressly forbide him, but also as his very friende, he dyd warne and intreate him in no wise to attempt. Howbeit Minutius little regarding his commaundementes or requestes, so sone as Fabius backe was turned, beganne to be somewhat lustie, and doing with his enemies. So one daye amongst the rest, Minutius perceyuing Hannibal had sent a great parte of his armie abroad to forrage and get vitells: came and set vpon them that remained behinde, and draue them into their campe, with great slaughter, and dyd put them in a maruelous feare that were saved, as men that looked for no lesse, but to haue bene besieged in their campe. Afterwards also, when their whole armie came together againe: he retired backe in sight of them all, and lost not a man. This exploit set Minutius in a pryde, and brought the souldiers to be more rashe then they were before. The newes of this ouerthrow went forth with speede to ROME, and there they made it a great deale more then it was. Fabius hearing of it, sayed: he was more afraid of Minutius prosperitie, then of his owne aduersitie.

Fabius accus-
sed of treason by Metellus
the Tribune.

A uersitie. But the common people reioyced maruelously, and made great shewe of ioye vp and downe the market place. Whereupon Metellus one of the Tribunes going vp into the pulpit, made an oration vnto the people, in the which he highly magnified Minutius, and commended his courage: and contrarily charged Fabius no more of cowardliness, but with flat treason. Furthermore, he dyd accuse the Nobilitie and greatest men of ROME, saying: that from the first beginning they had layed a platte to drawe these warres out at length, only to destroye the peoples power and authoritie, hauing brought the whole common weale, to the state of a monarchy, and into the handes of a priuate persone. Who by his remissenes and delays, would geue Hannibal leysure to plante him selfe in ITALIE, and by time geue open passage to the CARTHAGINIANS, at their pleasure to send Hannibal a second ayde and armie, to make a full conquest of all ITALIE. Fabius hearing these wordes, rose vp straight, and spake to the people, and taried not about the answering of the accusations the Tribune had burdened him withall, but prayed them they would dispatche these sacrifices and ceremonies of the goddess, that he might speedily returne againe to the campe, to punish Minutius, for breaking his commaundement, in fighting with the enemy. He had no soner spoken these wordes, but there rose a maruelous tumulte and hurly burly presently among the people, for the danger Minutius stood in then: because the Dictator had absolute power and authoritie to imprisone and put to death, whom he thought good, without ordinary course of lawe or araynement. Moreouer, they dyd iudge, since Fabius had alate left his accustomed mildnes and affabilitie, that he would growe to such feueritie in his anger, that it would be a hard thing to appeale him. Wherefore euery man held their peace for feare, sauing only Metellus the Tribune. He hauing authoritie by vertue of his office, to saye what he thought good, and who only of all other kept still his place and authoritie, when any Dictator was chosen: then all the officers that were put down, instantly besought the people not to forsake Minutius, nor to suffer the like to be done to him, as Manlius Torquatus dyd alate to his sonne, who strake of his head, after he had valiantly fought with his enemies and overcome them, for breaking his commaundement. And beganne to persuaide them further, to take this tyrannical power of the Dictatorshippe from Fabius: and to put their stayfers into the handes of him, that would and could tell howe to bring them safely to passe. The people were tickled maruelously with these seditious wordes, but yet they durst not force Fabius to resign his Dictatorshippe, though they bare him great grudge, and were angry with him in their hartes. Howbeit they ordeined that Minutius thenceforth should haue equall power and authoritie with the Dictator in the warres, a thing that was neuer seene nor heard of before, and yet the very same done in that sorte againe, after the battell of Cannas. For Marcus Iunius being at that time Dictator in the campe, they dyd choose another Dictator at ROME, which was Fabius Buteo, to name and create newe Senators in the place of those that were slaine in the battell. But after he had named them, and restored the full number againe of the councill of the Senate: he discharged the selfe same daye the sergeants that caried the axes before him, and sent awaye the traine that waited vpon him, and dyd to put him selfe in prease of the people in the market place, and followed his owne peculiar busines as a priuate persone. Nowe the ROMAINES imagined, that when Fabius should see howe they had made Minutius equall in authoritie with him, it would greue him to the harte for very anger: but they came shortly to iudge of his nature, for he dyd not thincke that their folly should hurte or dishonour him at all. But as wise Diogenes answered one that sayed vnto him, looke, they mocke thee: thus he (sayd he) they mocke not me. Meaning thereby, that he tooke them to be ticked, that were offended with their mockes. Thus Fabius tooke euery thing quietly, that the people offered him, and dyd comfort him selfe with the philosophers rules and examples: who doe mainteine, that an honest and wise man, can no waye be injured nor dishonoured. For all the displeasure he receyued by the peoples folie, was in respect of the common wealth: because they had put a sworde into a mad mans hande, in geuing Minutius authoritie to followe his rashe humour, and fond ambition in the warres. Wherefore, fearing least he being blinded with vaine glorie, and presumptuous opinion of him selfe, should rashely (and vpon a head) hasten to doe some great hurre before he came to the campe: he departed sodainly out of Rome without any mans knowledge, to returne againe to the cape, where he found Minutius so prowde & stowte, that he was not to be delt with. For he would nedes haue the authoritie to commaund the whole armie when it came to his turne. But Fabius would not consent to that, but decided the one halfe of the armie betweene them: thinking it better he should alone commaunde the one halfe, then the whole armie by turnes. So he chose for him selfe, the first and third legion: and gaue vnto him, the seconde and fourth, & decided also betweene them the eyde of their friends. And when Minutius made his boaste, that the maiestie of the highest magistrate was brought lower for his sake: Fabius tolde him that he might thincke, if he were wise, he had not to fight with him, but with Hannibal: and if he would nedes contend against his companion, yet he should haue a speciall regard and consideration, that hauing wonne nowe the citizens good willes, by whom he was so much honoured, he should haue no lesse care of their healtie and safety, then he had, who was nowe troden vnder foote, and ill intreated by them. Minutius tooke his lesson, for a counterfeate mocke, after olde mens manners & facion: & so taking the one halfe of the armie vnto him, went and lodged alone by him self. Hannibal hearing of their iarre and squaring together, sought straight oportunitie to make their discord finely to serue his turne. Nowe there was a hill betweene both their campes not very harde to be wonne, and it was an excellent place to lodge a campe safely in, and was very fitte and commodious for all things. The fields that were about it, dyd seeme a farre of to be very playne & euen ground, bicause they had no couert of wodde to shadowe them, yet were there many ditches and litle vallies in them: wherefore Hannibal though he might easely haue taken it at his pleasure if he had list, dyd let it alone in the middelt betweene them, for a bayte to drawe out his enemies to the battell. Nowe when Hannibal sawe Fabius and Minutius lodged a fonder, he placed certaine bandes in the night, among those ditches and valleyes. Afterwardes the next morning by breake of daye, he sent a small number of men openly to winne this hill: hoping by this pollicie to traine Minutius out to the field, as it fell out in deede. For first Minutius sent thither his light horsemen, and afterwardes all his men at armes: and lastely perceyning that Hannibal him selfe came to relieue his men that were vpon the hill, he him selfe marched forward also with all the rest of his armie in order of battell, & gaue a whorle charge vpon them that defended the hill, to drue them thence. The fight continued equall a good space betweene them both, vntill such time as Hannibal saw his enemy come directly within his daunger, and shewed the reuerend of his battell naked vnto his men, whom before he had layed in ambushe: he straight raised the signall he had geuen them. They vpon that discovered all together, and with great cries dyd set vpon the reuerend of the ROMAINES, & slue a great number of them at the first charge: and dyd put the reste in such a feare and disorder, as it is vnpossible to expresse it. Then was Minutius rashe brauerie and fonde boastes muche cooled, when he looked first vpon one captaine, then vpon another, and sawe in none of them any courage to tarie by it, but rather that they were all readie to runne awaye. Which if they had done, they had bene cast awaye every man: for the NUMIDIANS finding they were the stronger, dyd disperse themselves all about the plaine, killing all stragglers that fled. Minutius souldiers being brought to this daunger and distresse, which Fabius foresawe they would fall into, and hauing vpon this occasion his armie readie ranged in order of battell, to see what would be come of Minutius, not by reporte of messengers, but with his owne eyes: he got him to a lide hill before his campe, where when he sawe Minutius and all his men compassed about on every side, & euen staggering & ready to flye, & heard besides their cries not like men that had hartes to fight, but as men scared, and ready to flye for feare to saue them selues: he clapped his hande on his thighe, and fetched a great sighe, saying to those that were about him. O goddes, howe Minutius is gone to cast him selfe awaye, soner then I looked for, and later then he desired? But in speaking these wordes, he made his enignes marche on in haste, crying out alowde. O my friends, we must dispatche with speede to succour Minutius: for he is a valliant man of persone, & one that loueth the honour of his countrie. And though with our much hardines he hath ventred to farre, & made a faulte, thinking to haue put the enemies to flight: time serueth not now to accuse him, we will tell him of it hereafter. So he presely brake the

the NUMIDIANS, and disparfed them, that laye waiting in the fields for the ROMAINES, which they thought would haue fled. Afterwardes he went further, and dyd set vpon them that had geuen charge vpon the reuerend of Minutius battell, where he slue them that made head against him. The residue, fearing lest they should fall into the daunger they had brought the ROMAINES vnto: before they were enuironned in of all sides, dyd turne taile straight to Fabius. Nowe Hannibal seeing this change, and considering howe Fabius in persone, with more courage then his age required, dyd make a lane in the middelt of those that fought against the side of the hill, to come to the place where Minutius was: he made the battell to cease, and commaunded to founde the retreat, and so drue backe his men againe into his campe, the ROMAINES being very glad also they might retire with safetie. They saye Hannibal in his retiring, layed merylie to his friends: haue not I tolde you (Sirs) many a time and oft, of the hanging clowde we sawe on the toppe of the mountaines, howe it would breake out in the ende with a tempest that would fall vpon vs? After this battell, Fabius hauing stript those that were left dead in the field, retired againe to his owne campe, & spake not an ill word of Minutius his companion. Minutius then being come to his cape, assembled his souldiers, & spake thus to them. My friends, not to erre at all, enterprising great matters, it is a thing passing mans nature: but to take warning hereafter, by faultes that are paste and done, it is the parte of a wise and valliant man. For my selfe, I acknowledge I haue no lesse occasion to prayse fortune, then I haue also cause to complaine of her. For that which long time could neuer teach me, I haue learned by experience in one litle pece of a daye: and that is this. That I am not able to commaunde, but am my selfe fitter to be gouerned and commaunded by another: and that I am but a foole to stande in mine owne conceipt, thinking to overcome those, of whom it is more honour for me to confesse my selfe to be overcome. Therefore I tell you, that the Dictator Fabius henceforth shalbe he, who alone shall commaund you in all things. And to let him knowe that we doe all acknowledge the fauour which we haue presently receyued at his hands: I will leade you to geue him thanks, & will my selfe be the first man to offer to obey him in all that he shall commaund me. These wordes being spoken, he commaunded his ensigne bearers to followe him, & he him selfe marched forth towards Fabius campe. When he came thither, he went directly to the Dictators tente: whereat euery man wondered, not knowing his intent. Fabius came out to mete him. Minutius after he had set downe his enignes at his feete, sayed with a lowde voyce. O father: and his souldiers vnto Fabius souldiers, O masters, which nameth the bondemen that are enfranchised, doe vse to them that haue manumitted them! Afterwardes euery man being silent, Minutius beganne alowde to saye vnto him. My lord Dictator, this daye you haue wonne two victories. The one of Hannibal, whom valliantly you haue overcome: the second, of my selfe your companion, whom also your wisdom and goodnes hath vanquished. By the one, you haue saued our liues: and by the other, you haue wisely taught vs. So haue we also bene overcome in two sortes: the one by Hannibal to our shame, and the other by your selfe, to our honour and preferuation. And therefore doe I nowe call you my father, finding no other name more honorable to call you by, wherewith I might honour you: acknowledging my selfe more bounde vnto you for the present grace and fauour I haue receyued of you, then vnto my naturall father that begatte me. For by him only I was begotten: but by you, mine, and all these honest citizens liues haue bene saued? And hauing spoken these wordes, he embraced Fabius: and so dyd the souldiers also, hartely embrace together, and kisse one another. Thus the ioye was great throught the whole campe, and one was so glad of another, that the teares trickled downe their chokes for great ioye. Nowe when Fabius was afterwardes put out of his office of Dictatorshippe, there were new Consuls chosen againe: the two first followed directly Fabius former order he had begone. For they kept them selues from geuing Hannibal any battell, and dyd allwayes send ayde to their subiects and friends, to keepe them from rebellion: vntill that Terentius Varro (a man of meane birth, and known to be very bold and rashe) by flattereing of the people, wanne credit among them to be made Consul. Then they thought that he by his rashnes and lacke of experience, would incontinently hazard battell: bicause he had cried out in all the assemblies before, that this warre would be euercasting, so long as the people dyd chuse any of the Fabians to be their generalles, and vawnted him selfe openly, that the first day he came to see his enemies, he would ouerthrowe them. In geuing out these braue wordes, he assembled such a power, that the ROMAINES neuer sawe so great a number together, against any enemy that euer they had: for he put into one campe, foure score and eight thousand fighting men. This made Fabius and the other ROMAINES, men of great wisdom and iudgement, greatly affrayed: because they sawe no hope for ROMES to rise againe, if it fortuneth that they should lose so great a number of goodly youth. Therefore Fabius talked with the other Consul, called Paulus Æmilius, a man very skilfull and expert in warres, but ill beloved of the common people, whose furie he yet feared, for that they had condemned him a litle before to paye a great fine to the treasure: and after he had somewhat comforted him, he beganne to perswade and encourage him to resist the fonder rashnes of his companion, telling him, that he should haue as much to doe with Terentius Varro for the preservation and safety of his countrie, as to fight with Hannibal for defence of the same. For they were both Marshall men, and had a like desire to fight: the one because he knewe not wherein the vantage of his strength consisted, and the other because he knewe very well his weaknes. You shall haue reason to beleue me better, for matters touching Hannibal, then Terentius Varro. For I dare warrant you, if you keepe Hannibal from battell but this yere: he shall of necessitie, if he tarie, consume him selfe, or els for shame be driuen to flye with his armie. And the rather, because hetherof (though he seeme to be lord of the field) neuer one yet of his enemies came to take his parte: and moreover because there remaines at this daye in his campe not the third parte of his armie, he brought with him out of his countrie. Vnto these perswasions, the Consul (as it is reported) answered thus. When I looke into my selfe, my lord Fabius, me thinkes my best waye were rather to fall vpon the enemies pikes, then once againe to light into the hands & voyces of our citizens. Therefore, sith the estate of the common wealthe so requirith it, that it behoueth a man to doe as you haue sayed: I will doe my best endeavour to thewe my selfe a wise capitaine, for your sake only, rather then for all other, that should aduise me to the contrary. And so Paulus departed from ROMES with this minde. But Terentius his companion would in any case, they should commaund the whole armie by turnes, eche his daye by him selfe: and went to encampe harde by Hannibal, by the riuer of Aufide, neere vnto the village called CANNES. Nowe when it came to his daye to commaund by turnes, early in the morning he caused the signall of battell to be set out, which was a coate armour of skarlet in graine, that they dyd laye out vpon the pavilion of the generall: so that the enemies at the first sight, beganne to be afearde, to see the lustines of this newe come generall, and the great number of souldiers he had also in his hoste, in comparison of them that were not halfe so many. Yet Hannibal of a good corage, commaunded euery man to arme, and to put them selues in order of battell: and him selfe in the meane time taking his horse backe, followed with a fewe, gallopped vnto the toppes of a litle hill not very steepe, from whence he might plainly discerne all the ROMAINES campe, and sawe howe they dyd range their men in order of battell. Nowe one Giscon (a man of like state and nobilitie as him selfe) being with him at that time, tolde him, that the enemies seemed a farre off to be a maruelous number. But Hannibal rubbing his forehead, answered him. Yea, sayed he, but there is another thing more to be wondered at then you thinke of Giscon. Giscon straight asked him: What? may I saye he this: that of all the great number of souldiers you see yonder, there is not a man of them called Giscon as you are. This mery answer deliuered contrarie to their expectation that were with him, looking for some great waightie matter, made them all laughe a good. So downe the hill they came laughing alowde, and tolde this prety iest to all they met as they rode, which straight from one to another ranne ouer all the campe, in so much as Hannibal him selfe could not holde from laughing. The CARTHAGINIAN souldiers perceyuing this, beganne to be of a good corage, imagining that their generall would not be so merylie disposed as to fall a laughing, being so neere daunger, if he had not perceyued him selfe a great deale to be the stronger, and that he had good cause also to make no reckoning of his enemies. Furthermore, he shewed two policies of a skilfull capitaine in the battell. The first was, the situation of the place, where he put his men in order of battell, so as they had the winde on their backes: which raging like a burning lightning, raised a sharpe dust out of the

A the open sandy valley, and passing ouer the CARTHAGINIANS squadron, blew full in the ROMAINES faces, with such a violence, that they were compelled to turne their faces, & to trouble their owne ranks. The seconde policie was, the forme and order of his battell. For he placed on either side of his wings, the best and valliantest souldiers he had in all his armie: and dyd fill vp the middelt of his battell with the worst of his men, which he made like a pointe, and was farder out by a great deale, then the two wings of the fronte of his battell. So he commaunded those of the wings, that when the ROMAINES had broken his first fronte, and followed those that gaue backe, whereby the middelt of his battell should leaue an hollow place, and the enemies should come in still increasing within the compasse of the two wings: that then they should set vpon them on both sides, and charge their flanks immediately, and so inclose them in behind. And this was cause of a greater slaughter. For when the middle battell beganne to geue backe, and to receyue the ROMAINES within it, who pursued the other very wholy, Hannibal's battell chaunged her forme: & where at the beginning it was like a pointe, it became nowe in the middelt like a creffant or halfe moone. Then the captaines of the chosen bandes that laye out in both the wings, made their men to turne, some on the left hand, and some on the right, and charged the ROMAINES on the flanks, and behinde, where they were all naked: so they killed all those that could not saue them selues by flying, before they were enuironned. They saye also, that there fell out another mischiefe by misfortune, vnto the horsemen of the ROMAINES, and by this occasion. The horse of Paulus Æmilius the Consul being hurte, dyd throwe his master on the ground: whereupon those that were next him, dyd light from their horse backs to helpe him. The residue of the horsemen that were a great waye behinde him, seeing them light, thought they had bene all commaunded to light: hereupon euery man forsooke their horse, and fought it out a foote. Hannibal when he sawe that, sayed: yea marie, I had rather haue them so, then deliuered me bounde hande and foote. But for those matters, the historiographers doe dilate more at large. Furthermore, of the two CONSULS, Varro saued him selfe by his horse, with a fewe following him, within the cittie of Venusia. Paulus being in the middelt of the throng of all the armie, his bodie full of arrowes that stucke fast in his woundes, and his harte fore loden with greivous sorowe and anguisher to see the ouerthrowe of his men: was set downe by a rocke, looking for some of his enemies, to come and ryd him out of his payne. But fewe could knowe him, his head and face was of such a gore bloude: in so much as his friends and seruants also passed by him, and knewe him not. And there was but one young gentleman of a noble house of the Patricians, called Cornelius Lentulus, that knewe him, who dyd his best endeavour to saue him. For he lighted a foote presently, & brought him his horse, praying him to get vp vpon him, to proue if he could saue him selfe for the necessitie of his countrie, which nowe more then euer had neede of a good and wise capitaine. But he refused the gentlemen offer and his intreatie, and compelled him to take his horse backe againe, though the teares ranne downe his chekes for pittie: and raising him selfe vp to take him by the hande, he sayed vnto him. I pray you tell Fabius Maximus from me, and witnesse with me, that Paulus Æmilius euery in his last hower hath followed his counsaill, and dyd neuer swarue from the promise he made him: but that first he was forced to it by Varro, and afterwards by Hannibal. When he had deliuered these wordes, he bad Lentulus farewell: and running againe into the furie of the slaughter, there he dyed among his slaine companions. It is thought there were slaine at this battell, fiftie thousand ROMAINES, & foure thousand taken prisoners: and other tenne thousand that were taken prisoners in two camps after the battell. VVhen this noble victorie was gotten, Hannibal's friendes gaue him counsaill to followe his good fortune: and to enter ROMES after the scattered number that fled thither: so as within fewe dayes following he might suppe in their capitoll. A man cannot easily geffe what was the cause that stayed him, that he went not, vnles it was (as I thinke) some good fortune, or favorable God toward the ROMAINES that withtoode him, and made him afearde and glad to retire. Whereupon they saye, that one Barca a CARTHAGINIAN, in F his anger sayed to Hannibal: Syr, you haue the waye to ouercome, but you cannot vs victorie. Notwithstanding, this victorie made a maruelous chaunge for him. For hereupon, all ITALY in manner came in to submit them selues to him: where before he had no towne at cōmaudemēt, nor any storehouse or porte through all ITALIE, yea he did maruelous hardly, & with much a doe vittell his armie with that he could daylie robbe & spoyle, hauing no certē place to retire vnto, nor ground hope to entertaine these warres, but kept the field with his armie, remouing from place to place, as they had bene a great number of murderers & theues together. For the most parte of the cōūtrie, dyd yeld immediatly vnto him: as the cittie of CAPVA, being the chiefe & greatest cittie of all ITALIE but ROME, and dyd receyue Hannibal, and were at his deuotion. Thus we may plainly see, that as the poet Enripides sayeth: it is a great mischief not onely to be driuen to make triall of friendes, but prooue also of captaines wisdom. For that which before they accompted cowardlines and fainte harte in Fabius, immediatly after the battell, they thought it more then mans reason, & rather a heauenly wisdom and influence, that so long forefaue the things to come, which the parties felues that afterwards felt them, gaue little credit vnto before. Vpon this occasion, ROME reposed continually all their hope and truste in Fabius, and they repaired to him for couisell, as they would haue ronne vnto some temple or altar for sanctuarie. So as the first & chiefe cause of staying the people together from dispersing them selues abroad, as they dyd when ROME was taken by the GAULES: was the only opinion & confidence they had in Fabius wisdom. For where before he seemed to be a coward, and timorous, when there was no daunger nor misfortune happened: then when euery man wept and cried out for sorowe, which could not helpe, and that all the world was so troubled that there was no order taken for any thing, he contrarily went alone vp and downe the cittie very modestly, with a bold constant countenance, speaking curteously to euery one, and dyd appease their womanlike cries and lamentations, and dyd forbid the common assemblies & fonde ceremonies, of lamenting the dead corse at their burials. Then he perswaded the Senate to assemble in counsell, and dyd comforte vp those that were magistrates, and he alone was the only force and power of the cittie: for there was not a man that bare any office, but dyd cast his eye vpon Fabius, to knowe what he should doe. He it was that caused the gates of the cittie straight to be warded, and to keepe those in for going their waye, that would haue forsaken the cittie. He moreover dyd appointe the time and place of mourning, & dyd commaund whosoever was disposed to mourne, that he should doe it priuately in his owne house, and to continue only but thirtie dayes. Then he willed all mourning to be left off, and that the cittie might be cleane from such vnclane things. So the feast of Ceres falling about that time, he thought it better to leaue of the sacrifices & procession they were wont to keepe on Ceres daye: then by their small number that were left, and sorowe of those that remained, to let their enemies vnderstand their exceeding great losse. For the goddes delite to be serued with glad and reioycing hartes, and with those that are in prosperitie. But all this notwithstanding, whatsoever the priestes would haue done, either to pacifie the wrath of the goddes, or to turne awaye the threatnings of these sinister signes, it was forthwith done. For they dyd sende to the oracle of Apollo, in the cittie of DELPHES, one of Fabius kinsmen surnamed Priator. And two of the Vestal Nunnes being delioured: the one was buried aliue according to the lawe and custome, and the other made her self awaye. But here in the great corage and noble clemency of the ROMAINES, is maruelously to be noted and regarded. For the Consul Terentius Varro returning backe to ROME, with the shame of his extreme misfortune & ouerthrowe, that he durste not looke vpon any man: the Senate notwithstanding, and all the people following them, went to the gates of the cittie to meete him, and dyd honorably receyue him. Nay furthermore, those that were the chief magistrates and Senators, among whom Fabius was one, when silence was made, they commended Varro much: because he did not despaire of the preseruacion of the common weale after to great a calamitie, but dyd returne againe to the cittie, to helpe to reduce things to order, in vying the authoritie of the lawe, and the seruice of the citizens, as not being altogether vnder foote, but standing yet in reasonable termes of good recovery. But when they vnderstoode that Hannibal after the battell was gone into other partes of ITALIE: then they beganne to be of good chere againe, and sent a newe armie and generalles to the field, among which, the two chief generals were, Fabius Maximus, and Claudius Marcellus, both which by contrary meanes in manner, wanne a like glorie and reputation. For Marcellus (as we haue declared in his life) was a man Fabius order for mourning.

The magnanimity of the Romanes after the ouerthrowe at Cannae.

Fabius Maximus, and Claudius Marcellus generalls.

A of speedy execution, of a quicke hande, of a valliant nature, and a right martiall man, as Homer calleth them, that valliantly put them selues in any daunger: by reason whereof, hauing to deale with another captaine a like venturous and valliant as him selfe, in all seruice and execution, he shewed the selfe boldnes and corage that Hannibal dyd. But Fabius persisting still vpon his first determination, dyd hope that though he dyd not fight with Hannibal, nor stirre him at all, yet continuall warres would consume him and his armie in the end, and bring them both to nought: as a commō wrestler that forceth his bodie aboue his naturall strength, doth in the ende become a lame and broofed man. Hereupon Possidonius writeth, that the one was called the ROMAINES sword, and the other their target. And that Fabius constancie and resolute in warres to fight with securitie, and to commit nothing to hazard & daunger, being mingled with Marcellus heate and furie: was that only, which preserued the ROMAINES empire. For Hannibal meeting allwayes in his waye the one that was furious, as a strong running streame, founde that his army was continually turmoyled and ouerharried: & the other that was slowe as a litle prety riuer, he founde that his army ranne softly vnder him without any noyse, but yet continually by litle and litle it dyd still consume & diminish him, vntill he sawe him selfe at the last brought to that passe, that he was weary with fighting with Marcellus, and affrayed of Fabius because he fought not. For during all the time of these warres, he had euer these two captaines almost against him, which were made either Prætors, Consuls, or Proconsuls: for either of them both had bene fūe times before chosen Consul. Yet as for Marcellus, Hannibal had layed an ambushe for him in the fift and last yere of his Consulshippe, where he set vpon him on a fodaine; and slue him. But as for Fabius, he layed many baytes for him, and dyd what he could by all the skill and reache he had, by ambushes, and other warlike policies to entrappe him: but he could neuer drawe him within his daunger. Howbeit at one time he put him to a litle trouble, and was in good hope then to haue made him falle vpon his ambushe he had layed for him: and by this policie. He had counterfeited letters written and sent vnto him from the cittie of METAPONT, to praye him to come to them, and they would deliuer their cittie into his handes: and withall, that such as were priuie to the contentes of the same, desired no other thing but his repaire thither. These letters prettily quickned Fabius, inso much as he was determined one night to haue taken parte of his armie, & to haue gone to them. But because the signes of the birdes dyd promise him no good successe, he left of his purpose. Some after he vnderstoode they were counterfeate letters, made by Hannibals fine deuise to haue drawn him out, & to haue intrapped him, for whom him selfe laye in persone in ambushe neere the cittie, looking and waiting for his comming: but the goddes who would haue him faued, were only to be thanked for his happy scape. Furthermore, concerning the reuolte of the citties that were subiect vnto them, and the rising of their allies & friends against them: Fabius thought it farre better to intreate them curteously, making them ashamed without occasion to rebell against them, rather then openly to suspect them, and to deale straightly with those that were so to be suspected. Now for this matter, it is reported that Fabius had a souldier in his campe that was a MARSIAN borne by nation, a valliant man of his persone, & also of as noble a house, as any that were of all the allies of the ROMAINES: who had practised with other his fellowes of the bande he serued in, to goe to see the enemy. Fabius hearing of this practise he went about, gaue him no ill countenance for it, but calling him to him, he sayed, I must confesse there is no reckoning made of you as your good seruice doth deserue: wherefore for this time (sayeth he) I blame the petty captaines only, which in such sorte doe bestowe their good will and fauour at adventure, and not by desert. But henceforth it shalbe your owne faulte if you doe not declare your minde vnto me, and betweene you and me make me priuie of your lacke & necessitie. When he had spoken these wordes to him, he gaue him a very good horse for seruice, and dyd reward him with other honorable giftes, as men of good seruice & desert haue commonly bestowed on them: and this dyd to encourage the souldier thenceforth, that he became a very faithfull and seruicable souldier to the ROMAINES. For Fabius thought it more fit, that hunters, riders of horses, & such like as take vpon them to tame brute beastes, should sooner make them leaue their sauage & churlishe nature, by gentle vsage and manning of them: then by beating, and shacking of them. And so a gouernour of men, should rather correct his souldier by pacience, A gentlenes, and clemency: then by rigour, violence, or feueritie. Otherwise he should handle them more rudely, and sharply, then husbandmen doe figge trees, oliue trees, & wilde pomegarnets: who by diligent pruning and good handling of them, doe alter their harde and wilde nature, & cause them in the end to bring forth good figges, oliues & pomegarnets. Another time certaine captaines of his brought him word, that there was one of their souldiers which would euer goe out of the cape, & leaue his ensigne. He asked them, what manner of man he was. They answered him all together, that he was a very good souldier, and that they could hardly finde our suche another, in all their bandes as he: and therewithall they tolde him, of some notable seruice they had seene him doe in person. Whereupon Fabius made a diligent enquierie to know what the cause was, that made him goe fo off out of the campe in the end, B he founde he was in loue with a young woman, and that to goe see her, was the cause he dyd fo ofte leaue his ensigne, and dyd put his life in so great danger, for that she was so farre of.

When Fabius vnderstoode this, he sent certaine souldiers (vnknowing to the souldier) to bring the woman awaye he loued, and willed them to hyde her in his tente: and then called he the souldier to him, that was a LVCANIAN borne, and taking him a side, sayed vnto him thus. My friend, it hath bene tolde me, how thou hast lyen many nightes out of the campe, against the lawe of armes, and order of the ROMAINES, but therewithall I vnderstande also that otherwise thou art an honest man, and therefore I pardon thee thy faultes past, in consideration of thy good seruice: but from henceforth I will geue thee in custodie to such a one, as shall make me account of thee. The souldier was blanke, when he heard these wordes. Fabius with him, C caused the woman he was in loue with, to be brought forth, and deliuered her into his hands, sayng vnto him. This woman hereafter shall aunswere me thy bodie to be forth comming in the campe amongst vs: and from henceforth thy deedes shall winnesse for the reste, that thy loue vnto this woman, maye be no cloke of thy departing out of the campe for any wicked practise or intent. Thus much we finde written concerning this matter. Moreover, Fabius after suche a sorte, recouered againe the cittie of TARENTVM, and brought it to the obedience of the ROMAINES, which they had lost by treason. It fortuned there was a young man in his campe, a TARENTINE borne, that had a sister within TARENTVM, which was very faithfull to him, and loued him maruelous dearely: now there was a captaine, a BRVTIAN borne, that fell in loue with her, and was one of those to whom Hannibal had committed the charge of the cittie of TARENTVM. This gaue the young souldier the TARENTINE, very good hope, and waye, to bring his enterpryse to good effect: whereupon he reuealed his intent to Fabius, and with his priuie fled from his campe, and got into the cittie of TARENTVM, geuing it out in the cittie, that he would altogether dwell with his sister. Now for a fewe dayes at his first com-ming, the BRVTIAN captaine laye alone by him selfe, at the request of the mayde his sister, who thought her brother had not knownen of her loue: and shortly after the young fellowe tooke his sister aside, and sayed vnto her. My good sister, there was a great speache in the RO-MAINES campe, that thou wert kept by one of the chiefeft captaines of the garrison: I praye thee if it be so, let me knowe what he is. For so he be a good fellowe, and an honest man (as they saye he is) I care not: for warres that turneth all things topsy turuey, regardeth not of E what place or calling he is of, and still maketh vertue of necessitie, without respect of shame.
And it is a speciall good fortune, at such time as neither right nor reason rules, to happen yet into the handes of a good and gracious lorde. His sister hearing him speake these wordes, sent for the BRVTIAN captaine to bring him acquainted with her brother, who liked well of both their loues, and indeioured him self to frame his sisters loue in better sorte towards him, then it was before: by reason whereof, the captaine also beganne to trust him very muche. So this young TARENTINE sawe it was very easie, to winne and turne the minde of this amarus and mercenary man, with hope of great giftes that were promised him, and Fabius should per-forme. Thus doe the most parte of writers set downe this storie. Howbeit some writers saye, that this woman who wanne the BRVTIAN captaine, was not a TARENTINE, but a BRVTIAN F borne, whom Fabius it is sayed, kept afterwards for his concubine: and that the vnderstanding the captaine of the BRVTIANS (who laye in garrison within the cittie of TARENTVM) was also

A also a BRVTIAN borne, and of her owne natie countrie: made Fabius priuie to her intent, and with his consent, the comming to the walles of the cittie, spake with this BRVTIAN captaine, whom he handled in such sorte, that he wanne him. But whilst this geare was a doing, ing, Fabius, bicause he would traine Hannibal out of those quarters, wrote vnto the souldiers of RHEGIO: which belonged to the ROMAINES, that they should enter the borders of the BRVTIANS, and laye seige to the cittie of CAVONIA, and raise it to the grounde. These RHEGIAN souldiers were about the number of eight thousand, and the most of them traitours, and ronnegates, from one campe to another: and the worst sorte of them, and most defamed of life, were those that Marcellus brought thither out of SICILIE, so that in losing them all, the losse were nothing to the common weale, and the sorowe muche lesse. So Fabius thought, that putting these fellows out for a praye to Hannibal (as a tale to drawe him from thole quarters) he should plucke him by this meanes from TARENTVM: and so it came, to passe. For Hannibal incontinently went thence with his armie to intrappe them: and in the meane time Fabius wet to laye seige to TARENTVM, where he had not lien six dayes before it, but the young man (who together with his sister had drawn the BRVTIAN captaine to this treason) stole out one night to Fabius, to enforme him of all, hauing taken very good markes of that side of the walles the BRVTIAN captaine had taken charge of, who had promised him to keepe it secret, & to suffer them to enter, that came to assault that side. Yet Fabius would not grounde his hope altogether vpon the BRVTIANS executing this treason, but went him self in person to vewe the place appointed, howbeit without attempting any thing for that time: C and in the meane season, he gaue a generall assault to all partes of the cittie (as well by sea as by lande) with great shoutes & cries. Then the BRVTIAN captaine seeing all the citizens and garrison runne to that parte, where they perceyued the noyse to be greatest: made a signall vnto Fabius, that now was the time. Who then caused scaling ladders to be brought a pace, whereupon him selfe with his companie scaled the walles, and so wanne the cittie. But it ap-peareth here, that ambition overcame him. For first he commaunded they should kill all the BRVTIANS, bicause it should not be knowne he had wonne the cittie by treason. But this bloudie policie failed him: for he missed not only of the glorie he looked for, but most deferuently he had the reproche of crueltye and falsehood. At the taking of this cittie, a maruelous number of the TARENTINES were slaine, besides there were solde thirtie thousand of the D chiefeft of them, & all the cittie was sacked: and of the spoyle thereof was caried to the common store treasure at ROME, three thousand talents. It is reported also, that when they dyd spoyle and carie awaye all other spoyles lesse behinde, the recorder of the cittie asked Fabius, what his pleasure was to doe with the goddesses, meaning the tables, and their images: and to that Fabius aunswered him. Let vs leaue the TARENTINES their goddesses that be angrie with them. This notwithstanding, he caried from thence Hercules statue, that was of a monstrous bignes, and caused it to be set vp in the Capitoll, and withall dyd set vp his owne image in brasse a horse backe by him. But in that act he shewed him self farre harder harted, then Marcellus had done, or to saye more truly, thereby he made the world, knowe how muche Marcellus cursefite, clemencie, and bowntie was to be wondered at: as we haue written in his life.
E Newes being brought to Hannibal, that TARENTVM was besieged, he marched presently with all speede possible to raise the seige: and they saye he had almost come in time, for he was with in 40. furlonges of the cittie when he vnderstoode the trothe of the taking of it. Then sayed he out aloud, sure the ROMAINES haue their Hannibal to: for as we wanne TARENTVM, so haue we lost it. But after that, to his friends he sayed priuately (and that was the first time they euer heard him speake it) that he sawe long before, and now appeared plainely, that they could not possibily with this small power keepe ITALIE. Fabius made his triumphe and entrie into Rome the seconde time, by reason of taking of this cittie: and his seconde triumphe was muche more honorable then the first, as of a valliant captaine that held out still with Hannibal, and easely met with all his fine policies, muche like the slight trickes of a cunning F wrestler, which caried not now the former roughenes and strength any more, bicause that his armie was geuen to take their ease, and growen to delicacie, partly through the great riches they had gotten, and partly also for that it was sore watted and diminished, through the sundrie foughten battells and blowes they had bene at. Now there was one Martius Linius a ROMANE, that was gouernour of TARENTVM at that time, when Hannibal tooke it, and neuertheles kept the castell still out of Hannibals handes, and so held it vntill the citie came againe into the handes of the ROMAINES. This Linius spighted to see suche honour done to Fabius, so that one daye in open Senate, being drowned with enuie and ambition, he burst out and sayed: that it was him selfe, not Fabius, that was cause of taking of the citie of TARENTVM againe. Fabius smiling to heare him, aunswered him openly: in deede thou sayest true, for if thou haddest not lost it, I had neuer wonne it againe. But the ROMAINES in all other respects dyd greatly honour Fabius, and specially for that they chose his sonne Consul. He hauing alreadye taken possession of his office, as he was dispatching certen causes touching the warres, his father (whether it was for debilitie of his age, or to pteue his sonne) tooke his horse to come to him, and rode through the preafe of people that thronged about him, hauing busines with him. But his sonne seeing him comming a farre off, would not suffer it, but sent an officer of his vnto him, to commaund him to light of his horse, and to come a foote if he had any thing to doe with the Consul. This commaundement misliked the people that heard it, and they all looked vpon Fabius, but sayed not a worde: thinking with them selues, that the Consul dyd great wronge to his fathers greames. So he lighted straight, and went a good rounde pace to embrace his sonne, and sayed vnto him. You haue reason sonne, and doe well to shewe ouer whom you commaund, vnderstanding the authoritie of a Consul, which place you haue receiued. For it is the direct course, by the which we and our auncesters haue increased the ROMANE empire: preferring euer the honour and state of our countrie, aboue father, mother, or children. And truly they saye, that Fabius great grandfather being the greatest and most noble persone of ROMANE in his time, hauing fye times bene Consul, and had obtained many triumphes, for diuers honorable and sundrie victories he had wonne: was contented after all these, to be his sonnes lieutenant, and to goe to the warres with him, he being chosen Consul. And last of all, the Consul his sonne returning home to ROMANE a conquerour, in his triumphing charret drawn with foure horses, he followed him a horse backe also, in troupe with the rest: thinking it honour to him, that hauing authoritie ouer his sonne in the right of a father, and being also the noblest man of all the cittizens, so taken and reputed, neuertheles he willingly submitted him selfe to the lawe and magistrature, who had authoritie of him. Yet besides all this, he had farre more excellent vertues to be had in admiration, then those already spoken of. But it fortuned that this sonne of Fabius died before him, whose death he tooke paciely, like a wise man, and a good father. Now the custome being at that time, that at the death of a noble man, their neereft kinsfman should make a funerall oration in their praye at their obsequies: he him selfe made the same oration in honour of his sonne, and dyd openly speake it in the market place, and moreover wrote it, and deliuered it out abroade. About this time, Cornelius Scipio was sent into SPAYNE, who draue out the CARTHAGINIANS from thence, after he had ouerthrowen them in many battells, and had conquered many great cities, and greatly aduanced the honour and estimation of the state of ROMANE: for the which at his returne, he was as muche, or rather more honoured, beloued and esteemed, then any other that was in the citie of ROMANE. Hereupon Scipio being made Consul, considered that the people of ROMANE looked for some great matter at his handes, aboue all other. Therefore he thought, to take vpon him to fight against Hannibal in ITALIE, he should but followe the olde manner, and treade to muche in the steppes of the olde man: whereupon he resoluely immediately to make warres in AFRICKE, and to burne and destroye the countrie euen vnto CARTHAGE gates, and so to transerre the warres out of ITALIE into LIBYA, procuring by all possible deuise he could, to put it into the peoples heades, and to make them like of it. But Fabius contrarily, perswading him selfe that the enterprise this young rashe youthe tooke in hande, was vterly to ouerthrowe the common weale, or to put the state of ROMANE in great danger: deuised to put ROMANE in the greatest feare he could possible, without sparing speache or dede he thought might serue for his purpose, to make the people change from that minde. Now he Fabius winneth answere.

A strange commaundment of the sonne to the father.

The father obeyeth his sonnes authoritie & commendeth him.

Scipio Consul.

Fabius was against the counsell and deuise of Scipio African.

A he could so cunningly worke his purpose, what with speaking and doing, that he had drawn all the Senate to his opinion. But the people iudged, it was the secret enuie he bare to Scipioes glorie, that drue him to encounter this deuise, only to bleamish Scipioes noble fortune, fearing, least if he should happen to doe some honorable seruice (as to make an end altogether of this warre, or otherwise to draw Hannibal out of ITALIE) that then it would appeare to the world, he had bene to soft, or to negligent, to drawe this warre out to suche a length. For my parte, me thinks the only matter that moued Fabius from the beginning to be against Scipio, was the great care he had of the safetie of the comon weale, by reason of the great dainger depending vpon such a resolution. And yet I doe thinke also, that afterwards he went further then he should, contending to fore against him (whether it was through ambition or obstinacie) seeking to hinder and suppress the greatnes of Scipio: considering also he dyd his best to persuaade Craffus, Scipioes companion in the Consulshippe, that he should not graunte vnto him the leading of the armie, but if he thought good to goe into AFRICKE, to make warres vpon the CARTHAGINIANS, that he should rather goe him selfe. And moreover, he was the let that they gaue him no money for maintenance of these warres. Scipio hereupon being turned ouer to his owne credit, to furnish him selfe as he could: he leauied great summes of money in the cities of TVSCAN, who for the great loue they bare him, made contribution towards his iorney. And Craffus remained at home, both because he was a soft, and no ambitious, nor contentious man of nature: as also, because he was the chiefeft Prelate and highe bishoppe, who by the lawe of their religion, was constrained to kepe ROMANE. Fabius seeing his labour lost that waye, tooke againe another course to crosse Scipio, deuising to slaye the young men at home, that had great desire to goe this iorney with him. For he cried out with open mouth, in all assemblies of the Senate & people, that Scipio was not contented only to slay Hannibal, but that he would carie with him besides the whole force of ITALIE that remained: alluring the youthe with sweete baytes of vaine hope, and perswading them to leaue their wiues, their fathers, mothers, and their countrie, euen now when their enemye knocked at ROMANE gates, who dyd euer conquer, and was yet neuer conquered. These wordes of Fabius dyd so dampe the ROMAINES, that they appointed Scipio should furnish his iorney only with the armie that was in SICILIA, sauing that he might supply to them if he would, three hundred of the best souldiers that had serued him faithfully in SPAYNE. And so it doth appeare euen to this D present, that Fabius both dyd and sayed all things, according to his wonted manner, and naturall disposition. Now Scipio was no sooner arrived in AFRICKE, but newes were brought to ROMANE incontinently, of wonderfull exploitres, and noble seruice done beyond measure: and of great spoyle taken by him, which argued the trothe of the newes. As, the king of the NV-MIDIANS taken prisoner, two camps of the enemies burnt & destroyed at a time, with losse of a great number of people, armour, and horses, that were consumed in the fame: letters and postes for life running in the necke one of another from CARTHAGE to call Hannibal home, and to praye him to hunte no longer after vayne hope that would neuer haue ende, halting him selfe with all speede possible to come to the rescue of his countrie. These wonderfull great fortunes of Scipio, made him of suche renowme and fame within ROMANE, that there was E no talke but of Scipio. Fabius notwithstanding desisted not to make a newe request, being of opinion they should send him a succellour, alledging no other cause nor reason, but a common speache of euery bodie: that it was a dangerous thing to commit to the fortune of one man alone, so great exceeding prosperitie and good successe, because it is a rare matter to see one man happie in all things. These wordes dyd so muche mislike the people, that they thought him an eniuous troublesome man, or els they thought his age had made him fearefull: and that his corage failed with his strength, fearing Hannibal more doubtfully then he needed. For now though Hannibal was forced to leaue ITALIE, and to returne into AFRICKE, yet Fabius would not graunte, that the peoples ioye and securitie they thought they were in, was altogether cleare, and without feare and mistruste: but gaue it out that then F they were in greatest daunger, and that the common weale was breeding more mischief now, then before. For when Hannibal (sayed he) shall returne home into AFRICKE, and come before CARTHAGE walles, the ROMAINES shall be lesse able to abide him there, then they haue bene before: and Scipio moreover, shall meete with an armie yet warme; and embrued with the bloude of so many Prætors, Dictators, and Consuls of ROME, which they haue ouercome, and put to the sword in ITALIE. With these vncomfortable speeches, he still troubled & disquieted the whole citie, perswading them that notwithstanding the warre was transferred out of ITALIE into AFRICKE, yet that the occasion of feare was no lesse neere vnto ROME, then it was euer before. But within shorte space after, Scipio hauing ouercome Hannibal in plaine battell in the field, and troden vnder foote the glory and pryde of CARTHAGE, he brought a greater ioye to ROME, then they euer looked for: and by this noble victorie of his, he shored vp again the declining state of the empire of ROME, which a litle before was falling downe right. Howbeit Fabius liued not to the ende of this warre, nor euer heard while he liued the ioyfull newes of Hannibals happy ouerthrowe, neither were his yeres prolonged to see the happy assured prosperitie of his countrie: for about that time that Hannibal departed out of ITALIE, a sickness tooke him, whereof he dyed. The stories declare, that the THEBANS buried Epaminondas, at the common charges of the people: because he dyed in so great pouertie, that when he was dead, they founde nothing in the houle but a litle iron spit. Now the ROMAINES buried not Fabius so, at the common charge of the citie, but every man of beneuolence gaue towards his funerall charges, a peece of coyne that caried the least value of their currant money: not for that he lacked abilitie to bring him to the grounde, but only to honour his memorie: in making his obsequies at their charges, as of one that had bene their common father. So had his vertuous life, an honorable ende and buriall.

Pericles with Fabius.

HERE haue you heard what is written, of thesetwo great perſones. C And forasmuche as they haue both left behinde them, many noble examples of vertue, aswell in martiall matters, as in ciuill gouernmēt, let vs beginne to compare them together. First of all, Pericles began to gouerne the common weale at what time the people of ATHENS were in their chiefest prosperitie, and of greater power and wealth, then euer they had bene of before or since. The which might seeme to be a cause of the continuall maintenance of the same in securitie without danger of falling, not so muche for their worthines, as for their common power and felicitie: where contrariwise Fabius acts fell out in the most dishonorable & vnfortunate time, that euer happened to his countrie, in the which he dyd not only keepe the citie in good state from declining, but raised it vp, and deliuered it from calamitie, and brought it to be better then he found it. Furthermore, *Cimon*s great good fortune and successe, the victories and triumphes of Myronides, and of Leocrates, and many notable valliant dedes

A dedes of armes of Tolmides, gaue good cause to Pericles, to entertaine his citie in feastes, and playes, whilst he dyd gouerne the same: and he dyd not finde it in such ill case and distresse, that he was driuen to defend it by force of armes, or to cōquer that againe which he had lost. But Fabius in contrary manner, when he sawe before him many ouerthrowes, great flying away, muche murder, great slaughters of the generales of the ROMAINE armies, the lakes, the playnes, the woddies filled with scattered men, the people ouercome, the floods and riuers running all a gore bloude (by reason of the great slaughter) and the streame carying downe the dead bodies to the mayne sea: dyd take in hande the gouernment of his countrie, and a course farre contrarie to all other: so as he dyd vnderproppre and shored vp the same, that he kept it from flat falling to the grounde, amongst those ruines and ouerthrowes other had brought it to, before him. Yet a man maye saye also, that it is no great matter of difficultie to rule a citie already brought lowe by aduersitie, and which compelled by necessitie, is contented to be gouerned by a wise man: as it is to bridle and keepe vnder the infolencie of a people, puffed vp with pryde, and presumption of long prosperitie, as Pericles founde it amongst the ATHENIANS. The great multitude also of so many greivous calamities, as lighted on the ROMAINES neckes at that time, dyd playnely thewe Fabius to be a graue and a constant man, which would neuer geue waye vnto the importunate cries of the common people, nor could euer be remoued from that he had at the first determined. The winning & recouering againe of TARENTVM, maye well be compared to the taking of SAMOS, which Pericles wanne by force: and the cities of CAMPANIA, vnto the Ile of EUBOEAE: excepting the citie of CAPUA, C which the Consuls Fulvius and Appius recouered againe. But it seemeth that Fabius neuer wanne battell, saue that only for which he triumphed the first time: where Pericles set vp nine triumphes, of battells and victories he had wonne, aswell by sea as by lande. And so also, they cannot alledge such an acte done by Pericles, as Fabius dyd, when he refused Mimnius out of the handes of Hannibal, and saued a whole armie of the ROMAINES: which doubtles was a famous acte, and proceeded of a noble minde, great wisdomme, and an honorable harte. But Pericles, againe dyd neuer commit so grosse an error as Fabius dyd when he, was outreached, & deceyued by Hannibals fine stratageme of his oxen: who hauing founde his enemy by chauce to haue shut him selfe vp in the straight of a vallye, dyd suffer him to escape in the night by a subtiltie, & in the daye by playne force. For he was preuented by ouermuch delaye, D and fought withall by him he kept inclosed. Now if it be requisite, a good captaine doe not only vie well that he hath in his handes, but that he wisely iudge also what will followe after, then the warres of the ATHENIANS fell out in suche sorte, as Pericles sayed they would come to passe: for with ambition to imbrace to muche, they ouerthrew their estate. But the ROMAINES contrariwise, hauing sent Scipio into AFRICKE to make warres with the CARTHAGINIANS, wanne all that they tooke in hande: where their generall dyd not ouercome the enemy by fortune, but by valliantnes. So that the wisdomme of the one is witnessed, by the ruine of his countrie: and the error of the other testified, by the happy euent of that he would haue let. Now the faulte is a like in a generall, to fall into danger, for lacke of foresaie: as for cowardlines to let slippe a fit oportunitie offered, to doe any notable peece of seruice. For like E defaulte and lacke of experience, maketh the one to hardie, and the other to fearefull. And thus muche touching the warres. Now for ciuill gouernment: it was a fowle blotte to Pericles, to be the author of warres. For it is thought, that he alone was the cause of the same, for that he would not haue them yeld to the LACEDÆMONIANS in any respect. And yet methinks Fabius Maximus also would no more geue place vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, but stood firme & bold in all daūger, to mainteine thempire of his countrie against them. But the goodnes & clemency Fabius shewed vnto Mimnius, doth much condēne Pericles accusations & practises, against Cimon and Thucydides: bothe of them being noble & good men, & taking parte with the Nobilitie, who he expelled out of ATHENS, & banished for a time. So was Pericles power & authoritie in the cōmon weale greater: by reason whereof he dyd euer foreseee, F that no generall in all histime dyd rashely attempt any thing hurtfull vnto the cōmon weale, except Tolmides onely: who fled from him, & in despiight of him went to fight with the BOSOTIANS where he was slaine. As for all other generals, they wholly put the selues into his hāds, &

dyd obey him for the greatnes of his authoritie. But Fabius, although for his parte he neuer committed any faulte, and that he went orderly to worke in all gouernment: yet bicaufe he was not of power to keepe other from doing ill, it seemeth in this respect he was defective. For if Fabius had caried like authoritie in Rome, as Pericles dyd in Athens: the ROMAINES had not fallen into so great miserie as they dyd. And for liberalitie: the one shewed it, in refusing the money offred him: and the other, in geuing vnto those that needed, and redeeming his poore captiue contry men. And yet Fabius might dispend no great reuenue: for his whole receiptes came only to fixe talents. But for Pericles, it is hard to saye howe riche he was, who had comming in to him, great presents by his authoritie, as wel of the subiects, as of the friends and allies of the ATHENIANS, as also of Kings and straunge Princes: yet he neuer tooke bribe for all that, of any persone liuing. And to conclude, as for the sumptuous building of temples, & the stately workes and common buildings: put all the ornaments together that euer were in Rome, before the times of the Cæsars, they are not to be compared with those, wherewith Pericles dyd beawtifie & adorne the citie of Athens. For neither in qualitie nor quantitie was there any proportion or like comparison, betweene the exceeding sumptuousnes of the one, and of the other.

The ende of Fabius Maximus life.

THE LIFE OF Alcibiades.

*Alcibiades
flouke.*

mourne.*

ALCIBIADES by his fathers side, was aunciently descended of Euryaces, that was the sonne of Ajax, and by his mothers side, of Alcmaon: for his mother Dinomacha, was the daughter of Megacles. His father Clinias hauing armed, and set forth a gallye, at his owne proper costes and charges, dyd winne great honour in the battell by sea, that was fought alongest the coaste of ARTEMISIVM, and he was slaine afterwards in another battell fought at CORONEA, against the BOTIANS. His sonne Alcibiades tutors, were Pericles, and Aristophan Xanthippus sonnes: who were also his neere kinsmen. They saye, and truly: that Socrates good will and friendship dyd greatly further Alcibiades honour. For it

As it appeareth not, neither was it euer written, what were the names of the mothers of Nicias, of Demosthenes, of Lamachus, of Phormion, of Thrasibulus, & of Themamenes: all which were notable famous men in their time. And to the contrarie, we finde the nource of Alcibiades, that she was a LACEDÆMONIAN borne, and was called Amicla, and that his schoolemaster was called Zopyrus: of the which, Aristophanes mentioneth the one, and Plato the other. Now for Alcibiades beawtie, it made no matter if we speake not of it, yet I will a litle touche it by the way: for he was wonderfull fayer, being a child, a boye, and a man, and that at all times, which made him maruelous amiable, and beloued of euery man. For where Euripides sayeth, that of all the fayer times of the yere, the Autumne or latter season is the fayerst: that commonly faileth not out true. And yet it proued true in Alcibiades, though in fewe other: for he was passing fayer euen to his latter time, & of good temperature of bodie. They write of him also, that his tongue was somewhat fatte, and it dyd not become him ill, but gaue him a certen naturall pleasaunt grace in his talke: which Aristophanes mentioneth, mocking one Theorus that dyd counterfeate a lipping grace with his tongue.

*This Alcibiades, with his fat lipping tongue, into mine eares, this truisty tale, and songe fallt often songe.
Looke vpon Theolus (q he) lo there he bowues, beholde his comely crowwebright face with fat and*flasting blowues.*

The sonne of Clinias, would lipe it thus somevvhiles, and sure he liped neuer a lye, but rightly byt his vvhiles.

C And Archippus another poet also, mocking the sonne of Alcibiades, sayeth thus, *Bicause he would be like his father euerie vvhay in his long trayling gouerne he would goe setting daye by daye.
And counterfeate his speache, his countenance and face:
as though dame nature had him geuen, therein a perfect grace.
To lipe and looke aside, and holde his head awrye, euen as his father lookt and lipst, so would he prate and pry.*

For his manners they altered and chaunged very oft with time, which is not to be wondered at, seeing his maruelous great prosperitie, as also aduerfitie that followed him afterwards. But of all the great defiers he had, and that by nature he was most inclined to, was ambition. D seeking to haue the vpper hand in all things, and to be taken for the best persone: as appeareth by certaine of his dedes, and notable sayings in his youthe, extant in writing. One daye wrestling with a companion of his, that handled him hardly, and thereby was likely to haue geuen him the fall: he got his fellowes arme in his mouth, and bit so harde, as he would haue eaten it of. The other feeling him bite so harde, let goe his holde straight, and fayed vnto him: what Alcibiades, bitest thou like a woman? No mary doe I not (q he) but like a lyon. Another time being but a litle boye, he played at skayles in the middelt of the streete with other of his companions, and when his turne came about to throwe, there came a carte loden by chauce that waye: Alcibiades prayed the carter to staye a while, vntill he had played out his game, bicause the skayles were set right in the high way where the carte should passe ouer. The carter E was a stubborne knaue, and would not staye for any request the boye could make, but draue his horse on still, in so much as other boyes gaue backe to let him goe on: but Alcibiades fell flat to the ground before the carte, and bad the carter driue ouer and he durste. The carter being afeard, plucked backe his horse to staye them: the neighbours flighted to see the daunger, ranne to the boye in all hast crying out. Afterwards when he was put to schoole to learne, he was very obedient to all his masters that taught him any thing, sauing that he disdaind to learne to playe of the flute or recorder: saying, that it was no gentlemanly qualitie. For, sayed he, to playe on the vyoll with a stick, doth not alter mans fauour, nor disgraceeth any gentleman: but otherwise, to playe on the flute, his countenance altereth and chaungeth so ofte, that his familiar friends can scant knowe him. Moreover, the harpe or vyoll doth not let him F that playeth on them, from speaking, or singing as he playeth: where he that playeth on the flute, holdeth his mouth so harde to it, that it taketh not only his wordes from him, but his voyce. Therefore, sayed he, let the children of the THEBANS playe on the flute, that cannot tell howe to speake: as vs A THENIANS, we haue (as our forefathers tell vs) for proteclours A and patrones of our countrie, the goddesse Pallas, and the god Apollo: of the which the one in olde time (as it is sayd) brake the flute, and the other pulled his skynne ouer his eares, that played vpon the flute. Thus Alcibiades alledging these reasons, partly in sporte, and partly in good earnest: dyd not only him selfe leaue to learne to playe on the flute, but he turned his companions mindes also quite from it. For these wordes of Alcibiades, ranne from boye to boye incontinently: that Alcibiades had reason to despise playing of the flute, and that he mocked all those that learned to play of it. So afterwards, it fell out at A THENS, that teaching to playe of the flute, was put out of the number of honest and liberal exercises, and the flute it selfe was thought a vile instrument, and of no reputation. Furthermore, in the accusations Antiphon wrote against Alcibiades, it is declared: that when he was a boye, he fled out of his B tutors house, into the house of Democrates one of his louers, and howe Antiphon one of his tutors thought to haue made a beadle crie him through the cittie. But Pericles would not suffer him, saying: that if he were dead, they should knowe it but one daye sooner by crying of him: and if he were alieue, that it would be such a shame to him while he liued, that he had bene better he had neuer bene heard of againe. The same Antiphon accuseth him further, that he had killed a seruaut of his that attended on him, in the wrestling place of Sibyrinus, with a blowe of a staffe. But there is no reason to credit his writing, who confesseth he speaketh all the ill he can of him, for the ill will he dyd beare him. Now straight there were many great & riche men that made much of Alcibiades, and were glad to get his good will. But Socrates loue vnto him had another ende and cause, which witnessed that Alcibiades had a naturall inclination to vertue. Who perceyuing that vertue dyd appeare in him, and was ioyned with the other beawtie of his face and bodye, and fearing the corruption of riches, dignitie and authoritie, and the great number of his companions, aswell of the chiefeft of the cittie, as of straungers, seeking to entise him by flatterie, and by many other pleasures: he tooke vpon him to protect him from them all, and not to suffer so goodly an ympe to lose the hope of the good fruite of his youthe. For fortune doth neuer so intangle nor snare a man without, with that which they commonly call riches, as to let & hinder him so, that philosophie should not take holde on him with her free, seure, and quicke reasons. So Alcibiades was at the beginning, assayed with all delightes, and shut vp as it were in their companie that feasted him with all pleasures, only to turne him that he should not hearken to Socrates wordes, who fought to D bring him vp at his charge, and to teach him. But Alcibiades notwithstanding, hauing a good naturall wit, knewe what Socrates was, and went to him, refusing the companie of all his riche friends and their flatteries, and fell in a kinde of familiar friendship with Socrates. VVhom when he had heard speake, he noted his wordes very well, that they were no persuasions of a man seeking his dishonesty, but one that gaue him good counsell, & went about to reforme his fautes and imperfections, and to plucke downe the pride and presumption that was in him: then, as the common prouerbe sayeth,

Like to the craven cocke, he drovruped downe his vniunges, which cowardly doth runne awaye, or from the pit out flinges.

And dyd thinke with selfe, that all Socrates loue and following of young men, was in dede E thing sent from the goddes, and ordeined aboue for them, whom they would haue preferred, & put into the pathe waye of honour. Therefore he beganne to despise him selfe, and greatly to reuerence Socrates, taking pleasure of his good vsing of him, & much imbraced his vertue: so as he had (he wist not howe) an image of loue grauen in his harte, or rather (as Plato sayeth) a mutuall loue, to wit, an holy & honest affection towards Socrates. Insumch as all the world wondered at Alcibiades, to see him commonly at Socrates borde, to playe, to wrestle, & to lodge in the warres with Socrates: and contrarily to chide his other well willers, who could not so much as haue a good looke at his handes, and besides became dangerous to some, as it is sayd he was vnto Anytus, the sonne of Anthemion, being one of those that loued him well.

Anytus making good cheere to certain straungers his friends that were come to see him, F went and prayed Alcibiades to come and make merie with them: but he refused to goe. For he went to make merie with certain of his companions at his own house, and after he had well

A taken in his cuppes, he went to Anytus house to counterfeate the foole amongst them, and staying at the halle doore, and seeing Anytus table and cubberd full of plate of siluer & gold, he commaunded his seruants to take awaye half of it, and carie it home to his house. But when he had thus taken his pleasure, he would come no neerer into the house, but went his waye home. Anytus friends and guesstes mistaking this straunge parte of Alcibiades, sayd it was shamefully and boldly done so to abuse Anytus. Nay, gently done of him, sayd Anytus: for he hath leit vs some, where he might haue taken all. All other also that made much of him, he serued after that sorte. Sauing a straunger that came to dwell in A THENS: who being but a poore man as the voyce went, sold all that he had, whereof he made about a hundred stateres which he brought vnto Alcibiades, & prayed him to take it at his handes. Alcibiades beganne B to be merie, and being very glad to vnderstand his good will towards him, tooke his honest offer, and prayed him to come to supper to him: so he welcomed him very hartely, and made him good cheere. When supper was done, he gaue him his money againe, and commaunded him not to faile the next morning to meete him where the farmes and landes of the cittie are wont to be let out to those that byd most, and charged him he should out byd all. The poore man would sayne haue excused him self, saying, the farmes were to great for him to hyre: but Alcibiades threatned to whippe him, if he would not doe it. For besides the desire he had to pleasure him, he bare a priuate grudge against the ordinary farmers of the cittie. The next morning the straunger was ready in the market place, where they dyd crie out the letting of their farmes, and he raised one to a talent more, then all other dyd offer. The other farmers C were as mad with him as they could be, that they all dyd set vpon him, crying out: let him put in suertie straight, supposing he could haue founde none. The straunger was maruelous blanke thereat, and beganne to shrink backe. Then cried Alcibiades out alowde to the officers that fate there to take the best offers: I will be his suertie, sayeth he, put me in the booke, for he is a friend of mine. The farmers hearing him saye so, were at their wirtes ende, and wiste not what to doe. For they being allwayes accustomed to paye their yerely rent as it went before, by the helpe of the rest of the yeres that followed after: perceyuing now that they should not be able to paye the arrearages of the rentes due to the common weale, and seeing no other remedie, they prayed him to take a peece of money, and to leaue the bargain. Then Alcibiades would in no wise he should take lesse then a talent, which they gaue him willingly.

D So Alcibiades suffered the straunger then to departe, and made him gaine by his deuise. Now Socrates loue which he bare him, though it had many mightie and great aduertaries, yet it dyd staye much Alcibiades, somtime by his gentle nature, somtime by his graue counsell and aduise: so as the reason thereof tooke so deepe roote in him, and dyd so pearce his harte, that many times the teares ranne downe his cheekes. Another time also being caried awaye with the intisement of flatterers, that held vp his humour with all pleasure and delightes, he stalle awaye from Socrates, and made him runne after him to fetch him againe, as if he had bene a flauie that had runne awaye from his masters house: for Alcibiades stood in awe of no man but of Socrates only, and in deede he dyd reuerence him, and dyd despise all other. And therefore Cleantes was wont to saye, that Alcibiades was held of Socrates by the eares: but that he E gaue his other louers holde, which Socrates neuer sought for: for to saye truly, Alcibiades was muche geuen ouer to lust and pleasure. And peraduenture it was that Thucydides ment of him, when he wrote that he was incontinent of bodie, and dissolute of life. Those that married Alcibiades quite, dyd still pricke forward his ambition and desire of honour, and dyd put him in the head to thrust him selfe into great matters betimes, making him beleue that if he dyd but once beginne to shewe him selfe to deale in matters of state, he would not only bleamish and deface all other gouernours, but farre excell Pericles, in authoritie and power among the G RECIANS. For like as iron by fire is made softe, to be wrought in to any forme, and by colde also doth shut and harden in againe: euen so Alcibiades being puffed vp with vanitie & opinion of him self, as ofte as Socrates tooke him in hande, was made faste & firme againe by his good persuasions, insumch that when he sawe his owne faule and follie, and how farre wide he had strayed from vertue, he became sodainly very humble and lowly againe. Now on a time when he was grown to mans state, he went into a grammar schoole, and asked the schoolmaster for one of Homers bookes. The schoolmaster answered him, he had none of A the: Alcibiades vp with his fiste, & gaue him a good boxe on the eare, & went his waye. Another grammarian tolde him on a time he had Homer which he had corrected. Alcibiades replied, why what meanest thou, to stand teaching litle children their abce, when thou art able to correct Homer, and to teach young men, not boyes? Another time he came and knocked at Pericles gate, desirous to speake with him: answer was made him, he was not at leysure now, for that he was buillie occupied by him self, thinking on his reckonings he had to make with the ATHENIANS. Why, sayed he, going his waye: it were better he were occupied, thinking how to make no accompt at all. Moreouer, being but a young boye, he was at the iorney of POTIDEA, where he laye still with Socrates, who would neuer let him be from him in all battells and skirmishes he was in: among which there was one, very whotte & bloody, where they both fought valiantly, and Alcibiades was hurte. But Socrates stepped before him, and dyd defend him so valiantly before them all, that he faued him and his weapon out of the enemies handes. So the honour of this fight out of doubt, in equitie and reason, was due vnto Socrates: but yet the captaines would faine haue iudged it on Alcibiades side, because he was of a noble houle. But Socrates, because he would increase his desire of honour, & would pricke him forward to honest and commendable things, was the very first that witnesseth Alcibiades had defered it: and therefore prayed the captaines to iudge him the crowne and compleat armour. Afterwards, in the battell of DELION, the ATHENIANS hauing receyued the overthrow, Socrates retired with a fewe other a foote. Alcibiades being a horse backe, and ouertaking him, would not goe from him, but kept him company, and defended him against a troupe of his enemies that followed him, and slue many of his company. But that was a pretty while after, and before he gaue a boxe of the eare vnto Hipponeus, Callias father: who was one of the greatest men of power in the citie, being a noble man borne, and of great possessions, which was done vpon a brauery and certaine lustines, as hauing layed a wager with his companions he would doe it, and for no malice or quarrell that he bare the man. This light parte was straight ouer all the citie, and euery one that heard it, sayed it was lewdly done. But Alcibiades the next morning went to his house, and knocking at his gate was let in: so he stripping him selfe before him, deliuered him his bodie to be whipped, and punished at his pleasure. Hipponeus pardoned him, and was friends with him, and gaue him his daughter Hipparete afterwards in marriage. Howbeit some saye, it was not Hipponeus that gaue her to him: but Callias sonne, with tenne talents of gold with her. Afterwards at the birth of his first child he had by her, he asked tenne talents more, saying: they were promised him vpon the contract, if his wife had children. But Callias fearing least this was an occasio sought of him to lye in waye to kill him for his goodes: declared openly to the people, that he made him his heire generally, if he dyed without heires speciall of his bodie. This gentlewoman Hipparete, being an honest true wife to Alcibiades, mistaking her husband dyd so muche misuse her, as to entertaine common light strumpets, alwell citizens as straungers: the went abroad one day to her brothers houle, and tolde him of it. Alcibiades passed not for it, and made no further reckoning of the matter: but only bad his wife, if she would, present her cause of diuorfe before the iudge. So she went thither her selfe, to sue the diuorfe betwene them, according to the lawe: but Alcibiades being there also, tooke her by the hande, & caried her through the market place home to his houle, and no man durst medle betwene them, to take her from him. And so she continued with him all the dayes of her life, which was not long after: for she dyed, when Alcibiades was in his iorney he made to EPHESVS. This force Alcibiades vfed, was not thought altogether vnlawfull, nor vnciuill, because it seemeth that the lawe was grounded vpon this cause: that the wife which would be diuorced from her husband, should goe her selfe openly before the iudge to put vp her complainte, to the ende, that by this meanes, the husband might come to speake with his wife, and seeke to staye her if he could. Alcibiades had a maruelous fayer great dogge, that cost him three score and tenne minas, and he cut of his taile that was his chief beawtie. When his friends reproved him, and tolde him how euery man blamed him for it: he fell laughing, and tolde them he had that he sought. For, sayeth he, I would haue the ATHENIANS rather prate vpon that, then they should saye worfe of me. Moreouer, it is sayed, the first time that that Alcibiades spake openly in the common weale, and beganne to deale in matters, was vpon a gite of money, he gaue to the people, and not of any pretence, or former purpose he had to doe it. One daye as he came through the market place, hearing the people very lowde, he asked what the matter was: they tolde him it was about money, ceren men had genen to the people. Then Alcibiades went to them, and gaue them money out of his owne purse. The people were so glad at that, as they fell to showing and clapping of their handes, in token of thankfullnes: and him selfe was so glad for companie, that he forgot a quayle he had vnder his gowne, which was so afeard of the noyse, that she tooke her flight away. The people seeing the quayle, made a greater noyse then before, and many rose out of their places to runne after her: so that in the ende, it was taken vp by a master of a shippe called Antiochus, who brought him the quayle againe, and for that cause Alcibiades dyd loue him euier after. Now about the nobilitie of his houle, his goodes, his worthines, & the great number of his kinsmen & friends made his waye open to take vpon him gouernment in the common weale. Yet the only waye he desired to winne the fauour of the common people by, was the grace of his eloquence. To proue he was eloquent, all the Comicall poets doe testifie it: and besides them, Damagethenes the prince of orators also doth saye, in an oration he made against Midias, that Alcibiades aboue all other qualities he had, was most eloquent. And if we maye beleue Theophrastus, the greatest searcher of antiquities, & best historiographer aboue any other philosopher: he hath written, that Alcibiades had as good a witte to deuise and consider what he would saye, as any man that was in his time. Howbeit sometimes studying what he should saye, as also to deliuer good wordes, not hauing them very readilie at his tongues ende: he many times tooke breath by the waye, and paused in the midst of his tale, not speaking a worde, vntill he had called it to minde, that he would saye. His charge was great, and muche spoken of also, for keeping of running horses at games: not only because they were the best & swiftest, but for the number of coches he had besides. For neuer priuate person, no nor any prince, that euier sent feuen so well appointed coches, in all furniture, vnto the games Olympicall, as he dyd: nor that at one course had borne awaye the first, the second, and the fourth prife, as Thucydides sayeth: or as Enripides reporteth, the third. For in that game, he excelled all men in honour and name that euier strued for victorie therein. For Enripides pronounced his praise, in a songe he made of him, as followeth:

D O sonne of Clinias, I will resounde thy praise:
for thou art bold in martiall dedes, and ouercommest all wayes.
Thy victories therewith, doe farre exceede the rest, that euier were in Greece ygot, therefore I compt them best.
For at the Olympike games, thou hast with chariots vronne, the first prife, seconde, thirde and all, with which there in race vronne ronne.
With praise and litle payne, thy head hath vronne bene crownde, with olive boughes for victorie, and vronne by trumpets founde.
The heralds haue proclaimed thee victor by thy name:
above all those, which haue vronne thee, in hope to get the game.

E Howbeit the good affection diuers citties did beare him, contending which should gratifie him best, dyd muche increase his fame and honour. For the EPHESIANS dyd set vp a tente for him, very sumptuously and richely furnished. Those of the citie of CHIO, furnished him with prouinder for his horse, and gaue him muttons besides, and other beastes to sacrifice withall. They of LESBOS also sent him in wine and other prouision for vittells, to helpe him to defraye the great charges he was at in keeping open houle, & feeding such a nuber of mouthes daylie. Yet the spite they dyd beare him, or rather his breache of promise which he often made, with this magnificence and state he shewed, gaue the people more cause to speake of him then before. For they saye there was one Diomedes at ATHENS, a friend of Alcibiades, & no ill man, who desired once in his life to winne a game at the playes Olympicall. This man beinge informed that the ARGIVS had a coche excellently furnished, belonging to their common weale, and knowing that Alcibiades could doe very much in the citie of ARGOS, because he had many friends in the same: he came to intreate Alcibiades to buye this coche for him.

One daye as he came through the market place, hearing the people very lowde, he asked what the matter was: they tolde him it was about money, certain men had gotten to the people. Then Alcibiades went to them, and gaue them money out of his owne purse. The people were so glad at that, as they fell to howling and clapping of their handes, in token of thankfullnes: and him selfe was so glad for companie, that he forgot a quayle he had vnder his gowne, which was so afeard of the noyse, that she tooke her flight away. The people seeing the quayle, made a greater noyse then before, and many rofe out of their places to runne after her: so that in the ende, it was taken vp by a master of a shippe called Antiochus, who brought him the quayle againe, and for that cause Alcibiades dyd loue him euer after. Now albeit the nobilitie of his house, his goodes, his worthines, & the great number of his kinsmen & friends made his waye open to take vpon him gouernment in the common weale. Yet the only waye he desired to winne the fauour of the common people by, was the grace of his eloquence. To proue he was eloquent, all the Comicall poets do testifie it: and besides them, Damasthenes the prince of orators also doth saye, in an oration he made against Midias, that Alcibiades aboue all other qualities he had, was most eloquent. And if we maye belecue Theophrastus, the greatest searcher of antiquities, & best historiographer aboue any other philosopher: he hath written, that Alcibiades had as good a witte to deuise and consider what he would saye, as any man that was in his time. Howbeit sometimes studying what he should saye, as also to deliuer good wordes, not hauing them very readilie at his tongues ende: he many times tooke breath by the waye, and paused in the midst of his tale, not speaking a worde, vntill he had called it to minde, that he would saye. His charge was great, and muche spoken of also, for keeping of running horses at games: not only because they were the best & swiftest, but for the number of coches he had besides. For neuer priuate person, no nor any prince, that euer sent seuen foell appointed coches, in all furniture, vnto the games Olympicall, as he dyd: nor that at one course had borne awaye the first, the second, and the fourth prize, as Thucydides sayeth: or as Euripides reporteth, the third. For in that game, he excelled all men in honour and name that euer strived for victorie therein. For Euripides pronounced his praise, in a songe he made of him, as followeth:

for thou art bold in martiall dedes, and ouercommest all wayes.
Thy victories therewith, doe farre exceede the rest, that euer were in Greece ygot, therefore I compt them best.
For at the Olympike games, thou hast with chariots vonne, the first prize, seconde, thirde and all, which there in race vuerre yonne.
With praise and litle payne, thy head hath with bene crownde, with olive boughes for victorie, and with trumpets founde.
The heraulds haue proclaimed thee victor by thy name:
above all those, which ranne with thee, in hope to get the game.

E Howbeit the good affection diuers citties did beare him, contending which should gratifie him best, dyd muche increase his fame and honour. For the EPHESIANS dyd yet vpon a rente for him, very sumptuously and richly furnished. Those of the cittie of CHIO, furnished him with prouider for his horse, and gaue him muttons besides, and other beastes to sacrifice withall. They of LABOS also sent him in wine and other prouision for vittells, to helpe him to defraye the great charges he was at in keeping open house, & feeding such a nuber of mouthes daylie. Yet the spite they dyd beare him, or rather his breache of promise which he often made, with this magnificence and state he shewed, gaue the people more cause to speake of him then before. For they saye there was one Diomedes at ATHENS, a friend of Alcibiades, & no ill man, who desired once in his life to winne a game at the playes Olympicall. This man F being informed that the ARGIVS had a coche excellently furnished, belonging to their common weale, and knowing that Alcibiades could doe very much in the cittie of LABOS, because he had many friends in the same: he came to intreate Alcibiades to buye this coche for him.

Alcibiades thereupon bought it, but kept it to him selfe, not regarding Diomedes request he had made. Diomedes seeing that fell starke mad for anger, and called the goddes & men to witness, that Alcibiades did him open wrong, and it seemeth, that there fell out sute in lawe upon the same. For Sperates wrote an oration, and drue a plea in defence of Alcibiades, being yet but a childe, touching a couple of horses; yet in this plea, his aduersarie was called Tisias, and not Diomedes. Furthermore, Alcibiades being yet but a young man, when he came to practise and pleade publicly, he puttall other Orators to silence, but only two that were euer against him: the one was Phaex the sonne of Erasistratus, and the other Nicias, the sonne of Niceratus. Of these two, Nicias was a man grown, and had wonne the name & reputation of a good captain. And Phaex beganne also to come forward as he dyd, being of a good and honorable houle: but he lacked many things, and among other, eloquence specially. For he could more properly talke and discourse among his friends priuately, then he had any good grace to open a matter openly before the people. For he had, as Empolis sayeth:

Vvordes enow, but no eloquence.

There is a certain oration extant in writing, against Alcibiades and Phaex: where among other accusations is brought in, howe Alcibiades was ordinarily serued in his houle, with gold & siluer plate that belonged to the common weale, and which were vsed to be borne for state & magnificence, in solemne processions before them; and how he vsed them as boldly, as if they had bene his owne. Now there was one Hyperbolus in ATHENS at that time borne in the village of Perithoides: of whom Thucydides maketh mention, as of a naughty wicked man, whose tongue was a fit instrument to deliuer matter to all the Comicall poets of that time, to poore out all their tawns and mockes against men. Howbeit he was so impudent a persone, and cared so litle what men sayed of him, that he passed not though he were defamed, neither dyd any thing greue him, whatsoever they reported of him: which some doe call boldnes, and courage, being no better in deede then plaine impudencie, extreme madnes, and desperate follie. He would neuer please any man: & if the common people had any grudge to any noble man or magistrate, whom they would any way accuse, Hyperbolus wicked tongue was their instrument to vtter their spye. Now the people (by Hyperbolus procurement) being assembled, were ready to proceede to the banishment of Ostracism by most voyces. The manner & custome of this kynde of banishment was for a time to banish out of their citie such a one, as seemed to haue to great authoritie and credit in the citie: and that was, rather to satisfie their enie, then for to remedy their feare. And bicause it was manifest it would fall out to one of them three to be banished (to wit, Alcibiades, Nicias, or Phaex) Alcibiades found meanes to ioyne all their three factions in one, becomming friends one to another: and hauing conferred with Nicias about it, he made Hyperbolus self to be banished, who was the chief instrument to prepare the waye of their banishment. Howbeit other saye, he spake not with Nicias about it, but with Phaex, and ioyning his parte with Phaex, he caused Hyperbolus to be banished, who feared nothing lesse: for it was neuer seene before, that a man of meane countenance, and of small authoritie, fell into the happe of this banishment. As Plato the Comicall poet testified, speaking of Hyperbolus.

*Although for his deserts, this payne to him is due, or greater punishment prepared, the which might make him rue: Yet since he was by birth, a persone meane and base, such punishment therefore dyd seeme (for him) to great of grace.
Since Ostracism was, not made at first to be, nor yet deuise as punishment, for suche meane folke as he.*

But of this matter, we haue spoken more at large before: and now to returne againe to Alcibiades. Nicias had great reputation among strangers, and his enemies greued at it no lesse, then at the honour the citizens selues dyd vnto him. For his houle was the common inne for all LACEDÆMONIANS when they came to ATHENS, and they euer laye with him: moreover he had very well entertained the LACEDÆMON prisoners that were taken at the sorte of PLYE. And afterwards when peace was concluded betwene LACEDÆMON and ATHENS, and their prisoners redeliuered home againe by Nicias meanes only & procurement they they loued him more then euer they dyd before. This was blowen abroad through GREECE, that Pericles had kindled the warres amongst them, and Nicias had quenched it: so some called this peace Nician, as one would saye, Nicias worke. But Alcibiades stood making this, and enuying Nicias glorie, determined to breake the peace whatsoever came of it. Wherefore to compasse this matter, knowing first of all that the ARGIUES had no liking of the LACEDÆMONIANS, but were their mortall enemies, and that they dyd but seeke matter to fall out with them: he secretly put them in hope of peace and league with the ATHENIANS. Moreover he dyd perswade them to it, both by letters and worde of mouthe, speaking with the magistrates, and suche as had greatest authoritie and credit amongst the people: declaring vnto them, that they should not feare the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor yeld to them at all, but to stick to the ATHENIANS, who would sone repent them of the peace they had made, and breake it with them. Afterwards when the LACEDÆMONIANS had made league with the BOEOTIANS, and had redeliuered the citie of PANACTVM to the ATHENIANS, all defaced and spoiled, contrarie to the league: Alcibiades perceyving how the people were much offended therat, made them more earnest against them, and therewithall brought Nicias in disgrace with the people, and charged him with many matters of great likelihood. As at that time, when he was general: that he would neuer take any of the LACEDÆMONIANS, when they were shut vp within the Ile of SPHACTERIA, and muche lesse distresse them when he might: and moreover that when other had taken them prisoners by force, that he had founde the meanes to deliuer them, and send them home againe, to gratifie the LACEDÆMONIANS. Furthermore, that being their friende, he dyd not his duty to disswade the people from making of league offensive, and defensive with the BOEOTIANS and the CORINTHIANS: and againe also, if there were any people of GREECE that had a desire to become friendes and allies with the ATHENIANS, that he dyd the best he could to let them, if the LACEDÆMONIANS had no liking of the matter. Now as Nicias was thus in disgrace with the people, for the causes aboue sayd: in the midst of this sturre, ambassadours came by chance from LACEDÆMON to ATHENS, who at their comming gaue very good wordes, saying they had full power, and commission to compound all controuersies, vnder reasonable and equal conditions. The Senate heard them, and receaued them very curteously; and the people the next daye should assemble in counsell to geue them audience: which Alcibiades fearing muche, he went to labour the ambassadours, and spake with them aparte in this sorte: What meane you, my Lordes of SPARTA: doe ye not knowe that the Senate hath all wayes accustomed to be gracious and fauorable vnto those that sue vnto them for any matter, and that the people contrarie are of a prowde nature; and desirous to imbrace all great matters? If therefore at the first sight, ye doe geue them to vnderstand that you are come hither with full power, to treat freely with them in all manner of causes: doe you not thinke that they make you stretch your authoritie farre, to graunte them all that they will demaunde. Therefore, my Lordes ambassadours, if you looke for indifference at the ATHENIANS handes, and that they shall not prease you to farre against your willes, to graunte them any thing of aduantage: I would wishe you a litle to couter your full commission, and in open manner to propound certain articles, and reasonable capitulations of peace, not acquainting them otherwise with your full power to agree in all things: and for my parte, I will assure you of my good will in fauour of the LACEDÆMONIANS. When he had tolde them this tale, he gaue them his faithfull promise, and vowed as it were to performe his worde. Hereupon Alcibiades turned the ambassadours from the trust they reposed in Nicias, and wayne them on this side: in so muche as they gaue credit to no man but to him, wondering muche at his great wit and ready wit, and they thought him a rare and notable man. The next morning the people were assembled to geue the ambassadours audience. They were sent for, and brought into the marketplace. There Alcibiades gently asked them, what was the cause of their comming. They answered that they were come to treat of peace, but they had no power to determine any thing: a

beganne Alcibiades to be angrie with them, as if they had done him wrong, and not he to them: calling them vnfaithfull, vnconstant, and fickle men, that were come neither to doe, nor saye any thing worth the hearing. The Senate also were offended with them, and the people rated them very roughly: whereat Nicias was so aghamed and amafed withall, that he could not tell what to saye, to see so sodaine a change, knowing nothing of Alcibiades malice and subtill practise with the ambassadours. So the ambassadours of Lacedemon were dispatched, without any thing done, and Alcibiades chosen generall: who presently brought the Argives, the *Elia*n, and the Mantians in league with the Athenians. Though no man dyd commend this practise of his, in working it after this sorte: yet was it a maruelous thing of him to deuise to put all Peloponnesus in armes, and to procure such a number of souldiers against the Lacedemonians, as he dyd before the citie of Mantineia, and to shifte of the miseries of warre and hazard of battell, so farre from Athenes. Which if the Lacedemonians dyd winne, could not profit them much: and if they lost it, they could hardly saue their citie of Sparta. After this battell of Mantineia, the thousand men whom the citie by an ancient order dyd keepe continually in paye, aswell in peace as in warre, within the citie of Argos, thinking now opportunite serued them very trimly: attempted to take the soueraine authoritie from the common people, and to make them selues Lords of the citie. And to bring this to passe, the Lacedemonians comming in the meane time, dyd ayde them in their purpose, and so dyd put downe the government of the people: notwithstanding, immediately after the people tooke armes againe, and became the stronger. Alcibiades comming thither euen at that time, dyd warrant them the victorie, and to let vp againe the authoritie of the people. Then he perswaded them to make their walles longer to ioyne their citie to the sea, to the ende they might more easely be ayded by sea, by the Athenians. He brought them also from Athenes, many carpenters, masons, stone hewers, and other workemen: and to conclude, he shewed them by all the meanes and wayes he could, that he dyd beare good will vnto them, and thereby wanne him selfe no lesse fauour particularly among them, then generally he dyd good vnto his countrie. He dyd perswade also the citizens of Patras to ioyne their towne to the sea, by making long walles, which they built out euen to the clyffes of the sea. And when one sayed vnto them, alas, poore people of Patras, what doe ye meane the Athenians will eate you out. Alcibiades answered him, it maye well be, but it shalbe by litle and litle, beginning first at the feete: but the Lacedemonians will deuoure you all at once, and beginne at the head. Now although Alcibiades dyd make the citie of Athenes strong by sea, yet he dyd not leaue to perswade the Athenians also, to make their selues strong by lande. For he dyd put the young men oftentimes in minde of the othe they were made to sweare in Agravalos, and dyd aduise them to accomplishe it in dede. Which was, that they should take all corne fields, vines, and olyue trees, to be the borders and confines of Attica, whereby they were taught to reckon all lande theirs, that was manured, and dyd bring forth fruite. Yet with all these goodly dedes and fayer wordes of Alcibiades, and with this great courage and quicknes of vnderstanding, he had many great fautes and imperfections. For he was to daintie in his fare, wantonly geuen vnto light women, riotous in bankets, vaine and womanishe in apparell: he wore euer a long purple gowne that swepte the market place as he walked vp and downe, it had suche a traine, and was so rich and costly for him to weare. And following these vaine pleasures and delights, when he was in his galley, he caused the planks of the poore thereof to be cutte and broken vp, as he might lye the softer: for his bed was not layed upon the ouerloppe, but laye vpon girthes strained ouer the hole, cut out and fastened to the sides, and he caried to the warres with him a gilded cushion, wherein he had no cognizance nor ordinary deuise of the Athenians, but only had the image of Cupid in it, holding lightning in his hande. The noble men, and best citizens of Athenes perceyuing this, they hated his facions and conditions, and were much offended at him, and were afeard withall of his rashnes and insolencie: he dyd so contemne the lawes and customes of their countrie, being manifest tokens of a man that aspired to be King, and would subuert and turne all ouer hand. And as for the good will

The waller brought to the sea by the Argives.

Alcibiades was.

A good will of the common people towards him, the poet Aristophanes doth plainly expresse it in these wordes:

The people most desire, what most they hate to haue:
And what their minds abhorres, euen that they seeme to eate.

And in another place he sayed also, aggravating the suspicion they had of him.

For state or common vnto, much better should it be,
To keepe within the countrie home, such lions looke as he.
But if they needes will keepe, a lion to their cost, Then must they needes obey his will, for he will rule the roste.

For to saye truly: his curtesies, his libéralities, and noble expences to shewe the people so great pleasure and pastime as nothing could be more: the glorious memorie of his auncesters, the grace of his eloquence, the beawtie of his persone, the strength and valliantnes of his bodie, ioyned together with his wisdom and experience in marshall affayres: were the very causes that made them to beare with him in all things, and that the Athenians dyd patiently endure all his light partes, and dyd couer his fautes, with the best wordes and termes they could, calling them youthfull, and gentlemen's sportes. As when he kept Agatharchus the painter prisoner in his house by force, vntill he had painted all his walles within: and when he had done, dyd let him goe, and rewarded him very honestly for his paines. Again when he gaue a boxe of the eare to Taurus, who dyd paye the whole charges of a companie of common players, in spite of him, to carie awaye the honour of the games. Also when he tooke awaye a young woman of Melia by his authoritie, that was taken among certaine prisoners in the warres, and kept her for his concubine: by whom he had a childe, which he caused to be brought vp. Which they called a worke of charitie, albeit afterwards they burdened him, that he was the only cause of murdering of the poore Meliars, sauing the lide children, because he had fauored and perswaded that vnnatural and wicked decree, which another had propounded, likewise where poet Aristophanes the painter, had painted a curtisan named Nemus, holding Alcibiades in her armes, and sitting in her lappe, which all the people ranne to see, and tooke great pleasure to behold: the graue and auncient men, were angrie at these foolish partes, accompanying them impudent things, and done against all ciuill modestie and temperancie. Wherefore it seemed Archestratus words.

D were spoken to good purpose, when he sayed, that Greece could not abide two Alcibiades, saying at once. And on a daye as he came from the counsaill and assembly of the citie, where he had made an excellent oration, to the great good liking and acceptation of all the hearers, and by meanes thereof had obtained the thing he desired, and was accompanied with a great traine that followed him to his honour: Timon, surnamed Misanthropus, as who would saye, Lampyris, or the man hater, meeting Alcibiades thus accompanied, dyd not passe by him, nor gaue him waye (as he was wont to doe to all other men) but went straight to him, and tooke him by the hande, and sayed, O thou dost well my sonne, I can thee thank, that thou goest on, and climest vp still: for if euer thou be in authoritie, wee be vnto thee as that followe thee, for they are vnto thee vndone. When they heard these wordes, such shalbeode by sell. E laughing: other reuiled Timon, other againe marked well his wordes, and thought of them many a time after, such sundry opinions they had of him for the vnconstantie of his life, and waywardnes of his nature and conditions. Now for the taking of Syracusa, the Athenians dyd maruelously couer it in Pociles life, but yet they dyd not misse withall, vntill after his death: and then they dyd it as the first vnder culler of friendship, as sayd those cities which were oppressed, and spoiled by the Syracusians. This was in manner a plaine bridge made, so passe afterwards a greater power and armie thither. Howbeit the only procurer of the Athenians, and pertrader of them, to send small companies thither no more, but to enter with a great armie, at once to conquer all the countie together, was Alcibiades: who had so allured the people with his pleasant tongue, that vpon his perswasion, they built castells in the ayre, and thought to doe greater wonders, by winning only of Sicilia. For where other dyd set their mindes upon the conquest of Sicilia,

Alcibiades dishonestly & vniuertely

being that they only hoped after: it was to Alcibiades, but a beginning of further enterprises. And where Nicias commonly in all his persuasions, dyd turne the ATHENIANS from their purpose to make warres against the SYRACUSANS, as being to great a matter for them to take the citie of SYRACUSA: Alcibiades againe had a further reache in his head, to goe conquer LIBYA, and CARTHAGE, and that being conquered, to passe from thence into ITALIE, and so to PELOPONNESUS: so that SICILIA should serue but to furnishe them with vittells, and to paye the souldiers for their conquestes which he had imagined. Thus the young men were incontinently caried away with a marvelous hope and opinion of this iorney, and gaue good eare to olde mens tales that tolde them wonders of the countries: inasmuch as there was no other pastime nor exercise among the youth in their meetings, but companies of men to set rounde together, drawe plattes of SICILE, and describe the situation of LIBYA and CARTHAGE. And yet they saye, that neither Socrates the philosopher, nor Meton the astronomer dyd euer hope to see any good successe of this iorney. For the one by the reuealing of his familiar spirite, who tolde him all things to come, as was thought, had no great opinion of it: & Meton, whether it was for the feare of the successe of the iorney he had by reason, or that he knew by diuination of his arte what would followe, he coisterfeated the mad man, & holding a burning torche in his hand, made as though he would haue set his house a fyre. Other saye, that he dyd not coisterfeate, but like a mad man in deede dyd set his house a fyre one night, and that the next morning betimes he went into the market place to praye the people, that in consideration of his great losse and his grievous calamitie so late happened him, it would please them to discharge his sonne for going C this voyage. So by this mad deuise, he obtained his request of the people for his sonne, whom he abused much. But Nicias against his will was chosen capitaine, to take charge of men in these warres: who mistliked this iorney, as well for his companion and affociate in the charge of these warres, as for other misfortunes he foresawe therein. Howbeit the ATHENIANS thought the warre would fall out well, if they dyd not commit it wholly to Alcibiades ratherne and hardines, but dyd ioyne with him the wisdom of Nicias: and appointed Lamachus also for their third capitaine, whom they sent thither, though he were waxen now somewhat olde; as one that had shewed him selfe no lesse venturous and hardie in some battells, then Alcibiades him selfe. Now when they came to resolute of the number of souldiers, the furniture and order of these warres, Nicias sought crookedly to thwart this iorney, and to breake D it of altogether: but Alcibiades withstood him, and gate the better hande of him. There was an orator called Demostratus, who moued the people also that the captaines whom they had chosen for these warres, might haue full power and authoritie to leaue men at their discretion, and to make suche preparation as they thought good: whereunto the people condescended, and dyd authorise them. But when they were euen readie to goe their waye, many signes of ill successe lighted in the necke one of another: and amongst the rest this was one. That they were commaunded to take shippe, on the daye of the celebration of the feast of Adonis, on the which the custome is, that women doe set vp in diuers places of the citie, in the midst of the streates, images, like to dead cories which they carie to buriall, and they represent the mourning and lamentations made at the funeralles of the E dead, with blubbering, and beating them selues, in token of the sorowe the goddesse Penny made, for the death of her friend Adonis. Moreover, the Hermes (which are the images of Mercurie, and were wont to be set vp in euery lane and streete) were found in a night all hacked and hewed, and mangled specially in their faces: but this put diuers in great feare and trouble, yea euen those that made no account of suche toyes. Whereupon it was alleged that it might be the CORINTHIANS that dyd it, or procured that lewde acte to be done, fauoring the SYRACUSANS, who were their neere kynsmen, and had bene the first fownders of them, imagining vpon this ill token, it might be a cause to breake of the enterpryse, and to make the people repent them, that they had taken this warre in hande. Nevertheless, the people would not allow this excuse, neither hearken to their wordes that sayed, F they should not reckon of any such signes or tokens, and that they were but some light brained youthes, that being tippled, had played this shamefull parte in their brauerie, or for sporte.

But

A But for all these reasons, they tooke these signes very greuouly, and were in deede not a litle afraid, as thinking vndoubtedly, that no man durst haue bene so bolde, to haue donee suche an abhominable facte, but that there was some conspiracie in the matter. Hereupon, they looked upon euery suspition and coniecture that might be (how like or vnluckie soeuer it were) and that very seuerely: and both Senate and people also met in counsell vpon it, very ofte, and in a fewe dayes. Now whilst they were busied searching out the matter, Androcles a common counsellor, and orator in the common wealth, brought before the counsell certaine flutes and straungers that dwelt in ATHENS: who deposed that Alcibiades, and other of his friends and companions, had hacked and mangled other images after that sorte, and in a mockerie had counterfeated also in a banker that he made, the ceremonies B of the holy mysteries, declaring these matters particularly. How one Theodorus counterfeated the herald, that is wonte to make the proclamations: Polytion the torche bearer, and Alcibiades the priest, who sheweth the holy signes and mysteries: and that his other companions were the assistants, as those that make sute to be receyued into their religion and order, and into the brotherhood of their holy mysteries, whom for this cause they call Myistes. These very wordes are written in the accusation Thestalus (Cimon sonne) made against Alcibiades, charging him that he had wickedly mocked the two goddeses, Ceres, & Proserpina. Whereat the people being maruelously moued and offended, and the orator Androcles his mortall enemie aggrauating & stirring them vp the more against him: Alcibiades a litle at the first beganne to be amased at it. But afterwards, hearing that the mariners, which were C prepared for the voyage of SICILIA, and the souldiers also that were gathered, dyd beare him great good will, and specially how the ayde, and that bande that came from ARGOS, and Mantine (being a thousand footemen, well armed and appointed) dyd laye openly, how it was for Alcibiades sake they dyd take vpon them so long a voyage beyond sea, & that if they went about to doe him any hurte or wrong, they would presently returne home againe from whence they came: he beganne to be of a good courage againe, and determined with this good favorable oportunitie of time, to come before the counsell, to aunswer to all suche articles and accusations as should be layed against him. Thereupon his enemies were a litle cooled, fearing least the people in this iudgement would haue shewed him more fauour, because they stood in nede of him. Wherefore to preuent this daunger, they D had fedd other Oratours who set a good face on the matter, as they had bene Alcibiades friends, and yet bare him no lesse good will, then the rankest enemies he had. These fine fellows rose vp in open assembly, and sayed: it was no reason, that he that was now chosen one of the generallies of so mightie and puissant an armie (being ready to hoysse sayle and the ayde also of their allies and friends) should be driuen to staye now, and to lose time and occasion of well doing, whilst they should goe about to choosie iudges, and appointe him his howres and time of aunswer. Therefore, they sayed, it was fit he should take his iorney betimes, and when warres were done, that he should present him selfe to requier iustice, and to purge him selfe of suche matters as should be objected against him. But Alcibiades smelling straight their fetches, and perceiving the practise of his staye, stept vp, E and declared how they dyd him great wrong, to make him departe with the charge of a generall of so great an armie, his minde being troubled with continuall feare of so grievous curses, as he should leaue upon him: and that he deserved death, if he could not purge and iustifie him selfe, of all the vniuist and furnished accusations against him. And if he had once clered him selfe of all things, and had published his innocence: he should then haue nothing in his head to trouble him, nor to thinke vpon, but to goe on lustely to fight with his enemies, and to cast behinde him the daunger of all his slanderous detractors. But all this could not perswade them. And so he was presently commaunded in the behalfe of the people, to imbarke, & shipp away his men. Thus he was compelled to take the seas with his other companions, hauing in their nauie about a hundred and forty gallyes, all hauing three F owers to a bancke: & five thousand one hundred footemen very well armed and appointed, & throwers with slinges, archers, & other light armed men to the number of threene hundred, sufficiently furnished of all warlike and necessarie munition. Now after they were arriued on the coaste of ITALIE, they landed in the cittie of RHEGIO: where, holding counsell in A what sorte they should direct these warres, it was resolved in the ende that they should goe straight vnto SICILIA. This opinion was followed, although Nicias dyd contrarie it, when Lamachus gaue his consent therunto: and at his first comming, he was the occasion of winning the cittie of CATANA. But he neuer after dyd any exployte, for he was called home immediately by the ATHENIANS, to come and answer certaine accusations layed to his charge. For as we tolde you before, there was at the beginning, certaine light suspitions and accusations put vp against him, by some slaues and straungers. But afterwards when he was gone, his enemies enforced them, and burdened him more cruelly, adding to his former faulte, that he had broken the images of Mercurie: and had committed sacriledge in counterfeiting in iest and mockery the holy ceremonies of the mysteries: and blue into the eares of the people, B that both the one and the other proceeded of one set conspiracie, to change and alter the government of the state of the cittie. Vpon these informations, the people tooke it in so ill parte, that they committed all to prifone, that were in any sorte accused or suspected thereof, and would neuer let them come to their answer: and moreouer dyd much repent them that they had not condemned Alcibiades, vpon so great complaints and informations as were exhibited against him, while his offense was in question before them. And the furie and hatred of the people was such towards him, that if any of Alcibiades friends and acquaintance came within their daunger, they were the worse handled for his sake. Thucydides dyd not name his accusers, but some other doe name Diocides and Teucer: amongst whom, Phrynicus the Comical poet is one, who discouereth it in his verses, by bringing in one that speaketh thus to C the image of Mercury.

poet.*

My good friend Mercury, I pray thee take good heede, that thou fall not, and breake thy necke: for so thou mightst me breede, both daunger and distrust, and though I gildes be, some Diocides falsly might accuse and trouble me.

Mercury answereth.

Take thou no thought for me, my selfe I shall well saue: and will forsee full well therewith that Teucer (that false knaue) shall not the money get, which he by lawre hath wonne, for his promouers bribing parte, and accusation.

And yet for all this, these tokens doe shewe no certaintie of any thing. For one of them being asked, howe he could knowe them by their faces in the night, that had broken and defaced these images? he answered, that he knewe them well enough by the brightnes of the moone. And hereby it appeareth playnely that he was periuerted, bicause that the same night, on the which this fact was committed, there was a coniunction of the moone. This dyd a litle trouble and staye men of iudgement: howbeit the common sorte of people this notwithstanding, dyd not leaue to be as sharpe set, to receyue all accusations and informations, that were brought in against him, as euer they were before. Now there was among the prisoners whose cause was hanging before them, the orator Andocides (whom Hellanicus the historiographer describeth to descend of the race of Phylus) whom they tooke to be a man that hated the government of the common people, and bent altogether to fauour the small number of the nobilitie. But one of the chiefeft occasions why he was suspected to be one of them that had broken the images, was: for that hard by his house there was a fayer great image set vp in olde time, by the familie or tribe of the Egeides, and that alone amongst all the rest of so many famous images, was leste whole and vnbroken: whereupon it is called at this daye, the Mercury of Andocides, and is so called generally of euery bodye, albeit the inscription sheweth the contrarie. Andocides being in prifone, chanced to fall in acquaintance with one Timon, with whom he was more familiar then with all the rest, who was also prisoner with him for the self cause. This Timon was a man not so well known as he, but besides, a wife man, and very hardie. He perswaded him, and put into his head, that he should accuse him selfe, and certaine F other with him: for taking the matter vpon him, and confessing it, he should receyue grace & pardone, according to the course and promise of the lawe. Where contrairilie, if he should stande

*Andocides
the orator cast into prifon.*

A stande vpon the cutesie of the iudges sentence, he might easely endaunger him self: bicause iudgements in such cases are vncertaine to all people, and most to be doubted and feared towards the riche. And therefore he told him it were his best waye, if he looked into the matter wisely, by lying to saue his life, rather then to suffer death with shame, and to be condemned upon this false accusation. Also he sayed if he would haue regarde to the common wealth, that it should in like case be wisely done of him, to put in daunger a few of those (which stood doubtfull whether in trothe they were any of them or not) to saue from the furie of the people, and terror of death, many honest men, who in deede were innocent of this lewde fact. Timon words and persuations wrought such effect with Andocides, that they made him yield vnto them, & brought him to accuse him selfe, & certaine other with him: by meanes where- B of Alcibiades according to the lawe had his pardon. But all such as he named and accused, were euery man put to death, sauing such as saued them selues by running awaye. Furthermore, to shadowe his accusation with some appaurance of trothe, Andocides among those that were accused, dyd accuse also certain of his owne seruants. Now though the people had no more occasion to occupie their busie heades about the breakers of these images, yet was not their malice thus appeased against Alcibiades, vntill they sent the galley called Salaminiana, commanding those they sent by a speciall commissiō to seeke him out, in no case to attempt to take him by force, nor to laye holde on him by violence: but to vse him with all the good wordes and courteous manner that they possibly could, & to will him only to appeare in person before the people, to answer to certaine accusations put vp against him. If otherwise C they should haue vsed force, they feared muche least the armie would haue mutined on his behalfe within the countrie of their enemies, and that there would haue grown some sedition amongst their souldiers. This might Alcibiades haue easely done, if he had bene disposed. For the souldiers were very forte to see him departe, perceyuing that the warres should be drawn out now in length, and be much prolonged vnder Nicias, seeing Alcibiades was taken from them, who was the only spur that pricked Nicias forward to doe any seruice: and that Lamachus also, though he were a valliant man of his handes, yet he lacked honour and authority in the armie, bicause he was but a meane man borne, and poore besides. Now Alcibiades for a farewell, disappointed the ATHENIANS of winning the cittie of MESSINA: for they hauing intelligence by certaine priuate persones within the cittie, that it would yield vp into D their handes, Alcibiades knowing them very well by their names, bewrayed them vnto those that were the SYRACUSANS friends: whereupon all this practise was broken utterly. Afterwards when he came to the cittie of THURIES, so sone as he had landed, he went and hid him selfe incontinently in such sorte, that such as sought for him, could not finde him. Yet there was one that knewe him where he was, and sayed: Why, how now Alcibiades, darest thou not trust the iustice of thy countrie? Yes very well (quoth he) and it were in another matter: but my life standing vpon it, I would not trust mine own mother, fearing least negligently she should put in the blacke beane, where she should cast in the white. For by the first, condemnation of death was signified: and by the other, pardone of life. But afterwards, hearing that the ATHENIANS for malice had condemned him to death: well, quoth he, they shall knowe I am yet alieue. E Now the manner of his accusation and inditement framed against him, was found written in this sorte. The Salus the sonne of Cimon, of the village of LACIADES, hath accused, and doth accuse Alcibiades, the sonne of Clinias, of the village of SCAMBONIDES, to haue offended against the goddesses, Ceres & Proserpina, counterfeiting in mockery their holy mysteries, & shewing them to his familiar friends in his house, him selfe apparelled and arrayed in a long vestemēt or cope, like vnto the vestemēt the priest weareth when he sheweth these holy sacred mysteries: & naming him selfe the priest, Polytion the torch bearer, and Theodorus of the village of PHYGEA the verger, & the other lookers on, brethren, and fellows sorners with them, & all done in manifest contēpt & derision, of holy ceremonies and mysteries of the Eumolpides, the religious priests & ministers of the sacred tēple of the cittie of EPYRSIN. So Alcibiades for F his contēpt & not appearing, was condēned, and his goodes confiscate. Besides this condemnation, they decreed also, that all the religious priestes & women should bāne & accurse him. But hereunto answered, one of the Nunnes called Theano, the daughter of Menon, of the village of AGRADIA, saying: that she was professed religious, to praye and to blesse, not to curse and banne. After this most grievous sentence and condemnation passed against him, Alcibiades, departed out of the citie of THYRES, & went into the countie of PELOPONNESVS, where he continued a good season in the citie of ARGOS. But in the ende fearing his enemies, and having no hope to returne againe to his owne countie with any safety: he sent vnto SPARTA to haue safe conduct and licence of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that he might come and dwell in their countie, promising them he would doe them more good being now their friend, then he euer dyd them hurte, while he was their enemy. The LACEDÆMONIANS graunted his request, & receyued him very willingly into their citie: where euen vpon his first coming, he dyd three things. The first was: That the LACEDÆMONIANS by his persuation & procurement, dyd determine speedily to send ayde to the SYRACUSANS, whom they had long before delayed: & so they sent Gylippus their captaine, to ouerthrowe the ATHENIANS armie, which they had sent thither. The second thing he did for them, was: That he made them of GRECE to beginne waite upon the ATHENIANS. The third, & greatest matter of importance, was: That he dyd counsell them to fortifie the citie of DECELEA, which was within the territories of ATTICA: selfe: which consumed, and brought the power of the ATHENIANS lower, then any other thing whatsoeuer he could haue done. And if he were welcome, & well esteemed in SPARTA, for the seruice he dyd to the common wealth: much more he wanne the loue & good willes of priuate men, for that he liued after the LACONIAN manner. So as they that sawe his skynne scraped to the flethe, & sawe him washe him selfe in cold water, & howe he dyd eate browne bread, & suppe of their blacke brothe: would haue doubted (or to saye better, neuer haue beleued) that such a man had euer kept cooke in his house, nor that he euer had seene so muche as a perfuming panne, or had touched clothe of tisse made at MILETUM. For among other qualities & properties he had (whereof he was full) this as they saye was one, whereby he most robbed mens hartes: that he could frame altogether with their manners and facions of life, transforming him selfe more easily to all manner of shapcs, then the Camelion. For it is reported, that the Camelion cannot take white culler: but Alcibiades could put upon him any maners, customes or facions, of what nation soeuer, & could followe, exercise, & counterfeite them when he would, as well the good as the bad. For in SPARTA, he was very paynefull, & in continuall exercise: he liued sparingly with litle, & led a straight life. In IONIA, to the contrary: there he liued daintely & superfluously, & gaue him selfe to all mirth & pleasure. In THRACIA, he dranke euer, or was wayles a horse backe. If he came to Tissaphernes, lieutenant of the mightie king of PERSIA: he farre exceeded the magnificence of PERSIA in pompe & sumptuousnes. And these things notwithstanding, neuer altered his naturall condition from one facion to another, neither dyd his manners (to saye truly) receyue all sortes of chaunges. But bicause peraduenture, if he had shewed his naturall disposition, he might in diuers places where he came, haue offended those whose companie he kept, he dyd with such a vifer & cloke disguise him selfe, to fit their manners, whom he companied with, by transforming him selfe into their naturall countenance. As he that had seene him when he was at SPARTA, to haue looked upon the outward man, would haue sayed as the common prouerbe sayeth:

It is not the sonne of Achilles, but Achilles selfe:

Euen so it is euen he, whom Lycyrus brought vp. But he that had inwardly seene his naturall doings, & good will in deede lyke naked before him: would haue sayed contrarie, as they saye commonly in another language.

This woman is no chaungeling.

For he entertained Queene Timea, King Agis wife of SPARTA, so well in his absence, he being abroade in the warres: that he got her with childe, & she her selfe denied it not. For the being brought a bed of a sonne, who was named Leotychides, openly to the world called him by that name: but when she was amongst her familiars & very friends, she called him softly Alcibiades, she was so farre in loue with him. And Alcibiades casting out the matter, sayed he had done it for no hurte, nor for any lust of flethe to satysfie his desire: but only to leaue of his race, to reigne amongst the LACEDÆMONIANS. This matter was brought by diuers vnto king

A king: Agis eares, who at the length beleued it: but specially when he beganne to make a reckoning of the time, how long it was sence he laye with his wife. For lying with his wife one night when there was a terrible earthquake, he ranne out of his chamber for feare the house would fall on his head: so that it was tenne moneths after ere he laye again with her. Whereupon her sonne Leotychides being borne at the ende of tenne moneths, he sayed he was none of his: and this was the cause that Leotychides dyd not succede afterwards in the Kingdome, bicause he was not of the bloude royall. After the vnter ouerthrowe of the ATHENIANS in SICILIA, those of the Iles of CHIO and LESBOS, with the CYZICENTIANs, dyd send all about a tene ambassadours to SPARTA: to let the LACEDÆMONIANS vnderstand, they had good will to leaue the ATHENIANS, so they would send them ayde to defend them. The BOEOTIANs fauored those of LESBOS: Pharnabazus, the king of PERSIANS lieutenant, fauored the CYZICENTIANs. This notwithstanding, the LACEDÆMONIANS were better affected to helpe those of CHIO first, by the persuation of Alcibiades, who tooke their matters in hande. And he tooke sea him selfe and went into ASIA, where he almost turned the countie of IONIA against the ATHENIANS: and keeping allwayes with the generallcs of the LACEDÆMONIANS, he dyd muche hurte the ATHENIANS. Yet notwithstanding, king Agis dyd beare him ill will, partly for the iniurie he dyd him in dishonoring and desling his wife, and partly also, for that he enuid his glorie: bicause the rumour rane all about, that the most parte of the goodly exploytes of these warres dyd happen well, by Alcibiades meanes. Other also of the greatest authoritie among the SPARTANS, that were most ambitious among them, beganne in their mindes to be angrie with Alcibiades, for the enuie they bare him: who were of so great power, that they procured their gouernours to write their letters to their captaines in the field, to kill him. Alcibiades hearing of this, dyd no whit desist to doe all he could for the benefit of the LACEDÆMONIANS: yet he had an eye behind him, saying all occasions to fall into their handes. So in the ende, for more fury of his persone, he went vnto Tissaphernes, one of the king of PERSIANS lieutenantes, with whom he wanne incontinently faye credit, that he was the first & chiefeft persone he had about him. For this barbarous man being no simple persone, but rather malicious, & subtil of nature, and that loued fine & crafty men: dyd wonder how he could so easily turne from one manner of liuing to another, and also at his quicke witte and vnderstanding. Moreouer, his company and manner to passe the time awaye, was commonly maruelous full of mirth and pleasure, and he had such pleasure comely deuises with him, that no man was of so follen a nature, but he would make him merie, nor so churlishe, but he would make him gentle. So that both those that feared him, and also enuid him: they were yet glad to see him, & it did them good to be in his companie, & vsf talke with him. In so muche as this Tissaphernes (that otherwise was a churlishe man, and naturally hated the GRECIANS) dyd geue him selfe so muche vnto Alcibiades flatteries, and they pleased him so well: that he him selfe dyd studie to flatter Alcibiades againe, and make muche of him. For he called Alcibiades his fayer house of pleasure, & goodly prospect: notwithstanding he had many goodly gardens, sweete springes, grene arbours and pleasant meadowes, and those in all royall and magnificent manner. Alcibiades despairing vnto find any safetie or friend-shippe among the SPARTANS, and fearing on thother side king Agis also: he beganne to speake ill of them, and to disgrace all that they dyd, to Tissaphernes. By this practise he stayed Tissaphernes from ayding them so friendly as he might: moreouer, he dyd not vnterly destroye the ATHENIANS. For he perswaded him that he should furnishe the LACEDÆMONIANS but with litle money, to let them diminishie and consume by litle and litle: to the ende that after one had troubled and weakened the other, they both at the length should be the easier for the King to overcome. This barbarous man dyd easily consent to this deuise: All the world then sawe he loued Alcibiades, and esteemed of him very muche: in so muche as he was sought to, and regarded of all handes of the GRECIANS. Then were the ATHENIANS forie, and repented them when they had receyued so great losse & hurte, for that they had decreed to severely against Alcibiades, who in like manner was very sorrowfull to see them brought to so harde termes, fearing, if the citie of ATHENS came to destruction, that he him selfe should fall in the ende into the handes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, who maliced him to the death. Now about that time, all the power of the ATHENIANS were almost in the Ile of SAMOS, from whence with their armie by sea, they fought to suppress the rebelles that were vp against them, and to keepe all that which yet remained. For they were yet prettily strong to resist their enemies, at the least by sea: but they stood in great feare of the power of Tisaphernes, and of the hundred & fiftie gallyes which were reported to be coming out of the countie of PERSIA, to the ayde of their enemies, which if they had come, the citie of ATHENS had bene utterly spoiled, and for euer without hope of recovery. The which Alcibiades vnderstanding, sent secretly vnto the chiefe men that were in the armie of the ATHENIANS at SAMOS, to geue them hope he would make Tisaphernes their friende: howbeit not of any desire he had to gratifie the people, nor that he trusted to the communalitie of ATHENS, but only to the honorable, and honest citizens, and that conditionally so as they had the harre and corage, to bridle a litle the ouer licentiousnes and insolencie of the common people, & that they would take vpon them the authoritie to gouerne, and to redresse their state, and to preferre the citie of ATHENS from finall and vtter destruction. Vpon this aduertisement, all the heades & chiefe men dyd geue very good eare vnto it: sauing only Phrynichus, one of the captaynes, and of the towne of DIRADES. Who mistrusting (that was true in dede) that Alcibiades cared not which ende went forward, nor who had the chief gouernment of ATHENS, the nobilitie, or the communalitie, and dyd but seeke all the deuises and wayes he could, to returne againe if it might be possible, in any manner of sorte, and that he dyd but currie fauour with the Nobilitie, blaming, and accusing the people: he tooke altogether against the motion, whereupon Alcibiades deuise was not followed. And hauing now shewed him selfe open enemy to Alcibiades, he dyd secretly aduertise Astiochus then admirall to the LACEDÆMONIANS, of Alcibiades practise, and warned him to take heede of him, and to laye him vp safe, as a double dealer, and one that had intelligence with both sides: but he vnderstood not how it was but one traitour to speake to another. For this Astiochus was a follower of Tisaphernes for his priuate commoditie: and perceyuing Alcibiades in such credit with him, he dyd discouer to Alcibiades all that Phrynichus had aduertised him. Alcibiades straight sent men of purpose to SAMOS, vnto the captaynes there, to accuse Phrynichus of the treason he had revealed against them. Those of the counsaill there, receyuing this intelligence: were highly offended with Phrynichus. So, he seeing no better waye to saue him selfe for making of this fault, went about to make amends with committing a worse fault. Thereupon he sent againe to Astiochus, complaining muche he had disclosed him: and yet neuertheles he promised him, if he would keepe his counsaill, that he would deliuer the whole flecte and armie of the ATHENIANS into his handes. Howbeit this treason of Phrynichus dyd the ATHENIANS no hurte at all, by reason of Astiochus counter treason: for he dyd let Alcibiades againe vnderstand what offer Phrynichus had made him. Phrynichus looking to be charged with this againe, the second time before the counsaill, by meanes of Alcibiades dyd first aduertise the chief of the armie of the ATHENIANS, that their enemies would come and set vpon them, and where, and how: and gaue them therefore warning to keepe neere their shippes, to make a strong watche, and to fortifie them selues with all speede, the which forthwith they dyd. And as they were about it, there came other letters from Alcibiades, by the which he dyd warne them againe to take heede of Phrynichus, because he had practised against with their enemies, to deliuer the whole armie of ATHENS into their handes. But they gaue no credit to his second letters: for they thought that he knowing the preparations and mindes of the enemies, would serue his owne time with the false accusing of Phrynichus. Notwithstanding this, there was some falsehood in fellowshippes: for one Hermion, openly in the market place, stabbed Phrynichus in with a dagger, & killed him. The facte being pleaded in lawe, and abroughly considered of: the death bodie by the sentence of the people was condemned for a traitour: and Hermion the murderer, and his fellowes, were crowned in recompence of their facte they had done so kill a traitour to the common wealth. Wherefore those that were Alcibiades friends, being at that time the stronger, and greatest men of the counsaill in the armie at SAMOS: they sent one Pisander to ATHENS, to attempt to alter the gouernment, and to encourage the noble men to take vpon them the authoritie, & to plucke it from the people; assuring them that Tisaphernes would geue them ayde to doe it, by meanes of Alcibiades, who would make

A him their friende. This was the culler and cloke wherewith they serued their turnes, that dyd change the gouernment of ATHENS, and that brought it into the handes of a small number of nobilitie: for they were in all but foure hundred, and yet they called them selues fife thousand. But so fone as they felt them selues strong, and that they had the whole authoritie of gouernment, without contradiction in their handes: they made then no more reckoning of mistrusted their citizens, who founde the change of gouernment very strange: and partly also because they were of opinion that the LACEDÆMONIANS (who at all times dyd most fauour the gouernment of Nobilitie) would be better inclined to make peace with them. Now the common people that remained still in the citie, sturred not, but were quier against their willes, for feare of danger, because there were many of them slaine, that boldly tooke upon them in open presence to resist these foure hundred. But those that were in the campe, in the Ile of SAMOS, hearing these newes, were so grievously offended: that they resolved to returne incontinently againe, vnto the haue of PIREÆA. First of all, they sent for Alcibiades, whom they chose their captaine: then they commaunded him straightly to leade them against their tyrantes, who had vsurped the libertie of the people of ATHENS. But neuertheles he dyd not therein, as another would haue done in this case, seeing him selfe so sodainly crept againe in fauour with the common people: for he dyd not thinke he should incontinently please and gratifie the in all things, though they had made him now their generall ouer all their shippes and so great an armie, being before but a banished man, a vacabond, and a fugitiue. But to the contrarie, as it became a generall worthe of such a charge, he considered with him selfe, that it was his parte wisely to staye those, who would in a rage and furie carelesly cast them selues awaye, and not suffer them to doe it. And truly Alcibiades was the cause of the preferring of the citie of ATHENS at that time, from vtter destruction. For if they had sodainly (according to their determination) departed from SAMOS to goe to ATHENS: the enemies finding no man to let them, might easely haue wonne all the countie of IONIA, of HALLESBORT, and of all the other Iles without stroke striking, whilst the ATHENIANS were busie fighting one against another in ciuill warres, and within the compasse of their owne walles. This Alcibiades alone, & no other, dyd preuent, not only by perswading the whole armie, and declaring the inconueniēce thereof, which would fall out upon their sodaine departure: but also by intreating D some particularly aparte, and keeping a number backe by very force. To bring this about, one Thraßibulus of the towne of STIRA, dyd helpe him muche: who went through the armie, and cried out upon them that were bent to enterprise this iorney. For he had the biggest and lowdest voyce as they saye, of any man that was in all the citie of ATHENS. This was a notable acte, and a great peece of seruice done by Alcibiades: that he promised fife hundred saile of the PHENICIANS (which the LACEDÆMONIANS assuredly looked for, in their ayde from the king of PERSIA) should not come at all, or els if they came, it should be in the fauour of the ATHENIANS. For he departed immediately, and went with great speede to Tisaphernes: whom he handled in such sorte, that he brought not the shippes that laye at rode before the citie of ASPENDA, and so he brake promise with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Therefore Alcibiades was maruelously blamed and accused, both of the one & the other side, to haue altered Tisaphernes minde, but chiefly of the LACEDÆMONIANS: who sayed that he had perswaded this barbarous captaine, he should neither ayde the one nor the other, but rather to suffer them one to deuoure and destroye eache other. For it had bene out of doubt, if this great flecte and navy of the Kings had come, to ioyne their force with either partie: that they had taken from the one of them, the signotie and domination of the sea. Shortly after, the foure hundred noble men that had vsurped the authoritie and gouernment of ATHENS, were vntiedly driuen awaye and overthrowen, by meanes of the friendly ayde, & assistance that Alcibiades friends gaue those that tooke the peoples parte. So the citizens were very well pleased with Alcibiades, in so muche as they sent for him to returne when he thought good. But he iudging with him selfe it would be no honour nor grace vnto him to returne without some well deserving, & before he had done some greater exployte, as only vpon the peoples fauour and good will, whereas otherwise his returne might be both glorious and triumphant: departed first from SAMOS with a small number of gallyes, and went sailing vp and downe the Iles of C^os and of G^os. There he was aduertised, that Mindarus, the admirall of the LACEDÆMONIANS, was gone with all his fleet vnto the fraight of HELLESPONT, and tharthe captaines of the ATHENIANS gaue chase vnto him. Thereupon he went also and sayled thither with speede, to ayde the ATHENIANS: and by very good fortune came with eightene gallyes euen at the very instant, whie they were both in the midst of their fight, with all their shippes before the citie of ABYDOS. The battell was cruelly foughten betwene them from morning till night, both the one and the other hauing the better in one parte of the battell, and the worst in another place. Now at the first discouerie of Alcibiades comming, both partes had in deepe contrarie imaginations of him. For the enemies tooke harte vnto them: and the ATHENIANS beganne to be afear'd. But Alcibiades set vp straight his flagge in the topp of the galley of his admirall, to shewe what he was. Wherewithall, he set vpon the PELOPONNESIANS that had the better, & had certen gallyes of the ATHENIANS in chase: whereupon the PELOPONNESIANS gaue ouer their chase, & fled. But Alcibiades followed them so lustely, that he ranne diuers of them a ground, & brake their shippes, & slue a great number of men that leapt into the sea, in hope to saue them selues by swimming a lande. So notwithstanding that Pharnabazus was come thither to ayde the LACEDÆMONIANS, and dyd his best indeuour to saue their gallyes by the sea thore: yet the ATHENIANS in the end wane thirtie gallyes of their enemies, and saued all their owne, and so dyd set vp certaine flagges of triumphe and victorie. Alcibiades hauing now happily gotten this glorious victorie, would nedes goe shewe him selfe in triumphe vnto Tisaphernes. So hauing prepared to present him with goodly riche presents, and appointed also a conuenient traine & number of sayle mete for a generall, he tooke his course directly to him. But he found not that entertainment he hoped for. For Tisaphernes standing in great hazard of displeasure, and feare of punishment at the Kings handes, hauing long time before bene defamed by the LACEDÆMONIANS, who had coplained of him, that he dyd not fulfill the Kings commaundement, thought that Alcibiades was arriued in very happy hower: whereupon he kept him prisoner in the citie of SARDIS, supposing the wrong he had done, would by this meanes easily discharge, and purge him to the King. Yet at the ende of thirte dayes, Alcibiades by fortune got a horse, and stealing from his keepers, fled vnto the citie of CLAZOMENES: and this dyd more increafe the suspition they had of Tisaphernes, because they thought that vnder hand he had wrought his libertie. Alcibiades toke then sea againe, and went to seeke out the armie of the ATHENIANS. Which when he had founde, & heard newes that Mindarus and Pharnabazus were together in the citie of CIZICVM: he made an oration to his souldiers, & declared vnto them how it was very requisite they should fight with their enemies, both by sea and by lande, and moreouer that they should assault them within their fortres and castells, because otherwise they could haue no money to defraye their charges. His oration ended, he made them immediatly hoyle sayle, and so to goe lye at anker in the Ile of P^onevs: where he tooke order that they should keepe in all the pinnacles and briganines among the shippes of warre, that the enemy might haue no manner of intelligence of his coming. The great showes of rayne also, with thunder and darke weather that fell out sodainly vpon it, dyd greatly further him in his attempt & enterprise: in so muche as not only his enemies, but the ATHENIANS that were there before, knewe nothing of his comming. So some of their reckoning, that they could doe lile or nothing all that daye: yet he made them sodainly imbarke, and hoyle sayle. They were no sooner in the mayne sea, but they directed a farre of the gallyes of their enemies, which laye at rode before the haven of CYZICVM. And fearing least the great number of his fleet would make them flye, and take lande before he could come to them: he commaunded certaine captaines to staye behinde, & to rowe softly after him, and him selfe with fortie gallyes with him, went towards the enemies to provoke them to fight. The enemies supposing there had bene no more shippes, then those that were in sight: dyd fet out presently to fight with them. They were no sooner ioyned together, but Alcibiades shippes that came behinde, were also directed: the enemies were so afear'd therat, that they cast about, and fled straight. Alcibiades leauing his fleet, followed the chase with twentie of the best gallyes he had, and draue them a lande. Thereupon he landed also, and pursued

A lued them so courageously at their heeles, that he slue a great nuber of them on the mayne lade; who thought by flying to haue saued them selues. Moreouer, Mindarus, & Pharnabazus, being come out of the citie to rescue their people, were ouerthrowen both: He slue Mindarus in the field, fighting valiantly: as for Pharnabazus, he cowardly fled away. So the ATHENIANS spoyled the dead bodies (which were a great number) of a great deale of armour and riches, and tooke besides all their enemies shippes. After they tooke the citie of CIZICVM, Pharnabazus hauing left it. Then the PELOPONNESIANS being slaine, they had not only the possession of the whole countrie of HELLESPONT, which they kept: but they draue their enemies by force, out of all partes of the sea. There were at that time certaine letters intercepted, whereby a secrete raie gaue aduertisement vnto the Ephors at SPARTA, of the ouerthrowe in this sorte. All B is lost, Mindarus is slaine, our people dye for hunger, and we knowe not what to doe. Now the souldiers of ATHENS that had bene at this torney and ouerthrowe, grew to suche a pryde and reputation of them selues, that they would not, and disdained also to serue with the other souldiers that had bene beaten many times, & went away with the worse. Where they to the contrarie had neuer bene ouercome, as a litle before it happened, that the captain Thrasyllus had bene ouerthrowen by the citie of EPHESVS. And for this ouerthrowe, the EPHESIANS had set vp a triumphe, and token of brasse, to the vtter shame and ignominie of the ATHENIANS. For the which Alcibiades souldiers dyd very muche rebuke Thrasyllus men, and dyd exceedingly extoll their captain and them selues, and would neither encampe with them, neither haue to doe with them, nor yet keepe them companie. Vntill suche time as Pharnabazus C came with a great armie againt them, as well of footmen as horsemen, when they rāe a raging upon the ABYDENIAN stand then Alcibiades went to the rescue of them, and gaue Pharnabazus battell, and ouerthrew him once againe, and dyd together with Thrasyllus chase him euen vntill darke night. Then both Alcibiades and Thrasyllus souldiers dyd companie together, one reioicing with another: and so returned all with great ioye into one campe. The next morning Alcibiades set vp a triumphe for the victorie he had the daye before, and then went to spoyle and destroye Pharnabazus countrie, where he was gouernour, & no man durst once come out to meete him. In this rode there were taken prisoners, certaine priestes and Nunnes of the coutrie: but Alcibiades freely deliuered them afterwards without ranfome. And preparing to make warres againt the CHALCEDONIANS, who were reuolted from the ATHENIANS, & had receuyed a garrison & gouernour of the LACEDÆMONIANS into their citie: he was aduertised that they had brought in all their goods & cartells out of the fieldes, & had deliuered them to the safe custodie of the BITHYNIANS, who were their neighbours & friends. Hereupon he led his armie into their borders, & sent a herald before to summonne the BITHYNIANS, to make amends for the wrōg they had done the ATHENIANS. The BITHYNIANS fearing least Alcibiades would set upon them, dyd straight deliuer him the goodes they had as afore in their custodie, & moreouer, made a league with the ATHENIANS besides. That done, he went & layed seige to the citie of CHALCEDON, the which he enuironed all about from the one side of the sea to the other. Pharnabazus came thither, thinking to haue raised the seige. And Hippocrates, a captain of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that was gouernour of the citie, E assembled all the force he was able to make within the same, & made a sayle out also vpon the ATHENIANS at the very same time. Whereupon Alcibiades putting his men in order of battell, so as they might geue a charge vpon them both at one instant: he fought so valiantly, that he forced Pharnabazus to runne his waye with shame enough, & slue Hippocrates in the field, with a great number of his men. Then tooke he the seas againe, to goe towards the countrie of HELLESPONT, to get some money, where vpon the sodaine he did take the citie of SELYBREA: because he valiantly put him selfe in hazard before the time appointed him. For certain of his friends within, with whom he had secret practise, had geuen him a token, that when time serued, they would shewe a burning torch in the ayer at midnight: but they were cōpelled to shew this fier in the ayer before they were ready, for feare least one of their cōfederacie would bewraye the matter, who sodainly repeted him. Now this torch burning in the ayer, was set vp before Alcibiades was ready with his cōpanie. But he perceiving the signe set, tooke about thirtie men with him in his cōpanie, & rāe with them to the walles of the citie.

hauling commaunded the rest of his armie to followe him with all speede possible. The gallie was opened to him, and to his thirtie men: besides them there followed twentie other light armed men. Howbeit they were no soner entered the cittie, but they heard the citizens armed come against them: so that there was no hope to scape, if he dyd tarie their coming. Neuertheles, considering that vntill that present time he was neuer ouercome in battell, where he had taken charge, it grieved him very muche to flye: wherefore it straight came in his head to make silence by sound of trumpet, and after silence made, he caused one of them that were about him to make proclamation with a lowde voyce, that the SELYBRIANIANS should not take armes against the ATHENIANS. This cooled them a litle that would sayne haue bene doing, bicause they supposed that all the armie of the ATHENIANS had bene already in the cittie: the other on the contrarie side, were very glad to talke of peace, without any further daunger. And as they beganne to passe vpon composition, the rest of Alcibiades armie was come on. Now he thynking in dedde (which was true) that the SELYBRIANIANS sought nothing but peace, and fearing least the THRACIANS which were many in number (& came with good will to serue him in that iorney) would sacke and spoyle the cittie, he made them all to goe out againe: and so concluding peace with the chiefe of the SELYBRIANIANS, he dyd them no more hurte, upon their humble submission, but made them paye him a summe of money, and so leauing a garrison of the ATHENIANS within the cittie, he departed thence. Whylest Alcibiades was in treatie with the SELYBRIANIANS, the other ATHENIAN captaines that laye at the siege of CHALCEDON, made an agreement with Pharnabazus, that he should geue them a summe of money, & giue vp the towne into the ATHENIANS handes, to enioye it as they had before. And with expresse condition also, that the ATHENIANS should make no rodes into Pharnabazus dominions, to hurte or spoyle any of his: and likewise should be bounde to geue good safe conduct vnto the ambassadours of the ATHENIANS, to goe and come safe from time to time, to the king of PERSIA. The other captaines being sworn to this peace, Pharnabazus conditioned also, that Alcibiades at his returne should likewise be sworn to the peace and conditions thereof. But Alcibiades sayed, he would not be sworn at all, vntill Pharnabazus were first sworn for his parte. Thus when othes were taken of either side, Alcibiades went also against those of BYZANTIUM, who in like case had rebelled against the ATHENIANS. At his first coming thither, he enuironned the cittie round about with a walles. Afterwards he practised with two secret friends of his, Anaxilauus, & Lycurgus, & certain other D within the cittie, who promised him to deliuer it into his handes, so they might be assured he would doe them no hurte. To culler this practise, he gaue it out, that he must nedes leaue the siege, & departe with speede, for certain newes that were come out of IONIA: & thereupon he imbarcked presently, & wet out of the haven at none dayes with all his shippes, howbeit he returned again the same night. And going a lande with the choycest & best armed men he had, he approached the walles of the cittie, without any manner of noyse, hauing left order with them that remained in the shippes, that in the meane season they should rowe with all force into the haven, with as great cries and shewes as might be, to feare and trouble the enemies partely to feare the BIZANTIANS the more with their sodaine coming amog them, & partely that his cōfederates within the cittie, might with better opportunitie receiue him & his cōpanie, into the towne with the more assured safety, whilest euery man ranne to the haven, to resist them that were vpon the gallyes. Neuertheles they wet not away vnthought with. For those that laye in garrison within the cittie, some of the PELOPONNESIANS, other BOROTIANS, & other MEGARIANS, dyd so vallyantly repulse them that came out of their gallyes, that they draue the to retire abord againe. Afterwards hearing how the ATHENIANS were entred: the cittie on the other side, they put them selues in battell raye, & went to mete them. The battell was terrible of both partes: but Alcibiades in the ende obtained victorie, leading the right winge of his battell, & Theramenes the lefte. The victorie being gotten, he tooke 300. of his enemies prisoners, who had escaped the furie of the battell. But after the battell, there was not a BYZANTINE put to death, neither banished, nor his good cōfiscated: bicause it was capitulated by Alcibiades with his cōfederates, that neither he, nor his, should hurt any of the BIZANTIANS either in persone or goodes, nor any way should rille them. And Anaxilauus being afterwards accused of treason in

A LACEDÆMON, for this practise: he answered, and iustified him self in suche sorte, that they could not finde he had committed the faulte layed vnto his charge. For he sayed, that he was no LACEDÆMONIAN, but a BYZANTINE: & that he sawe not LACEDÆMON in daunger, but BYZANTIUM, which the enemies had compassed about with a walles they had built, that it was vnpossible to bring any thing into the cittie. Moreouer he alleaged, that they hauing very smal store of corne within the cittie (as was true in dedde) the PELOPONNESIANS, and BOROTIANS, that laye there in garrison dyd eate it vp, while the poore BYZANTIANS them selues, their wiues and children, dyed for very hunger. Therefore it could not be sayed of him, that he had betrayed his countrie, but rather that he had deliuered it from the miseries and calamities the warres brought vpon it: wherein he had followed the example of the honestest men of B LACEDÆMON, who dyd acknowledge nothing honest and iuste, but that which was necessary and profitable for their countrie. The LACEDÆMONIANS hearing his reasons he alleaged for his purgation, were ashamed to condemne him, and therefore they let him goe. Now Alcibiades desirous in the ende to see his natie countrie againe (or to speake more truly, that his contry men should see him) after he had for many times ouerthrowen their enemies in battell: he hoysed saile, and directed his course towards ATHENS, bringing with him all the gallyes of the ATHENIANS richely furnished, and decked all about, with skutchines and targettes, and other armour and weapon gotten amongst the spoyles of his enemies. Moreover, he brought with him many other shippes, which he had wonne & broken in the warres, besides many ensignes and other ornaments: all which being compted together one with the other, made vp the number of two hundred shippes. Furthermore, where Darius SAMIAN writeth (who challengeth that he came of his house) that at his returne one Chryfogonus, an excellent player of the flute (that had wonne certaine of the Pythian games) dyd playe suche a note, that at the sounde thereof the galley slaues would keepe stroke with their owers, and that Calipides another excellent player of tragedies, playing the parte of a comedie, dyd stirre them to rowe, being in suche players garments as euery master of suche science vseth commonly to weare, presenting him selfe in Theater or stage before the people to shewe his arte: and that the admirall galley wherein him self was, entred the haven with a purple saile, as if some maske had come into a mans house after some great banquet made: neither Ephorus, nor Theopompus, nor Xenophon, make any mention of this at all. Furthermore, me thinks it should not be true, D that he returning from exile after so long a banishment, & hauing passed ouer such sorowes & calamities as he had susteined, would so proudly & presumptuously shewe him selfe vnto the ATHENIANS. But merely contrarie, it is most certain, that he returned in great feare & doubte. For when he was arriued in the haven of PIREÆ, he would not set foote a lande, before he first sawe his nephewe Euryptolemus, & diuers other of his friends from the hatches of his shippe, standing upon the sandes in the haven mouthe. Who were come thither to receiue and welcome him, & tolde him that he might be bolde to lande, without feare of any thing. He was no soner landed, but all the people ranne out of euery corner to see him, with so great loue and affection, that they tooke no heede of the other captaines that came with him, but clustred all to him only, & cried out for ioye to see him. Those that could come neere him, dyd welcome E & embrace him: but all the people wholly followed him. And some that came to him, put garlands of flowers vpon his head: & those that could not come neere him, sawe him a farre off, & the olde folkes dyd pointe him out to the yonger sorte. But this cōmon ioye was mingled notwithstanding, with reares & sorowe, when they came to thinke vpon their former misfortunes and calamities, & to cōpare them with their present prosperitie: waying with them selues also how they had not lost SICILIA, nor their hope in all things els had failed the, if they had deliuered them selues & the charge of their armie into Alcibiades handes, when they sent for him to appeare in persone before them. Considering also how he found the cittie of ATHENS in manner put from their seigniorie & cōmandement on the sea, & on the other side how their force by lande was brought vnto such extremitie, that ATHENS scarcely could defend her suburbs, the F cittie self being so deuinded & turmoiled with ciuill diffention: yet he gathered together those fewe, & small force that remained, & had now not only restored ATHENS to her former power & soueraintie on the sea, but had made her also a conqueror by lande. Now the decree for his repaire home againe, was past before by the people, at the instant request of Callias, the sonne A of Callesibrus, who dyd preferre it: as he him selfe dyd testifie in his elegies, putting Alcibiades in remembrance of the good turne he had done him, saying:

*I was the first that moued in open conference, the peoples voyce to call thee home, when thou wert banisht hence.

But notwithstanding, the people being assembled all in counsaill, Alcibiades came before them, and made an oration: wherein he first lamented all his mishappes, and founde him selfe grieved a litle with the wronges they had offred him, yet he imputed all in the end to his cursed fortune, and some spightfull god that enuid his glorie and prosperitie. Then he dilated at large the great hope their enemies had to haue aduantage of them: and therewithall perswaded the people to be of good courage, and asfeard of nothing that was to come. And to conclude, the people crowned him with crownes of golde, and chose him generall againe of ATHENS, with fouraine power and authoritie both by lande as by sea. And at that very instant it was decreed by the people, that he should be restored againe to all his goodes, and that the priestes Eumolpides should absolve him of all their curses, and that the herauldes should with open proclamation reuoke the execrations and cursinges they had thundered out against him before, by commaundement of the people. Vhereto they all agreed, and were very willing, saying Theodorus the bishoppe, who sayed: I dyd neither excommunicate him, nor curse him, if he hath done no hurte to the common wealth. Now Alcibiades florished in his chiefeft prosperitie, yet were there some notwithstanding that misliked very muche the time of his landing: saying it was very vnluckie and vnfortunate. For the very daye of his returne and annuall, fell out by chaunce on the feast which they call Plymeria, as you would saye, the washing daye, which they celebrate in honour of Minerua: on the which daye, the priestes that they call Praxiergides, doe make certen secret and hidden sacrifices and ceremonies, being the thye and twenty daye of the moneth of September, and doe take from the image of this goddesse, D all her rayment and iuells, and keepe the image close couered ouer. Hereupon the ATHENIANS doe ascribe that daye, for a most vnfortunate daye, & are very circumspect to doe any matter of importance on it. Moreouer, it was commonly scanned abroad of euery bodye, that it seemed the goddesse was not content, nor glad of Alcibiades returne: and that she dyd hide her selfe, because she would not see him, nor haue him come neere her. Notwithstanding all these toyces and ceremonies, when Alcibiades found euery thing fall out well at his returne, and as he would haue wished it: he armed a hundred gallyes presently, to returne againe to the warres. Howbeit he wisely regarded the time and solemnitie of celebration of these mysteries, and considerately stayed vntill they had finished all. And it fell out, that after the LACEDÆMONIANS had taken and fortified the citie of DECELEA, within the territorie of ATTICA, and that the enemies being the stronger in the field, dyd keepe the waye going from ATHENS to ELEVSIN, so as by no possible meanes they could make their solemne procession by lande, with such honour and deuotion as they were before accustomed to doe: and thereby all the sacrifices, dawnces, and many other holy deuowte ceremonies they were wonte to doe by the waye, in singing the holy songe of Iacchus, came of very necessitie to be left of, and cleane layed a side. Then Alcibiades thought he should doe a meritorious dede to the godds, and an acceptable to men, to bring the olde ceremonies vp againe vpon the said feast: and thereupon purposed to accompanie the procession, & defend it by power, against all inuasion & disturbance by the enemies. As one that foresawe one of those two things would come to passe. Either that Agis king of the LACEDÆMONIANS would not sturte at all against the sacred ceremonies, and by this meanes should much imbase and diminish his reputation and glorie: or if he dyd come out to the field, that he would make the battell very gratefull to the goddes,

A goddes, considering it should be in defence of his most holy feast and worshippe, and in the sight of his countrie, where the people should see and witnesse both, his valliantnes, and also his courage. Alcibiades being fully resoluod upon this proceffion, went and made the priestes Eumolpides, their vergers, and other their ministers and officers of these mysteries, priuie to his determination. Then he sent out skowtes to watche on the side of the hilles thereabouts, and to viewe the waye of their perambulation. The next morning very early he sent out light horsemen also to scowre the countrie. Then he made the priestes, the professed, and all the ministers of religion, goe in procession, together with those that followed the same: and he him selfe compassed them about with his armie on euery side, marching in battell raye, and very good order, and with great silence. This was an honorable and deuoute leading of an armie, B and such as if his greatest enemies would confesse a trothe, they could not but saye, Alcibiades had as muche shewed the office of a highe bishoppe, as of a noble souldier and good captaine. So he ended this procession, returning to ATHENS in all safe order againe, and nor an enemy that durst once looke out into the field to set vpon him. Now this dyd more increase the greatnes of his minde, and therewith the peoples good opinion of his sufficiency, and wife conduction of an armie: in so much as they thought him vnuincible, hauing the foueraigne power and authoritie of a generall. Furthermore, he spake so fayer to the poore people, and meane sorte, that they chiefly withed and desired he would take vpon him like a King: yea, and many went to him to perswade him in it, as though he should thereby withstand all enuie, and driue awaye the lawes and customes of trying of matters by the voyces of C the people, and all such fond deuises, as dyd destroye the state of the common weale. And furthermore, they layed it was very needefull that he alone should take vpon him the whole rule and gouernment of the citie, that he might dispose all things according to his will, and not stande in feare of flaunderous and wicked tongues. Now, whether Alcibiades euer had any minde to vsurpe the Kingdome, the matter is somewhat doubtfull. But this is certaine, the greatest men of the citie, fearing least in deede he ment some such thing, dyd hasten his departure as sone as they could possible, doing all other things according to his minde: and dyd assigne him such associates in his charge of generally, as he him selfe best liked. So in the ende, he departed with a flecte of a hundred gallyes, and first of all he fell with the Ile of ANDROS, where he ouercame by fight, the inhabitants of the said Ile, and certaine LACEDÆMONIANS that were amongst them: but he tooke not the citie, which was one of the first matters his enemies dyd accuse him for. For if euer man was ouerthrowen and enuid, for the estimation they had of his vallure and sufficiency, truly Alcibiades was the man. For the notable and sundry seruices he had done, wanne him such estimation of wisdome and valliantnes, that where he slacked in any seruice whatsoeuer, he was presently suspected, iudging the ill successe not in that he could not, but for that he would, not: and that where he undertooke any enterprise, nothing could withstand or lye in his waye. Hereupon the people perswading them selues, that immediately after his departure, they should heare that the Ile of CHIOS was taken, with all the countrie of IONIA: they were angrie they could haue no newes so sodaynly from him as they looked for. Moreouer, they dyd not consider the E lacke of money he had, and specially making warre with such enemies, as were euer relieved with the great king of PERSIANS ayde, and that for necessities sake he was sundrie times driuen to leaue his campe, to seeke money where he could get it, to paye his souldiers, and to mainteine his armie. Now for testimony hereof, the last accusation that was against him, was only for this matter. Lysander being sent by the LACEDÆMONIANS for admiral and generall of their armie by sea, vied such policie with CYRUS, the king of PERSIANS brother, that he got into his handes a great some of money: by meanes whereof he gaue vnto his mariners foure oboles a daye for their wages, where before they were wont to haue but three, and yet Alcibiades had muche a doe to furnishe his with three only a daye. For this cause, to get money, Alcibiades sailed into CARIA. But in the meane time Antiochus, whom Alcibiades had left his lieutenant behind him, and had geuen him charge of all the shippes in his absence, being a very skilfull sea man, but otherwise a haffie harebraynd foole, and of small capacite: he being expressly commaunded by Alcibiades not to fight in any case, though the enemies offered him battell, was so foolishly rash, and made so little reckoning of his straight commandement, that he armed his owne gallye, whereof him selfe was captain, and another besides, and went to the citie of EPHESVS, passing all alonge his enemies gallyes, reuiling & offering villany to those that stood upon the hatches of their gallyes. Lysander being maruelously prouoked by those wordes, went and encountered him at the first with a fewe shippes. The other captaines of the gallyes of the ATHENIANS, seeing Antiochus in daunger, went to ayde him, one after another. Then Lysander of his parte also let out all his whole flecte against him, and in the end ouercame them. Antiochus selfe was killed in the conflict, and many gallyes and men were taken prisoners: wherefore Lysander let vp shewes of triumphe in token of victorie. Alcibiades hearing these ill fauored newes, returned presently with all possible speede to SAMOS: and when he came thither, he went with all the rest of his flecte to offer Lysander battell. But Lysander quietly contenting him selfe with his first victorie: went not out against him. Now this victorie was no soner wonne, but one Thrasibulus the sonne of Thrason, Alcibiades enemy, went incontinently from the campe, and got him to ATHENS, to accuse Alcibiades to the people: whom he informed how all went to wracke, and that he had lost many shippes, for that he regarded not his charge, carelessly putting men in trust, whom he gaue to great credit to, because they were good fellows, and would drinke droncke with him, & were full of mariners mockes and knauish ieaftes, such as they vse commonly amongst them selues. And that he in the meane time tooke his pleasure abroad, here, and there, scraping money together where he could come by it, keeping good cheere, and feasting of the ABYDENIAN and IONIAN courtians, when the enemies armie was so neere theirs as it was. Moreover, they layed to his charge, that he dyd fortifie a castell in the countrie of THRACIA, neere vnto the citie of BISANTHE, for a place to retire him selfe vnto, either because he could not, or rather that he would not, liue any longer in his owne countrie. Vpon those accusations, the ATHENIANS geuing ouer credit to the reporte: dyd immediatly choose newe captaines, and thereby declared their milliking. Alcibiades hearing of this, and fearing lest they would doe him some worse harme, dyd leaue straight the ATHENIAN campe, and gathering a certaine number of straungers together, went of him selfe to make warre upon certaine free people of the THRACIANS, who were subiect to no prince nor state: where he got a maruelous masse of money together, by meanes whereof he dyd assure the GRECIANS inhabiting those marches, from all inuasion of forreine enemies. Now Tydemus, Menander, and Adimantus the ATHENIAN captaines, being afterwards in a place commonly called the goates river, with all the gallyes the citie of ATHENS had at that time upon that coast: vied euery morning commonly to goe to the sea, to offer battell to Lysander, who rode at an anchor before the citie of Lampsacus, with all the LACEDÆMONIAN armie by sea, and commonly returned againe to the place from whence they came, in very ill order, without either watche or warde, as men that were careles of their enemies. Alcibiades being on the lande nor farre off, and finding their great faulte and negligence: tooke his horse, & went to them, and told them that they laye on an ill shore, where there was no good rode, nor towne, and where they were driuen to seeke their vittells, as farre as to the citie of SESTOS, & that they suffered their mariners to leaue their shippes, & goe a lande when they laye at anchor, straggling vp and downe the countrie as they would them selues, without regarde that there laye a great armie of their enemies before them, readie to be set out at their generall commandement: and therefore he aduised them to remoue thence, and to goe cast anchor before the citie of SESTOS. Howbeit the captaines would not be aduised by him: and that which was worst of all, Tydemus, one of the captaines, stowtely commaunded him to get him awaye, as one that had nothing to doe with the matter, & that other had charge of the armie. Whereupon Alcibiades fearing they would purpose some treason against him, dyd departe presently from them. And as he went his waye, he layed to some of his friends which accompanied him out of the campe at his returne: that if the captaines of the ATHENIANS had not bene so rounde with him, he would haue forced the LACEDÆMONIANS to haue come to the battell in despite of their beardes, or els he would haue driuen them to forsake their shippes. Some tooke this for a glorious bragge: other thought he was like enough to haue done it, because he could haue brought

A brought from lande a great number of THRACIANS, both archers and horsemen, with whom he might haue geuen a charge vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS, and done great mischief vnto their campe. But now, how wisely Alcibiades dyd foresee the faultes he tolde the ATHENIAN captaines of their great misfortune & losse that followed incontinently, did to plainely witness it to the world. For Lysander came so fiercely upon them on a sodaine, that of all the shippes they had in their whole flecte, only eight gallyes were sau'd, with whom Conon fled: and the other being not much lesse then two hundred in number, were euery one of them taken and caried awaye, with three thousand prisoners whom Lysander put to death. Shortly after, he tooke the citie self of ATHENS, and rased their long walles euen to the ground. After this great and notable victorie, Alcibiades fearing fore the LACEDÆMONIANS, who then B brought let or interruption of any, were only Lords and Princes by sea and by lande: he went into the countrie of BITHYNIA, and caused great good to be brought after him, and tooke a maruelous summe of money with him, besides great riches he left also in the castles of THRACIA, where he dyd remaine before. Howbeit he lost much of his goodes in BITHYNIA, which certaine THRACIANS dwelling in that countrie had robbed him of, & taken from him. So he determined to repaire forthwith vnto king Artaxerxes, hoping that when the King had once proued him, he should finde him a man of no lesse seruice, then he had found Themistocles before him: besides that the occasion of his going thither, should be muche iuster then his was. For he dyd not goe thither, to make warre against the citie of ATHENS and his countrie, as Themistocles did: but of a contrary intent, to make intercession to the King, that it would please C him to ayde them. Now Alcibiades thinking he could vse no better meane, then Pharnabazus helpe only, to see him safely conducted to the Kings court: he proposed his iorney to him, into the countrie of PHRYGIA, where he abode a certaine time to attend vpon him, & was very honorably entertained and receyued of Pharnabazus. All this while the ATHENIANS founde them selues desolate, & in miserable state to see their empire lost: but then much more, when Lysander had taken all their liberties, and dyd set thirtie gouernours ouer their citie. Now to late, after all was lost (where they might haue recovered againe, if they had bene wife) they beganne together to bewaile and lament their miseries and wretched state, looking backe upon all their willfull faultes and follies committed: among which, they dyd reckon their second time of falling out with Alcibiades, was their greatest faulte. So they banished him only of malice and displeasure, not for any offense him selfe in person had committed against them, saying that his lieutenant in his absence had shamefully lost a fewe of their shippes: and they them selues more shamefully had driuen out of their citie, the noblest fouldier, and most skillfull captaine that they had. And yet they had some litle poore hope left, that they were not altogether cast awaye, so long as Alcibiades liued, and had his health. For before, when he was a forsaken man, and led a banished life: yet he could not liue idely, and doe nothing. Wherefore now much more, sayed they to them selues: if there be any helpe at all, he will not suffer out of doubt the insolencie & pryde of the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor yet abyde the cruelties and outrages of these thirtie tyrantes. And surely the common people had some reason to haue these thoughts in their heades, considering that the thirtie gouernours them E selues dyd what they could possiblie to spye out Alcibiades doinges, and what he went about. In so muche as Critias at the last, declared to Lysander, that so long the LACEDÆMONIANS might reckon them selues Lordes ouer all GREECE, as they kept from the common people the rule and authoritie of the citie of ATHENS. And further he added, that notwithstanding the people of ATHENS could well awaye to liue like subiects vnder the government of a fewe: yet Alcibiades whilst he liued, would neuer suffer them so to be reigned ouer, but would attempt by all deuise he could to bring a change and inuouation among them. Yet Lysander would not credit these persuasions, before speciall commandement was sent to him from the Senate of LACEDÆMON, vpon his allegiance, that he should deuise to kill Alcibiades by all meanes he could procure: either F because in trothe they feared the subtiltie of his wit, and the greatnes of his courage, to enterpraise matters of great weight and daunger, or els that they sought to gratifie king Agis by it. Lysander being thus straightly commaunded, dyd send and practise incontinently with Pharnabazus to execute the facte: who gaue his brother Magus, and his vnkle *Sa-

P H R Y G I A, with a concubine of his called Timandra. So he thought he dreamed one night that he had put on his concubines apparell, and how she dandling him in her armes, had dressed his head, frising his heare, and painted his face, as he had bene a woman. Other saye, that he thought Magus strake of his head, and made his bodie to be burnt: and the voyce goeth, this vision was but a litle before his death. Those that were sent to kill him, durst not enter the house where he was, but set it a fire round about. Alcibiades spying the fire, got suche apparell and hangings as he had, and threwe it on the fire, thincking to haue put it out: and so casting his cloke about his left arme, tooke his naked sworde in his other hande, and ranne out of the house, him selfe not once touched with fyre, sauing his clothes were a litle singed. These murderers so sone as they spied him, drew backe, and stood a sonder, and durst not one of them come neere him, to stande and fight with him: but a farre of, they bestowed to many arrowes and dartes of him, that they killed him there. Now when they had left him, Timandra went and tooke his bodie which she wrapped vp in the best linnen she had, and buried him as honorably as she could possible, with such things as she had, and could get together. Some holde opinion that Lais, the only famous curtisan, which they saye was of C O R I N T H E (though in deede she was borne in a litle towne of S I C I L I A, called H Y C C A R A, where she was taken) was his daughter. Notwithstanding, touching the death of Alcibiades, there are some that agree to all the rest I haue written, sauing that they saye, it was neither Pharnabazus, nor Lysander, nor the L A C E D A E M O N I A N S, which caused him to be slaine: but that he keeping with him a young gentlewoman of a noble house, whom he had stolen awaye, and intised to follie: her brethern to reuenge this iniurie, went to set fire vpon the house where he was, and that they killed him as

THE LIFE OF CAIVS

Martius Coriolanus.

THE house of the Martians at R O M E was of the number of the Patricians, out of the which hath sprong many noble personages: whereof Ancus Martius was one, king *Numa*s daughters sonne, who was king of R O M E after Tullus Hostilius. Of the same house were Publius, and Quintus, who brought to R O M E their best water they had by conducts. Censorinus also came of that familie, that was so surnamed, bi-cause the people had chosen him Censor twice. Through whose persuasion they made a lawe, that no man from thenceforth might require, or enioye the Censorshippe twice. Caius Martius, whose life we intend now to write, being left an orphan by his father, was brought vp vnder his mother a widowe, who taught vs by experience, that orphanage bringeth many discomforts to a childe, but doth not hinder him to become an honest man, and to excell in vertue aboute the common forte: as they that are meanelly borne, wrongfully doe complayne, that it is the occasion of their casting awaye, for that no man in their youth taketh any care of them to see them well brought vp, and taught that were meete. This man also is a good prooffe to confirm some mens opinions. That a rare and excellent witte vntaught, doth bring forth many good and euill things together: like as a fat soile bringeth forth herbes & weedes that lieth vnmanured. For this Martius naturall wit and great harte dyd maruelously sturre vp his courage, to doe and attempt notable actes. But on the other side for lacke of education, he was so chollenicke and impacient, that he would yeld to no liuing creature: which made him churlishe, vnciuill, and altogether vnfit for any mans conuersation. Yet men marueling much at his constancy, that he was neuer overcome with pleasure, nor money, and howe he would endure easily all manner of paynes and trauailles: thereupon they well liked and commended his stoutnes and temperancie. But for all that, they could not be acquainted with him, as one citizen vseth to be with another in the cittie. His behauiour was so vnpleasaunt to them, by reason of a certaine insolent and sterne manner he had, which because it was to lordly, was disliked. And to saye truly, the greatest benefit that learning bringeth men vnto, is this: that it teacheth men that be rude and rough of nature, by compass and rule of reason, to be ciuill and curteous, & to like better the meane state, then the higher. Now in those dayes, valliantnes was A honoured in ROME above all other vertues: which they called Virtus, by the name of vertue selfe, as including in that generall name, all other speciall vertues besides. So that Virtus in the Latin, was as much as valliantnes. But Martius being more inclined to the warres, then any other gentleman of his time: beganne from his Childehood to geue him selfe to handle weapons, and daylie dyd exercise him selfe therein. And outward he esteemed armour to no purpose, vnles one were naturally armed within. Moreover he dyd fo exercise his bodie to hardnes, and all kinde of actiuitie, that he was very swift in running, strong in wrestling, & mightie in griping, so that no man could euer cast him. In so much as those that would trye masteries with him for strength and nimblenes, would saye when they were overcome: that all was by reason of his naturall strength, and hardnes of warde, that neuer yielded to any payne or toyle he tooke upon him. The first time he went to the warres, being but a stripling, was when Tarquine surmamed the prowde (that had beneking of ROME, and was driuen out for his pride, after many attempts made by sundrie battells to come in againe, wherein he was euer overcome) dyd come to ROME with all the ayde of the LATINES, and many other people of ITA-LIE: euen as it were to set vp his whole reft upon a battell by them, who with a great & mightie armie had vnderaken to put him into his Kingdome againe, not so much to pleasure him, as to ouerthrowe the power of the ROMAINES, whose greates they both feared and enuid.

In this battell, wherein were many horre and sharpe encounters of either partie, Martius val-liantly fought in the fight of the Dictator: & a ROMANE fouldier being throwen to the ground euen hard by him, Martius straight bestid him, and slue the enemy with his owne handes that had before ouerthrowen the ROMAINES. Hereupon, after the battell was wonne, the Di-cator dyd not forget to noble an acte, & therefore first of all he crowned Martius with a garland of oken boughes. For whoeuer saueh the life of a ROMANE, it is a manner among them, to honour him with such a garland. This was, either bicause the lawe dyd this honour to the oke, in fauour of the ARCADIANES, who by the oracle of Apollo were in very olde time called eaters of akornes: or els bicause the fouldiers might easely in euery place come by oken boughes: or lastly, bicause they thought it very necessarie to geue him that had saued a citizens life, a crowne of this tree to honour him, being properly dedicated vnto Iupiter, the patron and protectour of their cities, and thought amongst other wilde trees to bring forth profitable fruite, and of plantes to be the strongest. Moreover, men at the first beginning dyd D vse akornes for their bread, and honie for their drinke: and further, the oke dyd feede their beastes, and geue them birdes, by taking glue from the okes, with the which they made bird-lime to catche seely birdes. They saye that Castor, and Pollux, appeared in this battell, and how incontinently after the battell, men sawe them in the market place at ROME, all their horses being on a white fume: and they were the first that brought newes of the victorie, euen in the same place, where remaineth at this present a temple built in the honour of them neere vnto the fountainne. And this is the cause, why the daye of this victorie (which was the fifteenth of Iulye) is consecrated yet to this daye vnto Castor and Pollux. Moreover it is daylie seene, that honour and reputation lighting on young men before their time, and before they haue no great co-rage by nature: the desire to winne more, dieth straight in them, which easely happeneth, the same hauing no deepe roote in them before. Where contrariwise, the first honour that val-liant mindes doe come vnto, doth quicken vp their appetite, halting them forward as with force of winde, to enterprise things of highe deservng praise. For they esteeme, not to receaue reward for seruice done, but rather take it for a remembrance and encouragement, to make them doe better in time to come: and be ashamed also to cast their honour at their heeles, not seeking to increase it still by like deserte of worthe valliant dedes. This desire being bred in Martius, he strained still to passe him selfe in manlines: and being desirous to shewe a daylie increase of his valliantnes, his noble seruice dyd still aduance his fame, bringing in spoyle upon spoyle from the enemy. Whereupon, the captaines that came afterwards (for enuie of them that went before) dyd contend who should most honour him, and who should beare F most honorable testimonie of his valliantnes. In so much the ROMAINES hauing many warres and battells in those dayes, Coriolanus was at them all: and there was not a battell fought, from whence

A whence he returned not without some rewarde of honour. And as for other, the only respect that made them valliant, was they hoped to haue honour: but touching Martius, the only thing that made him to loue honour, was the ioye he sawe his mother dyd take of him. For he thought nothing made him so happie and honorable, as that his mother might heare euery bodie praise and commend him, that she might allwayes see him returne with a crowne vpon his head, and that the might still embrace him with teares running downe her cheekes for joye. Which desire they saye Epaminondas dyd auowe, and confesse to haue bene in him: as to thinke him selfe a most happie and blessed man, that his father and mother in their life time had seene the victorie he wanne in the plaine of LEVCTERES. Now as for Epaminondas, he had this good happe, to haue his father and mother liuing, to be partakers of his ioye and prosper-B tie. But Martius thinking all due to his mother, that had bene also due to his father if he had liued: dyd not only content him selfe to reioyce and honour her, but at her desire tooke a wife also, by whom he had two children, and yet neuer left his mothers house therefore. Now he being grown to great credit & authoritie in ROME for his valliantnes, it fortune there grewe sedition in the cittie, bicause the Senate dyd fauour the riche against the people, who dyd coplaine of the fore oppression of vicerers, of whom they borrowed money. For those that had lide, were yet spoyle of that lide they had by their creditours, for lacke of abilitie to paye theuerie: who offered their goodes to be solde, to them that would geue most. And such as had nothing left, their bodies were layed holde of, and they were made their bonde men, notwithstanding all the woundes and cuttes they shewed, which they had receyued in many bat-C tles, fighting for defence of their countrie and common wealth: of the which, the last warre they made, was against the SABYNS, wherein they fought upon the promise the riche men had made them, that from thenceforth they would intreate them more gently, and also vpon the worde of Marcus Valerius chief of the Senate, who by authoritie of the counsell, and in the behalf of the riche, sayed they should performe that they had promised. But after that they had faithfully serued in this last battell of all, where they overcame their enemies, seeing they were neuer a whit the better, nor more gently intreated, and that the Senate would geue no care to them, but make as though they had forgotten their former promise, and suffered them to be made slaues and bonde men to their creditours, and besides, to be turned out of all that euer they had: they fell then euen to flat rebellion and mutine, and to sturre vp dangerous D tumultes within the cittie. The ROMAINES enemies hearing of this rebellion, dyd straight enter the territories of ROME with a maruelous great power, spoyleing and burning all as they came. Whereupon the Senate immediatly made open proclamation by sounde of trumpet, that all those which were of lawfull age to carie weapon, should come and enter their names into the muster masters booke, to goe to the warres: but no man obeyed their commandement. Whereupon their chief magistrates, and many of the Senate, beganne to be of diuers opinions among them selues. For some thought it was reason, they should somewhat yeld to the poore peoples request, and that they should a litle qualifie the seueritie of the lawe. Other held hard against that opinion, and that was Martius for one. For he alleged, that the credi-E tors losing their money they had lent, was not the worst thing that was thereby: but that the lenitie that was fauored, was a beginning of disobedience, and that the prowde attempt of the communalitie, was to abolish lawe, and to bring all to confusion. Therefore he sayed, if the Senate were wise, they should betimes preuent; & queneh this ill fauored & worse ment beginning. The Senate met many dayes in consultation about it: but in the end they concluded nothing. The poore comon people seeing no redresse, gathered them selues one daye together, & one encouraging another, they all forooke the cittie, & encamped them selues vpon a hill, called at this daye the holy hill, alongest the riuier of Tyber, offering no creature any hurte or violence, or making any shewe of actual rebellion: sauing that they cried as they went vp and down, that the riche men had driuen them out of the cittie, and that all ITALIANS thought they should finde ayer, water, & ground to burie them in. Moreover, they sayed, to dwell at ROME F was nothing els but to be slaue, or hurte with continual warres, and fighting for defence of the riche mens goodes. The Senate being afraid of their departure, dyd send vnto them certaine of the pleasauntest olde men, and the most acceptable to the people among them: Of those. Memmius Agrippa was he, who was sent for chief man of the message from the Senate. He, after many good persuasions and gentle requestes made to the people, on the behalfe of the Senate: knit vp his oration in the ende, with a notable tale, in this manner. That on a time all the members of mans bodie, dyd rebell against the bellie, complaining of it, that it only remained in the middelt of the bodie, without doing any thing, neither dyd beare any labour to the maintenance of the rest: whereas all other partes and members dyd labour paynfully, & was very carefull to satisfie the appetites and desiers of the bodie. And so the bellie, all this notwithstanding, laughed at their folle, and sayed, It is true, I first receyue all meates that nourish the mans bodie: but afterwards I send it againe to the northerment of other partes of the same. Euen so (q he) you, my masters, and citizens of Rome: the reason is a like betwene the Senate, & you. For matters being well digested, & their counsells thoroughly examined, touching the benefit of the common wealth: the Senatours are cause of the common comoditie that cometh vnto euery one of you. These persuasions pacified the people, conditionally, that the Senate would graunte there should be yerely chosen fise magistrates, which they now call Tribuni Plebis, whose office should be to defend the poore people from violence and oppression. So Iunius Brutus, and Sicinius Velutius, were the first Tribunes of the people that were chosen, who had only bene the causers & procurers of this sedition. Hereupon the citie being grown againe to good quiet and vnite, the people immediatly went to the warres, shewing that they had a good will to doe better then euer they dyd, and to be very willing to obey the magistrates in that they would commaund, concerning the warres. Martius also, though it liked him nothing to see the greatnes of the people thus increased, considering it was to the preiudice, and imbalming of the nobilitie, and also sawe that other noble Patricians were troubled as well as him selfe: he dyd perswade the Patricians, to shew them selues no lesse forward and willing to fight for their countrie, then the common people were: and to let them knowe by their dedes and actes, that they dyd not so muche passe the people in power and riches, as they dyd exceede them in true nobilitie and valliantnes. In the countrie of the Volscs, against whom the Romaines made warre at that time, there was a principall citie & of most fame, that was called CORIOLES, before the which the Consul Cominius dyd laye siege. Wherefore all the other Volscs fearing least that citie should be taken by assault, they came from all partes of the countrie to saue it, intending to geue the Romaines battell before the citie, and to geue an onset on them in two seuerall places. The Consul Cominius vnderstanding this, deuised his armie also in two partes, and taking the one parte with him selfe, he marched towards them that were drawing to the citie, out of the countrie: and the other parte of his armie he left in the campe with Titus Lartius (one of the valliantest men the Romaines had at that time) to resist those that would make any salye out of the citie upon them. So the CORIOLEANS making small accompt of them that laye in campe before the citie, made a salye out upon them, in the which at the first the CORIOLEANS had the better, and draue the Romaines backe againe into the trenches of their campe. But Martius being there at that time, running out of the campe with a few men with him, he slue the first enemies he met withall, and made the rest of them staye vpon a sodaine, crying out to the Romaines that had turned their backs, and calling them againe to fight with a lowde voyce. For he was euen such another, as Cato would haue a souldier and a capitaine to be: not only terrible, and fierce to laye about him, but to make the enemye asfearde with the founde of his voyce, and grimmes of his countenance. Then there flocked about him immediatly, a great number of Romaines whereat the enemies were so asfearde, that they gaue backe presently. But Martius not staying so, dyd chase and followe them to their owne gates, that fled for life. And there, perceyuing that the Romaines retired backe, for the great number of darts and arrowes which flew about their eares fro the walles of the citie, & that there was not one man amongst them that durst venture him selfe to followe the flying enemies into the citie, for that it was full of men of warre, yette well armed, and appointed: he dyd encourage his fellowes with wordes and dedes, crying out to them, that fortune had opened the gates of the citie; more for the followers, then the flyers. But all this notwithstanding, fewe had the hartes to followe him. Howbeit Martius being in the strong among the enemies, thrust him selfe into the gates of the citie, and entered ated the same among them that fled, without that any one of them durst at the first turne their face vpon him, or els offer to staye him. But he looking about him, & seeing he was entred the citie with very fewe men to helpe him, & perceyuing he was enuironed by his enemies that gathered round about to set upon him: dyd things then as it is written, wonderfull & incredible, as well for the force of his hande, as also for the agilitie of his bodie, and with a wonderfull courage & valliantnes, he made a lane through the middelt of them, and ouerthrowe also those he layed at: that some he made ronne to the furthest parte of the citie, & other for feare he made yeld them selues, and to let fall their weapons before him. By this meanes, Lartius that was gotten out, had some leysure to bring the Romaines with more safety into the citie. The citie being taken in this sorte, the most parte of the souldiers beganne incontinently to spoyle, to carie awaye, & to looke vp the bootie they had wonne. But Martius was maruelous angry with them, and cried out on them, that it was no time now to looke after spoyle, & to ronne straggling here and there to enrich them selues, whilst the other Consul and their fellowe citizens peraduenture were fighting with their enemies: and howe that leauing the spoyle they should seeke to winde them selues out of daunger and perill. Howbeit, crye, and saye to them what he could, very fewe of them would hearken to him. Wherefore taking those that willingly offered them selues to followe him, he went out of the citie, and tooke his waye towards that parte, where he vnderstoode the rest of the armie was: exhorting and intreating them by the waye that followed him, not to be faine harted, and ofte holding vp his handes to heauen, he besought the goddes to be so gracious and fauorable vnto him, that he might come in time to the battell, and in good howe to hazarde his life in defence of his country men. Now the Romaines when they were put in battell raye, and ready to take their targettes on their armes, and to guide them vpon their arming coates, had a custome to make their willes at that very instant, without any manner of writing, naming him only whom they would make their heire, in the presence of three or foure wimesses. Martius came iust to that reckoning, whilst the souldiers were a doing after that sorte, and that the enemies were approached so neere, as one stoode in viewe of the other. When they sawe him at his first comming, all bloody, and in a swet, and but with a fewe men following him: some thereupon beganne to be asfearde. But sone after, when they sawe him ronne with a liuely cheere to the Consul, and to take him by the hande, declaring howe he had taken the citie of CORIOLES, and that they sawe the Consul Cominius also kisse and embrace him: then there was not a man but tooke hart againe to him, and beganne to be of a good corage, some hearing him reporte from poynte to poynte, the happy successe of this exployte, and other also coniecturing it by seeing their gestures a farre off. Then they all beganne to call vpon the Consul to marche forward, and to delaye no longer, but to geue charge vpon the enemye. Martius asked him howe the order of their enemies battell was, and on which side they had placed their best fighting men. The Consul made him answer, that he thought the bandes which were in the vaward of their battell, were those of the Antiates, whom they esteemed to be the warlikest men, and which for valliant corage would geue no place, to any of the hoste of their enemies. Then prayed Martius, to be let directly against them. The Consul granted him, greatly praying his corage. Then Martius, when both armies came almost to ioyne, aduanced him selfe a good space before his companie, and went so fiercely to geue charge on the vaward that came right against him, that they could stande no longer in his handes: he made suche a lane through them, and opened a passage into the battell of the enemies. But the two winges of either side turned one to the other, to compass him in betwene them: which the Consul Cominius perceyuing, he sent thither straight of the best souldiers he had about him. So the battell was maruelous bloudie about Martius, and in a very shorte space many were slaine in the place. But in the ende the Romaines were so strong, that they distressed the enemies, and brake their arraye: and scattering them, made them flye. Then they prayed Martius that he would retire to the campe, because they sawe he was able to doe no more, he was already so wearied with the great payne he had taken, & so faine with the great woundes he had upon him. But Martius answered them, that it was not for conquerours to yeld, nor to be sainte harred: and thereupon beganne a frefhe to chafe those that fled, untill fuche time as the armie of the enemies was vterly ouerthrowen, and numbers of them slaine, and taken prifoners. The next morning betimes, Martius went to the Consul, and the other ROMAINEs with him. There the Consul Cominius going vp to his chayer of state, in the prefence of the whole armie, gaue thanks to the goddess for great, glorious, and prosperous a victorie: then he spake to Martius, whose valliantnes he commended beyond the moone, both for that he him selfe sawe him doe with his eyes, as also for that Martius had reported vnto him. So in the ende he willed Martius, he should choole out of all the horses they had taken of their enemies, and of all the goodes they had wonne (whereof there was great store) tenne of euery sorte which he liked best, before any distribution should be made to other. Besides this great honorable offer he had made him, he gaue him in testimonie that he had wonne that daye the price of prowes aboue all other, a goodly horse with a capparillon, and all furniture to him: which the whole armie beholding, dyd maruelously praise and commend. But Martius stepping forth, tolde the Consul, he dyd thankfully accepted the gift of his horse, and was a glad man besides, that his seruice had deserued his generalls commendation: and as for his other offer, which was rather a mercenary reward, then an honorable recompence, he would none of it, but was contented to haue his equall parte with other souldiers. Only, this grace (sayd he) I craue, and beseeche you to graunt me. Among the VOISCES there is an olde friende and hoste of mine, an honest wealthie man, and now a prifoner, who liuing before in great wealth in his owne countrie, liueth now a poore prifoner in the handes of his enemies: and yet notwithstanding all this his miserie and misfortune, it would doe me great pleasure if I could saue him from this one daunger: to keepe him from beinge solde as a slaue. The souldiers hearing Martius wordes, made a maruelous great shoute among them: and they were moe that wondered at his great contentation and abstinence, when they sawe so little couetousnes in him, then they were that highly praised and extolled his valliantnes. For euen they them selues, that dyd somewhat malice and enuie his glorie, to see him thus honoured, and passingly prayd, dyd thinke him so muche the more worthy of an honorable recompence for his valliant seruice, as the more carelesly he refused the great offer made him for his profit: and they esteemed more the vertue that was in him, that made him refuse fuche rewards, then that which made them to be offered him, as vnto a wortheie persone. For it is farre more commendable to vse riches well, then to be valliant: and yet it is better not to desire them, then to vse them well. After this shouerte and noyse of the assembly was somewhat appealed, the Consul Cominius beganne to speake in this sorte. We cannot compell Martius to take these giftes we offer him, if he will not receaue them: but we will geue him fuche a rewarde for the noble seruice he hath done, as he cannot refuse. Therefore we doe order and decree, that henceforth he be called Coriolanus, onles his valliant acts haue wonne him that name before our nomination. And so euer since, he stil bare the third name of Coriolanus. And thereby it appeareth, that the first name the ROMAINEs haue, as Cato: was our Christian name now. The second, as Martius: was the name of the house and familie they came of. The third, was some addition geuen, either for some acte of notable seruice, or for some marke on their face, or of some shape of their bodie, or els for some speciall vertue they had. Euen so dyd the GRECIANS in olde time giue additions to Princes, by reason of some notable acte wortheie memorie. As when they haue called some, Soter, and Calinicos: as muche to saye, sauour and conquerour. Or els for some notable appaunt marke on some face, or on his bodie, they haue called him Phiscon, and Grypos: as ye would saye, gorbelle, and hooke nosed: or els for some vertue, as Euergetes, and Phyladelphos: to wit, a Benefactour, and louer of his brethren. Or otherwise for some great felicitie, as Eudemon: as muche to saye, as fortunate. For so was the second of the Batter furnamed. And some Kings haue had furnames of ieast and mockerie. As one of the Antigones that was called Dofon, to saye, the Geuer: who was euer promising, and neuer geuing. And one of the Ptolomees was called Lamyros: to saye, conceitue. The ROMAINEs vse more then any other nation, to giue names of mockerie in this sorte. As there was one Metellus furnamed

Martius furnamed Coriolanus by the Consul. How the ROMAINEs came to their names. Why the GRECIANS giue Kings furnames.

* These were the princes that built the citie of Cyrene.

A furnamed Diadematus, the banded: because he caried a bande about his heade of longe time, by reason of a sore he had in his forehead. One other of his owne familie was called Celer: the quicke flye. Because a fewe dayes after the death of his father, he shewed the people the cruell fight of fencers at vnrebrated swordes, which they founde wonderfull for the thornes of time. Other had their furnames deriued of some accident of their birth. As to this daye they call him Proculus, that is borne, his father being in some farre voyage: and him Posthumus, that is borne after the death of his father. And when of two brethren twinned, the one doth dye, and thother suruiue: they call the suruiuer, Postumus. Sometimes also they geue furnames deriued of some marke or misfortune of the bodie. As Sylla, to saye, crooked nosed: Niger, blacke: Rufus, red: Cecus, blinde: Claudius, lame. They dyd wisely in this thing to accustomen men to thincke, that neither the losse of their sight, nor other such misfortunes as maye chaunce to men, are any shame or disgrace vnto them, but the manner was to answer boldly to fuche names, as if they were called by their proper names. Howbeit these matters would be better amplified in other stories then this. Now when this warre was ended, the flatterers of the people beganne to sturre vp sedition againe, without any newe occasion, or iust matter offered of complainte. For they dyd grounde this seconde insurrection against the Nobilitie and Patricians, upon the peoples miserie & misfortune, that could not but fall out, by reason of the former discorde and sedition betweene them and the Nobilitie. Because the most parte of the errable lande within the territorie of ROME, was become heathie and barren for lacke of plowing, for that they had no time nor meane to cause corne, to be brought them out of other countries to sowe, by reason of their warres which made the extreme dearth they had emong them. Now those buse praters that sought the peoples good will, by fuche flattering wordes, perceyuing great scarcitie of corne to be within the citie, and though there had bene plenty enough, yet the common people had no money to buye it: they spread abroad false tales and rumours against the Nobilitie, that they in reuenge of the people, had practised and procured the extreme dearthe among them. Furthermore, in the midst of this sturre, there came ambassadours to ROME from the citie of VELITRES, that offered vp their citie to the ROMAINEs, and prayed they would send newe inhabitants to replenish the same: because the plague had bene so extreme among them, & had killed such a number of them, as there was not left aliuie the tenth persone of the people that had bene there before. So the wise men of ROME beganne to thincke, that the necessitie of the VELITRIANS fell out in a most happy hower, and howe by this occasion it was very mete in so great a scarcitie of vittailles, to disburden ROME of a great number of citizens: and by this meanes as well to take awaye this newe sedition, and vterly to ryd it out of the citie, as also to cleare the same of many mutinous and seditious persones, being the superfluous ill humours that greuously fedde this disease. Hereupon the Consuls prickt out all those by a bill, whom they intended to sende to VELITRES, to goe dwell there as in forme of a colonie: and they leauied out of all the rest that remained in the citie of ROME, a great number to goe against the VOISCES, hoping by the meanes of forreine warre, to pacifie their sedition at home. Moreouer they imagined, when the poore with the riche, and the E meane sorte with the nobilitie, should by this deuise be abroad in the warres, & in one campe, and in one seruice, and in one like daunger: that then they would be more quiet and louing together. But Sicinius and Brutus, two seditious Tribunes, spake against either of these deuises, and cried out upon the noble men, that vnder the gentle name of a colonie, they would cloke and culler the most cruell and vnnatural facte as might be: because they sent their poore citizens into a fore infected citie and pestilent ayre, full of dead bodies vnburied, and there also to dwell vnder the tyuion of a straunge god, that had so cruelly persecuted his people. This were (said they) euen as muche, as if the Senate should hedlong cast downe the people into a most bottomles pyt. And are not yet contented to haue famished some of the poore citizens heretofore to death, & to put other of them enen to the mercie of the plague: but a frefhe, they haue procured a voluntarie warre, to the ende they would leaue behind no kynde of miserie and ill, wherewith the poore SYLLE people should not be plagued, and only because they are werie to serue the riche. The common people being set on a broyle and brauerie with these wordes, would not appeare when the Consuls called their names A by a bill, to prest them for the warres, neither would they be sent out to this newe colonie: in so muche as the Senate knewe not well what to saye, or doe in the matter. Martius then, who was now growen to great credit, and a shewe man besides, and of great reputation with the noblest men of ROME, rose vp, and openly spake against these flattering Tribunes. And for the replenishing of the cittie of VELITRES, he dyd compell those that were chosen, to goe thither, and to departe the cittie, upon great penalties to him that should disobey: but to the warres, the people by no meanes would be brought or constrained. So Martius taking his friends and followers with him, and such as he could by fayer wordes intreate to goe with him, dyd ronne certen forreyes into the dominion of the ANTIATES, where he met with great plenty of corne, and had a maruelous great spoyle, aswell of cattell, as of men he had taken prisoners, whom he brought away with him, and refused nothing for him selfe. Afterwardes hauing brought backe againe all his men that went out with him, safe and sounde to ROME, and euery man riche and loden with spoyle: then the hometrarriers and housefodoues that kept ROME still, beganne to repent them that it was not their happe to goe with him, and so enuid both them that had sped so well in this iorney, and also of malice to Martius, they spited to see his credit and estimation increase still more and more, because they accompted him to be a great hinderer of the people. Shortly after this, Martius stooode for the Consulshipp: and the common people fauored his sute, thinking it would be a shame to them to denie, and refuse, the chieft noble man of bloude, and most worthie persone of ROME, and specially him that had done so great seruice and good to the common wealth. For the custome of ROME was at that time, that suche as dyd fye for any office, should for certen dayes before be in the market place, only with a poore gowne on their backes, and without any coate vnderneath, to praye the citizens to remember them at the daye of election: which was thus deuised, either to moue the people the more, by requesting them in suche meane apparell, or els because they might shewe them their woundes they had gotten in the warres in the seruice of the comon wealth, as manifest markes & testimonie of their valliantnes. Now it is not to be thought that the suters went thus lose in a simple gowne in the market place, without any coate vnder it, for feare, and suspition of the common people: for offices of dignitie in the cittie were not then geuen by fauour or corruption. It was but of late time, and long after this, that buying and selling fell out in election of officers, and that the voyces of the electours were bought for money. But after corruption had once gotten waye into the election of offices, it hath ronne from man to man, euen to the very sentence of iudges, and also among captaynes in the warres: so as in the ende, that only turned common wealthes into Kingdomes, by making armes subiect to money. Therefore me thinckes he had reason that sayed: he that first made banketts, and gaue money to the common people, was the first that tooke awaye authoritie, and destroyed common wealth. But this pestilence crept in by litle and litle, and dyd secretly winne ground still, continuing a long time in ROME, before it was openly known and discouered. For no man can tell who was the first man that bought the peoples voyces for money, nor that corrupted the sentence of the iudges. Howbeit at ATHENS some holde opinion, that Amyus, the sonne of Anthemion, was the first man that fedde the iudges with money, about the ende of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, being accused of treason for yielding vp the forte of PYLE, at that time, when the golden and vnsoiled age remained yet whole in iudgement at ROME. Now Martius following this custome, shewed many woundes and cuttes upon his bodie, which he had receyued in seuentene yeres seruice at the warres, and in many sundrie battells, being euer the foremost man that dyd set out his feete to fight. So that there was not a man among the people, but was ashamed of him selfe, to refuse so valliant a man: and one of them sayed to another, we must needs chuse him Consul, there is no remedie. But when the daye of election was come, and that Martius came to the market place with great pompe, accompanied with all the Senate, and the whole Nobilitie of the cittie about him, who sought to make him Consul, with the greatest instance and intreatie they could, or euer attempted for any man or matter: then the loue and good will of the common people,

A people, turned straight to an hate and enuie toward him, fearing to put this office of sournaine authoritie into his handes, being a man somewhat partiall toward the nobilitie, and of great credit and authoritie amongst the Patricians, and as one they might doubt would take away altogether the libertie from the people. Whereupon for these considerations, they refused Martius in the ende, and made two other that were suters, Consuls. The Senate being maruelously offended with the people, dyd accompt the shame of this refusal, rather to redound to them selues, then to Martius: but Martius tooke it in farre worse parte then the Senate, and was out of all pacience. For he was a man to full of passion and choller, and to muche geuen to ouer selfe will and opinion, as one of a highe minde and great courage, that lacked the grauity, and affabilitie that is gotten with iudgment of learning and reason, which only is to be looked for in a gouernour of state: and that remembered not how wilfulnes is the thing of the world, which a gouernour of a comon wealth for pleasing should shone, being that which Plato called solitarines. As in the ende, all men that are wilfully geuen to a selfe opinion & obstinate minde, and who will neuer yeld to others reason, but to their owne: remaine without copanie, & forsaken of all men. For a man that will lue in the world, must needs haue patience, which lusty bloudes make but a mocke at. So Martius being a shewe man of nature, that neuer yielded in any respect, as one thinking that to ouercome allwayes, and to haue the vpper hand in all matters, was a token of magnanimitie, and of no base and fainte courage, which spitteth out anger from the most weake and passionned parte of the harre, much like the matter of an impostume: went home to his house, full fraught with spite and malice against the people, being accompanied with all the lustiest young gentlemen, whose mindes were nobly bent, as those that came of noble race, and commonly vsed for to followe and honour him. But then specially they flockt about him, and kept him companie, to his muche harme: for they dyd but kyndle and inflame his choller more and more, being forie with him for the iniurie the people offered him, because he was their captaine and leader to the warres, that taught them all marshall discipline, and stirred vp in them a noble emulation of honour and valliantnes, and yet without enuie, praising them that deserved best. In the meane season, there came great plenty of corne to ROME, that had bene bought, parte in ITALIE, and parte was sent out of SICILIE, as geuen by Gelon the tyranne of SYRACUSA: so that many stooode in great hope, that the dearthe of vittells being holpen, the ciuill dissention would also cease.

D The Senate sate in counsell upon it immediately, the common people stooode also about the palace where the counsell was kept, gaping what resolution would fall out: perswading them selues, that the corne they had bought should be solde good cheape, and that which was geuen, should be deuied by the polle, without paying any pennie, and the rather, because certaine of the Senatours amongst them dyd so wishe and perswade the same. But Martius standing vp on his feete, dyd somewhat sharply take vp those, who went about to gratifie the people therein: and called them people pleasers, and traitours to the nobilitie. Moreouer he sayed they nourished against them selues, the naughty seede and cockle, of insolencie and sedition, which had bene sowed and scattered abroad amongst the people, whom they should haue cut off, if they had bene wise, and haue prevented their greatnes: and not to their owne destruction to haue suffered the people, to stablish a magistratre for them selues, of so great power and authoritie, as that man had, to whom they had graunted it. Who was also to be feared, because he obtained what he would, and dyd nothing but what he listed, neither passed for any obedience to the Consuls, but lued in all libertie, acknowledging no superiour to commaund him, sauing the only heades and authours of their faction, whom he called his magistrates. Therefore sayed he, they that gaue counsell, and perswaded that the corne should be geuen out to the common people gratis, as they vsed to doe in citties of GRACE, where the people had more absolute power: dyd but only nourish their disobedience, which would breake out in the ende, to the vtter ruine and ouerthrowe of the whole state. For they will not thincke it is done in recompense of their seruice past, sithence they know well enough if they haue so ofte refused to goe to the warres, when they were commaunded: neither for their mutinies when they wet with vs, whereby they haue rebelled & forsaken their coutrie: neither for their accusations which their flatterers haue preferred vnto them, & they haue receyued, and made good against the Senate: but they will rather iudge we geue and graunt them this, A as abasing our selues, and standing in feare of them, & glad to flatter them euery waye. By this means, their disobedience will still growe worse and worse: and they will neuer leaue to practise newe sedition, and vprores. Therefore it were a great follie for vs, me thinckes to doe it yea, shall I saye more? we should if we were wise, take from them their Tribuneshippe, which most manifestly is the embasing of the Consulshippe, & the cause of the diuision of the citie.

The state whereof as it standeth, is not now as it was wont to be, but becommeth dismembred in two factions, which mainteines allwayes ciuill dissention and discorde betwene vs, and will neuer suffer vs againe to be vnited into one bodie. Martius dilating the matter with many such like reasons, wanne all the young men, and almost all the riche men to his opinion: in so much they range it out, that he was the only man, and alone in the citie, who stoode out against the people, & neuer flattered them. There were only a fewe olde men that spake against him, fearing least some mischief might fall out upon it, as in dede there followed no great good afterward. For the Tribunes of the people, being present at this consultation of the Senate, when they sawe that the opinion of Martius was confirmed with the more voyces, they left the Senate, and went downe to the people, crying out for helpe, and that they would assemble to saue their Tribunes. Hereupon the people ranne on head in tumult together, before whom the wordes that Martius spake in the Senate were openly reported: which the people so to ma-ked, that euen in that furie they were readie to flye upon the whole Senate. But the Tribunes layed all the faulte and burden wholly vpon Martius, and sent their sergeantes forthwith to arrest him, presently to appeare in person before the people, to aunswere the wordes he had spoken in the Senate. Martius stowely withstoode these officers that came to arrest him. Then the Tribunes in their owne persones, accompanied with the Aediles, went to fetch him by force, and so layed violent hands vpon him. Howbeit the noble Patricians gathering together about him, made the Tribunes geue backe, and layed it fore upon the Aediles: so for that time, the night parted them, & the tumult appealed. The next morning betimes, the Consuls seing the people in an vprore, running to the market place out of all partes of the citie, they were affrayed least all the citie would together by the eares: wherefore assembling the Senate in all hast, they declared how it stoode them vpon, to appeale the furie of the people, with some gentle wordes, or gratefull decrees in their fauour: and moreover, like wise men they should consider, it was now no time to stande at defence and in contention, nor yet to fight for honour against the communalitie: they being fallen to so great an extremitie, and offering such imminent danger. Wherefore they were to consider temperately of things, & to deliuer some present and gentle pacification. The most parte of the Senatours that were present at this counsaill, thought this opinion best, & gaue their consents vnto it. Whereupon the Consuls rising out of counsaill, went to speake vnto the people as gently as they could, and they dyd pacifie their furie & anger, purging the Senate of all the vniuelt accusations layed vpon them, and vsed great modestie in perswading them, and also in reprouing the faultes they had committed. And as for the rest, that touched the sale of corne: they promised there should be no disliking offered them in the price. So the most parte of the people being pacified, and appearing so plainly by the great silence and still that was among them, as yelding to the Consuls, and liking well of their wordes: the Tribunes then of the people rose out of their seates, and sayed, Forasmuche as the Senate yelded vnto reason, the people also for their parte, as became them, dyd likewise geue place vnto them: but notwithstanding, they would that Martius should come in person to aunswere to the articles they had deuised. First, whether he had not solicited and procured the Senate to chaunge the present state of the common weale, and to take the foureraine authoritie out of the peoples handes. Next, when he was sent for by autho-ritie of their officers, why he dyd contemptuously resist and disobey. Lastly, seeing he had driuen and beaten the Aediles into the market place before all the worlde: if in doing this, he had not done as muche as in him laye, to raise ciuill warres, and to set one citizen against another.
All this was spoken to one of these two endes, either that Martius against his nature should be constrained to humble him selfe, and to abase his hawty and fierce minde: or els if he continued still in his stowtnes, he should incurre the peoples displeasure and ill will so farre, that

A he should neuer possibly winne them againe. Which they hoped would rather fall out so, then otherwise: as in dede they gest vnhappyly, considering Martius nature and disposition. So Martius came, and presented him selfe, to aunswere their accusations against him, & the people held their peace, and gaue attentue eare, to heare what he would saye. But where they thought to haue heard very humble and lowly wordes come from him, he beganne not only to vife his wonted boldnes of speaking (which of it selfe was very rough and vnpleasunt, and dyd more aggravate his accusation, then purge his innocencie) but also gaue him selfe in his wordes to thunder, and looke therewithall so grimly, as though he made no reckoning of the matter. This stirred coales among the people, who were in wonderfull furie at it, & their hate and malice grew so toward him, that they could holde no longer, beare, nor indure his brauery and careles boldnes. Whereupon Scinius, the cruellest and stowtest of the Tribunes, after he had whispered a litle with his companions, dyd openly pronounce in the face of all the people, Martius as condemned by the Tribunes to dye. Then presently he commaunded the Aediles to apprehend him, and carie him straight to the rocke Tarpeian, and to cast him hed-long downe the same. When the Aediles came to laye handes vpon Martius to doe that they were commaunded, diuers of the people them selues thought it to cruell, and violent a dede.
The noble men also being muche troubled to see such force and rigour vsed, beganne to crie alowde, helpe Martius: so those that layed handes of him being repulled, they compassed him in rounde among them selues, and some of them holding vp their handes to the people, besought them not to handle him thus cruelly. But neither their wordes, nor crying out could C ought preuaile, the tumulte and hurly burley was so great, vntill suche time as the Tribunes owne friends and kinsmen weying with them selues the impossiblenesse to conuey Martius to execution, without great slaughter & murder of the nobilitie: dyd persuaide and aduise not to proceede in so violent and extraordinary a sorte, as to put such a man to death, without lawfull proceesse in lawe, but that they should referre the sentence of his death, to the free voyce of the people. Then Scinius bethinking him selfe a litle, dyd aske the Patricians, for what cause they tooke Martius out of the officers handes that went to doe execution? The Patrici-ans asked him againe, why they would of them selues, so cruelly and wickedly put to death, so noble and valliant a Roman, as Martius was, and that without lawe or iustice? Well, then sayed Scinius, if that be the matter, let there be no more quarrell or dissention against the people: for they doe graunt your demaunde, that his cause shalbe heard according to the law. Therefore sayed he to Martius, we doe will and charge you to appeare before the people, the third daye of our next sitting and assembly here, to make your purgation for such articles as shalbe obiected against you, that by free voyce the people maye geue sentence upon you as shall please them. The noble men were glad then of the adionment, and were muche pleased they had gotten Martius out of this danger. In the meane space, before the third day of their next cession came about, the same being kept euery ninth daye continually at Rome, whereupon they call it now in Latin, Nundine: there fell out warre against the Antiatres, which gaue some hope to the nobilitie, that this adionment would come to litle effect, thinking that this warre would hold them so longe, as that the furie of the people against him would be well E swaged, or vterly forgotten, by reason of the trouble of the warres. But contrarie to expectation, the peace was concluded presently with the Antiatres, and the people returned again to Rome. Then the Patricians assembled oftentimes together, to consult how they might stande to Martius, and keepe the Tribunes from occasion to cause the people to mutine again, and rise against the nobilitie. And there Appius Claudius (one that was taken euer as an heauy enemy to the people) dyd auowe and protest, that they would vterly abase the autho-ritie of the Senate, and destroye the common weale, if they would suffer the common people to haue authoritie by voyces to geue iudgment against the nobilitie. On thother side againe, the most ancient Senatours, & suche as were geuen to fauour the comon people sayed: that when the people should see they had authoritie of life and death in their handes, they would F not be so cruell & fierce, but gentle and ciuill. More also, that it was not for contempt of nobilitie or the Senate, that they sought to haue the authoritie of iustice in their handes, as a preheminance and prerogative of honour: but bicause they feared, that them selues should be contemned and hated of the nobilitie. So as they were perswaded, that so fone as they gaue them authoritie to iudge by voyces: so fone would they leaue all enuie and malice to condemne anye. Martius seeing the Senate in great doubt how to resolute, partly for the loue and good will the nobilitie dyd beare him, and partly for the feare they stood in of the people: asked alowde of the Tribunes, what matter they would burden him with? The Tribunes answered him, that they would shewe howe he dyd aspire to be King, and would proue that all his actions tended to vsurpe tyrannicall power ouer Rome. Martius with that, rising vp on his seere, sayed: that thereupon he dyd willingly offer him selfe to the people, to be tried upon that accusation. And that if it were proued by him, he had so muche as once thought of any suche matter, that he would then refuse no kinde of punishment they would offer him: conditionally (& he) that you charge me with nothing els besides, and that I ye doe not also abuse the Senate. They promised they would not. Vnder these conditions the iudgement was agreed vpon, and the people assembled. And first of all the Tribunes would in any case (whatsoeuer became of it) that the people would proceede to geue their voyces by Tribes, and not by hundreds: for by this meanes the multitude of the poore needy people (and all suche rable as had nothing to lose, and had lesse regard of honestie before their eyes) came to be of greater force (because their voyces were numbred by the polle) then the noble honest citizens, whose persones and purse dyd duefully serue the common wealth in their warres. And then when the Tribunes sawe they could not proue he went about to make him self King: they beganne to broache a freshe the former wordes that Martius had spoken in the Senate, in hindring the distribution of the come at meane price vnto the common people, and perswading also to take the office of Tribuneshippe from them. And for the third, they charged him a newe, that he had not made the common distribution of the spoyle he had gotten in the inuading the territories of the ANTIATES: but had of his owne authoritie deuied it among them, who were with him in that iorney. But this matter was most strange of all to Martius, looking least to haue bene burdened with that, as with any matter of offence. Whereupon being burdened on the sodaine, and hauing no ready excuse to make euen at that instant: he beganne to fall a praising of the souldiers that had serued with him in that iorney. But those that were not with him, being the greater number, cried out so lowde, and made suche a noyse, that he could not be heard. To conclude, when they came to tell the voyces of the Tribes, there were three voyces odde, which condemned him to be banished for life. After declaration of the sentence, the people made suche ioye, as they neuer reioyced more for any battell they had wonne vpon their enemies, they were so braue and liuely, & went homeward iocundly from the assembly, for triumphe of this sentence. The Senate againe in contrary manner were as sad and heauie, repenting them selues beyond measure, that they had not rather determined to haue done & suffered any thing whatsoever, before the common people should so arrogantly, and outrageously haue abused their authoritie. There needed no difference of garments I warrant you, nor outward shewes to know a Plebeian from a Patrician, for they were easily decerned by their looks. For for that was on the peoples side, looked cheerefully on the matter: but he that was sad, and hence downe his head, he was sure of the noble mens side. Sauiug Martius alone, who neither in his countenance, nor in his gate, dyd euer shewe him selfe abashed, or once let fall his great courage: but he only of all other gentlemen that were angrie at his fortune, dyd outwardly shewe no manner of passion, nor care at all of him selfe. Not that he dyd patiently beare and temper his good happe, in respect of any reason he had, or by his quiet condition: but because he was so caried away with the vehemencie of anger, and desire of reuenge, that he had no sence nor feeling of the hard state he was in, which the common people iudge, not to be sorow, although in dede it be the very same. For when sorow (as you would saye) is set a fyre, then it is conuerted into spite and malice, and drieth away for that time all faintnes of harte and naturall feare. And this is the cause why the cholerick man is so altered, and mad in his actions, as a man set a fyre with a burning agewe for when a mans harte is troubled within, his pulte will beare maruelous strongly. Now that Martius was euen in that taking, it appeared true fone after by his doings. For when he was come home to his house againe, and had taken his leaue of his mother and wife, finding them weeping anger.

A weeping, and shrieking out for sorowe, and had also comforted and perswaded them to be content with his chauce: he went immediatly to the gate of the citie, accompanied with a great number of Patricians that brought him thither, from whence he went on his waye with three or foure of his friends only, taking nothing with him, nor requesting any thing of any man. So he remained a fewe dayes in the countrey at his houses, turmoyled with sundry forties and kynde of thoughtes, suche as the fyre of his choller dyd stirre vp. In the ende, seeing he could resolute no waye, to take a profitable or honorable course, but only was pricked forward still to be reuenged of the ROMAINEs: he thought to raise vp some great warres against them, by their neerest neighbours. Whereupon, he thought it his best waye, first to stirre vp the VOLSCES against them, knowing they were yet able enough in strength and riches to encounter them, notwithstanding their former losses they had receyued not long before, & that their power was not so muche impaired, as their malice and desire was increased, to be reuenged of the ROMAINEs. Now in the citie of ANTIUM, there was one called Tullus Aufidius, who for his riches, as also for his nobilitie and valliantnes, was honoured among the VOLSCES as a King. Martius knewe very well, that Tullus dyd more malice and enuie him, then he dyd all the ROMAINEs besides: because that many times in battells where they met, they were euer at the encounter one against another, like lustie coragious youtthes, struing in all emulation of honour, and had encountered many times together. In so muche, as besides the common quarrell betweene them, there was bred a maruelous priuate hate one against another. Yet notwithstanding, considering that Tullus Aufidius was a man of a great minde, and that he aboue all other of the VOLSCES, most desired reuenge of the ROMAINEs, for the iniuries they had done vnto them: he dyd an acte that confirmed the true wordes of an auncient Poet, who sayed:

It is a thing full harde, mans anger to withstand, if it be stiffely bent to take an enterpryse in hande.

For then most men will haue, the thing that they desire, although it cost their liues therefore, suche force hath wricked ire.

And so dyd he. For he disguised him selfe in suche arraye and attire, as he thought no man could euer haue knowne him for the persone he was, seeing him in that apparell he had vpon his backe: and as Homer sayed of Ulysses,

So dyd he enter into the enemies towne.

It was euen twy light when he entered the citie of ANTIUM, and many people met him in the streetes, but no man knewe him. So he went directly to Tullus Aufidius house, and when he came thither, he got him vp straight to the chimney harthe, and sat him downe, and spake not a worde to any man, his face all muffled ouer. They of the house spying him, wondered what he should be, and yet they durst not byd him rise. For ill fauoredly muffled and disguised as he was, yet there appeared a certaine maiestie in his countenance, and in his silence: whereupon they went to Tullus who was at supper, to tell him of the strange disguising of this man. Tullus rose presently from the borde, and coming towards him, asked him what he was, and wherefore he came. Then Martius vnuffled him selfe, and after he had paused a while, making no answer, he sayed vnto him. If thou knowest me not yet, Tullus, and seeing me, dost not perhappes beleue me to be the man I am in dede, I must of necessitie bewraye my selfe to thee that I am. I am Caius Martius, who hath done to thy self particularly, and to all the VOLSCES generally, great hurte and mischief, which I cannot denie for my surname of Coriolanus that I beare. For I neuer had other benefit nor recompence, of all the true and paynefull seruice I haue done, and the extreme daungers I haue bene in, but this only surname: a good memorie and wimes, of the malice and displeasure thou shouldest beare me. In dede the name only remaineth with me: for the rest, the enuie and crueltie of the people of Rome haue taken from me, by the sufferance of the darstardly nobilitie and magistrates, who haue forsaken me, and let me be banished by the people. This extremitie hath now daüen me to come as a poore fletcher, to take thy chimney harthe, not of any hope I haue to faue my life thereby. For if I had feared death, I would not haue come higher to haue put my life in hazard: but prick forward with spite and desire I haue to be reuenged of them that thus haue banished me, whom now

I beginne to be auenged on, putting my persone betweene thy enemies. Wherefore, if thou haſt any hate to be wrecked of the iniuries thy enemies haue done thee, ſpede thee now, and let my miſerie ſerue thy turne, and ſo ſe it, as my ſeruiſe maye be a benefit to the VOIſCES: promiſing thee, that I will fight with better good will for all you, then euer I dyd when I was againſt you, knowing that they fight more valiantly, who knowe the force of their enemies, then ſuch as haue neuer proued it. And if it be ſo that thou dare not, and that thou art wearye to proue fortune any more then am I alſo weary to liue any longer. And it were no wiſedome in thee, to ſaue the life of him, who hath bene heretofore thy mortal enemy, and whole ſeruice now can nothing helpe nor pleaſure thee. Tullus hearing what he ſayed, was a maruelous glad man, and taking him by the hande, he ſayed vnto him. Stande vp, o Martius, and bee of good chere, for in profering thy ſelfe vnto vs, thou doſt vs great honour: and by this meanes thou mayeſt hope alſo of greater things, at all the VOIſCES handes. So he feaſted him for that time, and entertained him in the honorableſt manner he could, talking with him in no other matters at that preſent: but within fewe dayes after, they ſell to conſultation together, in what ſorte they ſhould beginne their warres. Now on thother ſide, the citie of ROME was in maruelous vprore, and diſcord, the nobilitie againſt the communaltie, and chiefly for Martius condemnation and baniſhment. Moreouer the prieſtes, the Soothſayers, and priuate men alſo, came and declared to the Senate certaine ſightes and wonders in the ayer, which they had ſene, and were to be conſidered of: amongſt the which, ſuch a viſion happened. There was a citizen of ROME called Titus Latinus, a man of meane qualitie & condition, but otherwiſe an honeſt ſober man, geuen to a quiet life, without ſuperſtition, and much leſſe to vanitie or lying. This man had a viſion in his dreame, in the which he thought that Iupiter appeared vnto him, and commaunded him to ſignifie to the Senate, that they had cauſed a very vile lewde daunſer to goe before the proceſſion: and ſayed, the firſt time this viſion had appeared vnto him, he made no reckoning of it: and comming againe another time into his minde, he made not much more account of the matter then before. In the ende, he ſawe one of his ſonnes dye, who had the beſt nature and condition of all his brethern: and ſodainely he him ſelfe was ſo taken in all his limmes, that he became lame and impotent. Hereupon he tolde the whole circumſtance of this viſion before the Senate, ſitting vpon his litle couche or bedde, whereon he was caried on mens armes: and he had no ſooner reported this viſion to the Senate, but he preſently felt his bodie & limmes reſtored againe, to their former ſtrength & uſe. So railing vp him ſelf vpon his couche, he got vp on his feete at that inſtant, & walked home to his houſe, without helpe of any man. The Senate being amazed at this matter, made diligent en-querie to vnderſtand the trothe: & in the ende they found there was ſuch a thing. There was one that had deliuered a bodman of his that had offended him, into the hands of other ſlaues & bondemen, & had commaunded them to whippe him vp & down the market place, & afterwards to kill him: & as they had him in execution, whipping him cruelly, they dyd ſo marrye the poore wretch, that for the cruell ſmart & payne he felt, he turned & writhed his bodie in ſtraunge & pittifull ſorte. The proceſſion by chance came by euen at the ſame time, & many that followed it, were hartely moued & offended with the ſight, ſaying: that this was no good ſight to behold, nor mete to be met in proceſſio time. But for all this, there was nothing done, ſauing they blamed & rebuked him, that puniſhed his ſlave ſo cruelly. For the ROMAINES that time dyd vſe their bondemen very gently, becauſe they them ſelues dyd labour with their owne hands, and liued with them, & among them: and therefore they dyd vſe them the more gently and familiarly. For the greateſt puniſhment they gaue a ſlave that had offended, was this. They made him carie a limmer on his ſhoulders that is faſtened to the axeltree of a coche, and compelled him to goe vp and downe in that ſorte amongſt all their neighbours.
 He that had once abidden this puniſhment, and was ſcene in that manner, was proclaimed and cried in euery market towne: ſo that no man would euer truſt him after, and they called him Euerſifer, becauſe the LATINES call the wodd that ronneth into the axeltree of the coche, Euerſifer, as much to ſaye, as a ſpoke. Now when Latinus had made reporte to the Senate of the viſion that had happened to him, they were deuſing whom this vnpleaſant daunſer ſhould be, that went before the proceſſion. Thereupon certain that ſtoode by, remembered the poore

Whereof Euerſifer came

A ſlave that was ſo cruelly whipped through the market place, whom they afterwarde put to death: and the thing that made them remember it, was the ſtraunge and rare manner of his puniſhment. The prieſtes hereupon were repaired vnto their aduſe: they were wholly of opinion, that it was the whipping of the ſlave. So they cauſed the ſlaves maſter to be puniſhed, and beganne againe a newe proceſſion, and all other ſhowes and ſightes in honour of Iupiter.
 But hereby appeareth plainly, how king Numa dyd wiſely ordaine all other ceremonies concerning deuotion to the goddes, and ſpecially this cuſtome which he ſtabliſhed, to bring the people to religion. For when the magiſtrates, biſhoppes, prieſtes, or other religious miniſters goe about any diuine ſeruiſe, or matter of religion, an herauld euer goeth before them, crying out alowde, Hoc age: as to ſaye, doe this, or minde this. Hereby they are ſpecially comanded, wholly to diſpoſe them ſelues to ſerue God, leauing all other buſines and matters a ſide: knowing well enough, that whatſoeuer moſt men doe, they doe it as in a manner conſtrained vnto it. But the ROMAINES dyd euer vſe to beginne againe their ſacrifices, proceſſions, playes, and ſuche like ſhowes done in honour of the goddes, not only vpon ſuche an occaſion, but apon lighter cauſes then that. As when they went a proceſſion through the citie, and dyd carie the images of their goddes, and ſuche other like holy relikes vpon open hallowed coches or char-rets, called in LATIN Thenſe: one of the coche horſes that dree them ſtoode ſtill, and would drawe no more: and becauſe alſo the coche man tooke the raynes of the bridle with the left hande, they ordained that the proceſſion ſhould be begonne againe a newe. Of later time alſo, they dyd renewe and beginne a ſacrifice thirtie times one after another, becauſe they thought C ſtill there fell out one faulte or other in the ſame, ſo holy and deuout were they to the goddes.
 Now Tullus and Martius had ſecret conference with the greateſt perſonages of the citie of ANTIUM, declaring vnto them, that now they had good time offered them to make warre with the ROMAINES, while they were in diſſention one with another. They answered them, they were aſhamed to breake the league, conſidering that they were ſworne to keepe peace for two yerres. Howbeit ſhortely after, the ROMAINES gaue them great occaſion to make warre with them. For on a holy daye common playes being kept in ROME, apon ſome ſuſpi-tion, or falſe reporte, they made proclamation by ſound of trumpet, that all the VOIſCES ſhould auoyde out of ROME before ſunne ſet. Some thincke this was a craffe and deceit of Martius, who ſent one to ROME to the Conſuls, to accuſe the VOIſCES falſely, aduertifying D them howe they had made a conſpiracie to ſet apon them, whileſt they were buſie in ſeeing theſe games, and alſo to ſet their citie a fyre. This open proclamation made all the VOIſCES more offended with the ROMAINES, then euer they were before: and Tullus aggrauating the matter, dyd ſo inflame the VOIſCES againſt them, that in the ende they ſent their ambaffa-dors to ROME, to ſummon them to deliuer their landes and townes againe, which they had taken from them in times paſt, or to looke for preſent warres. The ROMAINES hearing this, were maruelouſly netled: and made no other anſwer but thus. If the VOIſCES be the firſt that beginne warre: the ROMAINES will be the laſt that will ende it. Incontinently vpon returne of the VOIſCES ambaffadours, and deliuerie of the ROMAINES anſwer: Tullus cauſed an aſſembly generally to be made of the VOIſCES, and concluded to make warre apon E the ROMAINES. This done, Tullus dyd counſell them to take Martius into their ſeruiſe, and not to miſtruſt him for the remembrance of any thing paſt, but boldly to truſt him in any matter to come: for he would doe them more ſeruiſe in fighting for them, then euer he dyd them diſpleaſure in fighting againſt them. So Martius was called forth, who ſpake ſo excellently in the preſence of them all, that he was thought no leſſe eloquent in tongue, then warlike in ſhowe: and declared him ſelfe both expert in warres, and wiſe with vallianties. Thus he was ioyned in commiſſion with Tullus as generall of the VOIſCES, hauing abſolute authori-tie betwene the to follow & purſue the warres. But Martius fearing leaſt tract of time to bring this armie together with all the munition & furniture of the VOIſCES, would robbe him of the meane he had to execute his purpoſe and intent: left order with the rulers and chief of the F citie, to aſſemble the reſt of their power, and to prepare all neceſſary prouiſion for the campe.
 Then he wich the lighteſt ſouldiers he had, and that were willing to followe him, ſate away vpon the ſodaine, and marched with all ſpeede, and entred the territories of ROME, before the

ROMAINEs heard any newes of this comming. In so much the VOLSCES found such spoyle in the fields, as they had more then they could spend in their campe, and were wearie to drine and carie awaye that they had. Howbeit the gayne of the spoyle and the hurte they dyd to the ROMAINEs in this inuasion, was the least parte of his intent. For his chieft purpouse was, to increase still the malice and dissention betwene the nobilitie, and the communalitie: and to drawe that on, he was very carefull to keepe the noble mens landes & goods safe from harme and burning, but spoyled all the whole countrie besides, and would suffer no man to take or hurte any thing of the noble mens. This made greater sturre and broyle betwene the nobilitie and people, then was before. For the noble men fell out with the people, because they had so vniuittly banished a man of so great value and power. The people on thother side, accused the nobilitie, how they had procured Martius to make these warres, to be reuenged of them: because it pleased them to see their goodes burnt and spoyled before their eyes, whilest them selues were well at ease, and dyd behold the peoples losses and misfortunes, & knowing their owne goodes safe and out of daunger: and howe the warre was not made against the noble men, that had the enemy abroad, to keepe that they had in safety. Now Martius hauing done this first exploit (which made the VOLSCES bolder, and lesse fearefull of the ROMAINEs) brought home all the armie againe, without losse of any man. After their whole armie (which was maruelous great, and very forward to seruice) was assembled in one campe: they agreed to leaue parte of it for garrison in the countrie about, and the other parte should goe on, and make the warre upon the ROMAINEs. So Martius bad Tullus choole, and take which of the two charges he liked best. Tullus made him answer, he kneue by experience that Martius was no lesse valliant then him selfe, and howe he euer had better fortune and good happe in all battells, then him selfe had. Therefore he thought it best for him to haue the leading of those that should make the warres abroade: and him selfe would keepe home, to provide for the safety of the cities and of his countrie, and to furnishe the campe also of all necessary provision abroade. So Martius being stronger then before, went first of all vnto the cittie of CIRCES, inhabited by the ROMAINEs, who willingly yelded them selues, and therefore had no hurte. From thence, he entred the countrie of the LATINES, imagining the ROMAINEs would fight with him there, to defend the LATINES, who were their confederates, and had many times sent vnto the ROMAINEs for their ayde. But on the one side, the people of Rome were very ill willing to goe: and on the other side the Consuls being upon their going out of their office, would not hazard them selues for so small a time: so that the ambassadours of the LATINES returned home againe, and dyd no good. Then Martius dyd besiege their cities, and hauing taken by force the townes of the TOLERINIANS, VICANIANS, PEDANIANS, and the BOLANIANS, who made resistance: he sacked all their goodes, and tooke them prisoners. Suche as dyd yeld them selues willingly vnto him, he was as carefull as possible might be, to defend them from hurte: and because they should receyue no damage by his will, he removed his campe as farre from their confines as he could. Afterwards, he tooke the cittie of BOLES by assault, being about an hundred furlonge from Rome, where he had a maruelous great spoyle, and put euery man to the sword that was able to carie weapon. The other VOLSCES that were appointed to remaine in garrison for defence of their countrie, hearing this good newes, would tary no longer at home, but armed them selues, and ranne to Martius campe, saying they dyd acknowledge no other captaine but him. Hereupon his fame ranne through all ITALIE, and euery one praised him for a valliant captaine, for that by change of one man for another, suche and so strange euents fell out in the state. In this while, all went still to wracke at Rome. For, to come into the field to fight with the enemy, they could not abyde to heare of it, they were one so muche against another, and full of seditious wordes, the nobilitie against the people, & the people against the nobilitie. Vntill they had intelligence at the length that the enemies had layed seige to the cittie of LAVINIUM, in the which were all the temples and images of the goddes their protectours, and from whence came first their ancient originall, for that Aeneas at his first arriual into ITALIE dyd build that cittie. Then fell there out a maruelous sodain change of minde among the people, & farre more strange & contrarie in the nobilitie. For the people thought good to repeale the condemnation and

A exile of Martius. The Senate assembled vpon it, would in no case yeld to that. Who either dyd it of a selfe will to be contrarie to the peoples desire: or because Martius should not returne through the grace and fauour of the people. Or els, because they were thoroughly angrie and offended with him, that he would set upon the whole, being offended but by a fewe, and in his doings would shewe him selfe an open enemy besides vnto his countrie: notwithstanding the most parte of them tooke the wrong they had done him, in maruelous ill parte, and as if the iniurie had bene done vnto them selues. Reporte being made of the Senates resolution, the people founde them selues in a straight: for they could authorise and confirme nothing by their voyces, vnles it had bene first propounded and ordeined by the Senate. But Martius hearing this sturre about him, was in a greater rage with them then before: for so muche as he raised his seige incontinently before the cittie of LAVINIUM, and going towardes Rome, lodged his campe within fortie furlonge of the cittie, at the ditches called Clulie. His incamping so neere Rome, dyd put all the whole cittie in a wonderfull feare: howbeit for the present time it appeased the edition and dissention betwixt the Nobilitie and the people. For there was no Consul, Senatour, nor Magistrate, that durst once contrarie the opinion of the people, for the calling home againe of Martius. When they sawe the women in a maruelous feare, running vp and downe the cittie: the temples of the goddes full of olde people, weeping bitterly in their prayers to the goddes: and finally, not a man either wife or hardie to provide for their safetie: then they were all of opinion, that the people had reason to call home Martius againe, to reconcile them selues to him, and that the Senate on the contrary parte, were in maruelous great faulte to be angrie and in choller with him, when it floode them vpon rather to haue gone out and intreated him. So they all agreed together to send ambassadours vnto him, to let him vnderstand howe his countrymen dyd call him home againe, and restored him to all his goodes, and besought him to deliuer them from this warre. The ambassadours that were sent, were Martius familiar friends, and acquaintance, who looked at the least for a courteous welcome of him, as of their familiar friende and kynsman. Howbeit they founde nothing lesse. For at their comming, they were brought through the campe, to the place where he was set in his chayer of state, with a maruelous and an vnspokeable maiestie, hauing the chieft men of the VOLSCES about him: so he commaunded them to declare openly the cause of their comming. Which they deliuered in the most humble and lowly wordes they possible could deuise, and with all modest countenance and behauiour agreeable for the same. When they had done their message: for the iniurie they had done him, he answered them very hottely, and in great choller. But as generall of the VOLSCES, he willed them to restore vnto the VOLSCES, all their landes and citties they had taken from them in former warres: and moreover, that they should geue them the like honour and freedome of Rome, as they had before geuen to the LATINES. For otherwise they had no other meane to end this warre, if they dyd not graunte these honest and iust conditions of peace. Thereupon he gaue them thirtie dayes respite to make him answer. So the ambassadours returned straight to Rome, and Martius forthwith departed with his armie out of the territories of the ROMAINEs. This was the first matter wherewith the VOLSCES (that most enuied Martius glorie and authoritie) dyd charge Martius with. Among those, Tullus was chief: who thought he had receyued no priuate iniurie or displeasure of Martius, yet the common faulte and imperfection of mans nature wrought in him, and it grieved him to see his owne reputation bleamished, through Martius great fame and honour, and so him selfe to be lesse esteemed of the VOLSCES, then he was before. This fell out the more, because euery man honoured Martius, and thought he only could doe all, and that all other gouernours and captaines must be content with suche credit and authoritie, as he would please to countenance them with. From hence they deriued all their first accusations and secret murmurings against Martius. For priuate captaines conspiring against him, were very angrie with him: and gaue it out, that the removing of the campe was a manifest treason, not of the townes, nor fortres, nor of armes, but of time and occasion, which was a losse of great importance, because it was that which in treason might both lose and binde all, and preserue the whole. Now Martius hauing geuen the *ROMAINE*s thirte dayes respite for their answer, and specially because the warres haue not accustomed to make any great chaunges, in lesse space of time then that: he thought it good yet, not to lye a sleepe and idle all the while, but went and destroyed the landes of the enemies allies, and tooke seuen great cities of theirs well inhabited, and the *ROMAINE*s durst not once put their selues into the field, to come to their ayde and helpe: they were so fainte harted, so mistrustfull, and lothe besides to make warres. In so muche as they properly resembled the bodies paralyticke, and losed of their limmes and members as those which through the palsey haue lost all their fence and feeling. Wherefore, the time of peace expired, Martius being returned into the dominions of the *ROMAINE*s again with all his armie, they sent another ambassade vnto him, to praye peace, and the remoue of the VOLSCES out of their countrie: that afterwarde they might with better leysure fall to suche agreeementes together, as should be thought most mete and necessarie. For the *ROMAINE*s were no men that would euer yield for feare. But if he thought the VOLSCES had any grounde to demaunde reasonable articles and conditions, all that they would reasonably aske should be graunted vnto, by the *ROMAINE*s, who of them selues would willingly yeld to reason, conditionally, that they dyd laye downe armes. Martius to that answered: that as generall of the VOLSCES he would reple nothing vnto it. But yet as a ROMAINE citizen, he would counsell them to let fall their pride, and to be conformable to reason, if they were wise: and that they should returne againe within three dayes, deliuering vp the articles agreed vpon, which he had first deliuered them. Or otherwise, that he would no more geue them assurance or safe conuite to returne againe into his campe, with suche vaine and friuolous messages. When the ambassadours were returned to ROME, and had reported Mar-tius answer to the Senate: their citie being in extreme daunger, and as it were in a terrible storme or tempest, they threw out (as the common prouerbe sayeth) their holy anker. For then they appointed all the bishoppes, priestes, ministers of the goddes, and keepers of holy things, and all the augures or soothsayers, which forthowe things to come by obseruation of the flying of birdes (which is an olde auncient kynde of prophecying and diuination amongst the *ROMAINE*s) to goe to Martius apparelled, as when they doe their sacrifices: and first to intreate him to leaue of warre, and then that he would speake to his contrymen, and conclude peace with the VOLSCES. Martius suffered them to come into his campe, but yet he graunted them nothing the more, neither dyd he entertaine them or speake more curteously to them; then he dyd the first time that they came vnto him, sauing only that he willed them to take the one of the two: either to accept peace vnder the first conditions offered, or els to recte warre. When all this goodly rable of superstition and priestes were returned, it was determined in counsell that none should goe out of the gates of the citie, and that they should watche and warde vpon the walles, to repulse their enemies if they came to assault them: referring them selues and all their hope to time, and fortunes. vncertaine fauour, not knowing otherwise howe to remedie the daunger. Now all the citie was full of tumult, feare, and maruelous doubt what would happen: vntill at the length there fell our suche a like matter, as Homer oftentimes sayeth they would least haue thought of. For in great matters, that happen feldome, Homer sayeth, and crieth out in this sorte,

The goddesse Pallas she, with her fayer glittering eyes, dyd put into his minde suche thoughts, and made him so deuise.

And

A And in another place:

But sure some god hath s'ane out of the peoples minde, both v'is and vnderstanding eke, and haue therewith asyn'de some other simple spirite, in steede thereof to byde, that so they might their doings all, for lacke of v'is misgyde.

And in another place:

The people of them selues, did either it consider, or else some god instructed them, and so they soynde together.

Many reckon not of Homer, as referring matters vnpossible, and fables of no likely hooode ortrothe, vnto mans reason, free will, or iudgement: which in deede is not his meaning. But B things true & likely, he maketh to depend of our owne free wil and reason. For he oft speaketh these wordes:

I haue thought it in my noble harte.

And in another place:

Achilles angrie vvas, and sorie for to heare him so to say, his beauey brest vvas fraught vwith pensiue feare.

And againe in another place:

Bellerophon (she) could not moue vwith her fayer songe, so honest and so vertuous, he vvas the rest aming.

But in wonderous and extraordinary things, which are done by secret inspirations and C motions, he doth not say that God taketh away, from man his choyce and freedome of will, but that he doth moue it: neither that he doth worke desire in vs, but obiecteth to our minde certain imaginations whereby we are lead to desire, and thereby doth not make this our action forced, but openeth the way to our will, and addeth thereto courage, and hope of successe. For, either we must say, that the goddes meddle not with the causes and beginninges of our actions: or else what other meanes haue they to helpe and further men? It is appaunt that they handle not our bodies, nor moue not our feete and handes, when there is occasion to vse them: but that parte of our minde from which these motions pro-ceede, is induced thereto, or caried away by such obiectes and reasons, as God offereth vnto it. Now the ROMAINE Ladies and gentlewomen did visite all the temples and goddes D of the same, to make their prayers vnto them: but the greatest Ladies (and more parte of them) were continuallie about the altar of Iupiter Capitolin, emonge which troupe by name, was Valeria, *Publicola*s owne sister. The selfe same Publicola, who did such notable seruice to the *ROMAINE*s, both in peace & warres: and was dead also certaine yeares before, as we haue declared in his life. His sister Valeria was greatly honoured and reuerenced amonge all the *ROMAINE*s: and did so modestlie and wisely behaue her selfe, that she did not shame nor dishonour the house she came of. So she sodainly fell into suche a fanisie, as we haue rehearsed before, and had (by some god as I thinke) taken holde of a noble deuise.
Whereuppon therofe, and thother Ladies with her, and they all together went straight to the house of Volumnia, Martius mother: and comming in to her, founde her, and Martius E wife her daughter in lawe set together, and hauinge her husbande Martius young children in her lappe. Now all the traine of these Ladies sitinge in a ringe rounde about her: Valeria first beganne to speake in this sorte vnto her. We Ladies, are come to visite you Ladies (my Ladie Volumnia and Virgilia) by no direction from the Senate, nor commaundement of other magistrate: but through the inspiration (as I take it) of some god aboue.
Who hauinge taken compassion and pitie of our prayers, hath moued vs to come vnto you, to intreate you in a matter, as well beneficiall for vs, as also for the whole citizens in gene-all: but to your selues in especial (if it please you to credit me) and shall redounde to our more fame and glorie, then the daughters of the Sabyne obtained in formerage, when they procured louinge peace, in stead of hatefull warre, betwene their fathers and their husbands. Come on good ladies, and let vs goe all together vnto Martius, to intreate him to take pittie vpon vs, and also to reporte the trothe vnto him, howe much you are bounde vnto the citizens: who notwithstanding they haue susteined greate hurte and losses by him, yet they haue not hetherto sought reuenge apon your persons by any discourtuous viage, neither euer conceyued any such thought or intent against you, but doe deliuer ye safe into his handes, though thereby they looke for no better grace or clemency from him.

 When Valeria had spoken this vnto them, all thother ladies together with one voyce confirmed that she had sayed. Then Volumnia in this sorte did aunswer her. My good ladies, we are partakers with you of the common miserie and calamitie of our countrie, and yet your griefe exceedeth yours the more, by reason of our particular misfortune: to seele the losse of my sonne Martius former valiancie and glorie, and to see his persone enuironed now with our enemies in armes, rather to see him forth comming and safe kept, then of any loue to defende his persone. But yet the greatest griefe of our heaped mishappes is, to see our poore countrie brought to such extremitie, that all the hope of the safetie and preseruation thereof, is now unfortunately cast vpon vs simple women: because we knowe not what accompt he will make of vs, since he hath cast from him all care of his naturall countrie and common weale, which heretofore he hath holden more deere and precious, then either his mother, wife, or children. Notwithstandinge, if ye thinke we can doe good, we will willingly doe what you will haue vs: bringe vs to him I pray you. For if we can not preuaile, we maye yet dye at his feete, as humble suiters for the safetie of our countrie. Her aunswere ended, she tooke her daughter in lawe, and Martius children with her, and being accompanied with all the other ROMAINE ladies, they went in troupe together vnto the Volsces campe: whome when they sawe, they of them selues did both pittie and reuerence her, and there was not a man amonge them that once durst say a worde vnto her. Nowe was Martius set then in his chayer of state, with all the honours of a generall, and when he had spide the women comming a farr off, he marueled what the matter meant but afterwarde knowing his wife which came foremost, he determined at the first to persist in his obstinate and inflexible rancker. But ouercomen in the ende with naturall affection, and being altogether altered to see them: his harte would not serue him to tarie their comming to his chayer, but comming downe in hast, he went to meete them, and first he kissed his mother, and imbraced her a pretie while, then his wife and litle children. And nature so wrought with him, that the teares fell from his eyes, and he could not keepe him selfe from making much of them, but yielded to the affection of his blood, as if he had bene violently caried with the furie of a most swift running streame. After he had thus louingly receiued them, and perceiuinge that his mother Volumnia would beginne to speake to him, he called the chiefe of the councill of the Volsces to heare what she would say. Then she spake in this sorte. If we helde our peace (my sonne) and determined not to speake, the state of our poore bodies, and present sight of our payment, would easely betray to thee what life we haue led at home, since thy exile and abode abroad. But thinke now with thy selfe, howe much more vnfortunatly, then all the women liuinge we are come he-ther, considering that the sight which should be most pleasant to all other to beholde, spitefull fortune hath made most fearefull to vs: making my selfe to see my sonne, and my daughter here, her husband, besieging the walles of his natie countrie. So as that which is thonly comforte to all other in their aduersitie and miserie, to pray vnto the goddess, and to call to them for aide: is the onely thinge which plongeth vs into most deepe perplexitie. For we can not (alas) together pray, both for victorie, for our countrie, and for safetie of thy life also: but a worlde of greivous curses, yea more then any mortall enemy can heape vpon vs, are forcibly wrapt vp in our prayers. For the bitter soppe of most harde choyce is offered thy wife & children, to forgoe the one of the two: either to lose the persone of thy selfe, or the nurse of their natie contrie. For my selfe (my sonne) I am determined not to tarie, till fortune

The oration of Volumnia, vnto her sonne Coriolanus.

A in my life time doe make an ende of this warre. For if I cannot persuaide thee, rather to doe good vnto both parties, then to ouerthrowe and destroye the one, preferring loue and nature, before the malice and calamitie of warres: thou shalt see, my sonne, and trust vnto it, thou shalt no foner marche forward to assault thy countrie, but thy foote shall treade vpon thy mothers wombe, that brought thee first into this world. And I maye not deferre to see the daye, either that my sonne be led prisoner in triumphe by his naturall country men, or that he him selfe doe triumphe of them, and of his naturall countrie. For if it were so, that my request tended to saue thy countrie, in destroying the Volsces: I must cōfesse, thou wouldest hardly and doubtfully resolute on that. For as to destroye thy naturall countrie, it is altogether vnmete and vnlawfull: so were it not iust, and lesse honorable, to betraye those that put their trust in thee. But my only demaunde consisteth, to make a gayle deliuerie of all euills, which deliue-reth equall benefit and safetie, both to the one and the other, but most honorable for the Vols-ces. For it shall appeare, that hauing victorie in their handes, they haue of speciall fauour granted vs singular graces: peace, and amitie, albeit them selues haue no lesse parte of both, then we. Of which good, if so it came to passe, thy selfe is thonly author, and so hast thou thonly honour. But if it faile, and fall out contrarie: thy selfe alone deferuently shall carie the shamefull reproche and burden of either partie. So, though the ende of warre be vnertaine, yet this notwithstanding is most certaine: that if it be thy chauce to conquer, thy benefite shalt thou reape of thy goodly cōquest, to be chronicled the plague & destroyer of thy coun-trie. And if fortune also ouerthrowe thee, then the world will saye, that through desire to reuenge thy priuate iniuries, thou hast for euer vndone thy good friendes, who dyd most louing-ly and curteously receiue thee. Martius gaue good eare vnto his mothers wordes, without interrupting her speache at all: and after she had sayed what she would, he held his peace a pretie while, and answered not a worde. Hereupon she beganne againe to speake vnto him, and sayed. My sonne, why dost thou not aunswer me? dost thou thinke it good altogether to geue place vnto thy choller and desire of reuenge, and thinkest thou it not honestie for thee to graunt thy mothers request, in so weighty a cause? dost thou take it honorable for a noble man, to remember the wronges and iniuries done him: and dost not in like case thinke it an honest noble mans parte, to be thankefull for the goodnes that parents doe shewe to their children, acknowledging the duty and reuerence they ought to beare vnto them? No man D liuing is more bounde to shewe him selfe thankefull in all partes and respects, then thy selfe: who so vnaturally sheweth all ingratitude. Moreouer (my sonne) thou hast forely taken of thy countrie, exacting greivous payments apon them, in reuenge of the iniuries offered thee: besides, thou hast not hitherto shewed thy poore mother any curtesie. And therefore, it is not only honest, but due vnto me, that without compulsion I should obtaine my so iust and reasonable request of thee. But since by reason I cannot persuaide thee to it, to what purpose doe I de-ferre my last hope? And with these wordes, her selfe, his wife and children, fell downe vpon their knees before him. Martius seeing that, could restraîne no longer, but went straight and lifte her vp, crying out: Oh mother, what haue you done to me? And holding her hard by the right hande, oh mother, sayed he, you haue wonne a happy victorie for your countrie, but E mortall and vnhappy for your sonne: for I see my self vanquished by you alone. These wordes being spoken openly, he spake a litle aparte with his mother and wife, and then let them returne againe to ROME, for so they dyd request him: and so remaining in campe that night, the next morning he dislodged, and marched homewards into the Volsces countrie againe, who were not all of one minde, nor all alike contented. For some misliked him, and that he had done. Other being well pleased that peace should be made, sayed: that neither the one, nor the other, deserued blame nor reproche. Other, though they misliked that was done, dyd not thincke him an ill man for that he dyd, but sayed: he was not to be blamed, though he yielded to suche a forcible extremitie. Howbeit no man contraried his departure, but all obeyed his commaundement, more for respect of his worthines and valiancie, then for feare of his au-thoritie. Now the citizens of ROME plainly shewed, in what feare and daunger their cittie stood of this warre, when they were deliuered. For so fone as the watche vpon the walles of the cittie perceyued the Volsces campe to remoue, there was not a temple in the cittie but was presently set open, and full of men, wearing garlands of flowers vpon their heads, sacrificing to the goddesses, as they were wont to doe vpon the newes of some great obtained victo-rie. And this common ioye was yet more manifestly shewed, by the honorable curtesies the whole Senate, and people dyd bestowe on their ladies. For they were all thoroughly persuaded, and dyd certainly beleue, that the ladies only were cause of the sauing of the citie, and deliuering them selues from the instant daunger of the warre. Whereupon the Senate ordeined, that the magistrates to graunt and honour these ladies, should graunte them all that they would require. And they only requested that they would build a temple of Fortune of the women, for the building whereof they offered them selues to defraye the whole charge of the sacrifices, and other ceremonies belonging to the seruice of the goddesses. Neuertheles, the Senate commending their good will and forwardnes, ordeined, that the temple and image should be made at the common charge of the citie. Notwithstanding that, the ladies gathered money among them, and made with the same a second image of Fortune, which the ROMAINES saye dyd speake as they offered her vp in the temple, and dyd set her in her place: and they ascribe, that she spake these wordes. Ladies, ye haue deuoutly offered me vp. Moreouer, that the spake that twise together, making vs to beleue things that neuer were, and are not to be credited. For to see images that seeme to sweate or weepe, or to put forth any humour red or blowdie, it is not a thing vnpossible. For wodde and stone doe commonly receiue certaine moysture, whereof is ingendred an humour, which doe yeld of them selues, or doe take of the ayer, many sortes and kyndes of spottes and cullers: by which signes and tokens it is not amisse we thincke, that the goddesses sometimes doe warne men of things to come. And it is possible also, that these images and statues doe sometimes put forth foundes, like vnto sighes or mourning, when in the midst or bosome of the same, there is made some violent separation, or breaking a sonder of things, blown or deuised therein: but that a bodie which hath neither life nor soule, should haue any direct or exquisite worde formed in it by expresse voyce, that is altogether vnpossible. For the soule, nor god him selfe can distinctly speake without a bodie, hauing necessarie organes and instrumentes mete for the partes of the same, to forme and vtter distinct wordes. But where stories many times doe force vs to beleue a thing reported to be true, by many graue testimonies: there we must saye, that it is some passion contrarie to our due naturall senses, which being begotten in the imaginatiue parte or vnderstanding, draweth an opinion vnto it selfe, euen as we doe in our sleeping. For many times we thinke we heare, that we doe not heare: and we imagine we see, that we see not. Yet notwithstanding, such as are godly bent, and zealously geuen to thinke upon heavenly things, so as they can no waye be drawn from beleueing that which is spoken of them, they haue this reason to grounde the foundation of their beleefe vpon. That is, the omnipotencie of God which is wonderfull, and hath no manner of resemblance or like-lines of proportion vnto ours, but is altogether contrarie as touching our nature, our mouing, our arte, and our force: and therefore if he doe any thing vnpossible to vs, or doe bring forth and deuise things, without mans common reach and vnderstanding, we must not therefore thinke it vnpossible at all. For if in other things he is farre contrarie to vs, muche more in his workes and secret operations, he farre passeth all the rest: but the most parte of goddesses doings, as Heraclitus sayeth, for lacke of faith, are hidden and vnknown vnto vs. Now when Martius was returned againe into the citie of ANTIUM from his voyage, Tullius that hated and could no longer abide him for the feare he had of his autho-ritie: sought diuers meanes to make him out of the waye, thinking that if he let slippe that present time, he should neuer recouer the like and fit occasion againe. Wherefore Tullius hauing procured many other of his confederacy, required Martius might be deposed from his estate, to render vp accompt to the VOLSCES of his charge and government. Martius fearing to become a priuate man againe vnder Tullius being generall (whose authoritie was greater otherwise, then any other among all the VOLSCES) answered: he was willing to geue vp his charge, and would resigne it into the handes of the lordes of the VOLSCES, if they dyd all commaund him, as by all their commaundement he receiued it. And moreo-uer, that he would not refuse euen at that present to geue vp an accompt vnto the people, if

A if they would tarie the hearing of it. The people hereupon called a common counsaill, in which assembly there were certen orators appointed, that stirred vp the common people against him: and when they had tolde their tales, Martius rose vp to make them answer.
 Now notwithstanding the mutinous people made a maruelous great noyse, yet when they sawe him, for the reuerence they bare vnto his valliantnes, they quieted them selues, and gaue still audience to alledge with leysure what he could for his purgation. Moreouer, the hone-stillest men of the ANTIATES, and who most reioyced in peace, shewed by their countenance that they would heare him willingly, and iudge also according to their conscience. Whereupon Tullius fearing that if he dyd let him speake, he would proue his innocencie to the people, because amongest other things he had an eloquent tongue, besides that the first good seruice he had done to the people of the VOLSCES, dyd winne him more fauour, then these last accusations could purchase him displeasure: and furthermore, the offence they layed to his charge, was a testimonie of the good will they ought him, for they would neuer haue thought he had done them wrong for that they tooke not the citie of ROME, if they had not bene very neere taking of it, by meanes of his approche and conduction. For these causes Tullius thought he might no longer delaye his pretence and enterprise, neither to tarie for the mu-tining and rising of the common people against him: wherefore, those that were of the conspiracie, beganne to crie out that he was not to be heard, nor that they would not suffer a traytour to vsurpe tyrannicall power ouer the tribe of the VOLSCES, who would not yeld vp his estate and authoritie. And in saying these wordes, they all fell vpon him, and killed him in the market place, none of the people once offering to rescue him. Howbeit it is a clere case, that this murder was not generally consented vnto, of the most parte of the VOLSCES: for men came out of all partes to honour his bodie, and dyd honorably burie him, setting out his tombe with great store of armour and spoyle, as the tombe of a worthie persone and great captain. The ROMAINES vnderstanding of his death, shewed no other honour or malice, sauing that they graunted the ladies the request they made: that they might moune tenne moneths for him, and that was the full time they vsed to weare blackes for the death of their fathers, brethern, or husbands, according to Numa Pompilius order, who stablished the same, as we haue enlarged more ampie in the description of his life. Now Martius being dead, the whole state of the VOLSCES hartely wished him aliue againe. For first of all they fell out with the ÆQVIBS (who were their friends and confederates) touching preheminece and place: and this quarrell grew on so farre betwene them, that frayes and murders fell out upon it one with another. After that, the ROMAINES ouercame them in battell, in which Tullius was slaine in the field, and the flower of all their force was put to the sworde: so that they were compelled to accept most shamefull conditions of peace, in yelding them selues subiect vnto the conquerers, & promising to be obedient at their commandement.

THE COMPARISON OF AL- cibiades with Martius Coriolanus.

The gifts done by bush.

The manner of Alcibiades

NOW that we haue written all the dedes of worthie memorie, done by either of them both: we maye presently diserne, that in matters of warre, the one hath not greatly exceeded the other. For both of them in their charge, were a like hardie & valliant for their persones, as also wise and politike in the warres: vnles they will saye, that Alcibiades was the better captaine, as he that had foughten more battells with his enemies, both by sea and lande, then euer Coriolanus had done, and had allwayes the victorie of his enemies. For otherwise, in this they were much a like: that where they were both present & had, charge and power to commaund, all things prospered notably, and with good successe on the parte they were of: and also when they tooke the contrary side, they made the first haue the worse euery waye. Now for matters of gouernment, the noble men and honest citizens dyd hate Alcibiades manner of rule in the common weale, as of a man most dissolute, and geuen to flatterie: bicause he euer studied by all deuise he could, to currie fauour with the common people. So dyd the ROMAINES malice also Coriolanus gouernment, for that it was to arrogant, prowde, and tyrannicall: whereby neither the one nor the other was to be commended. Notwithstanding, he is lesse to be blamed, that seeketh to please and gratifie his common people: then he that despiseth and disdaineth them, and therefore offereth them wrong and iniurie, bicause he would not seeme to flatter them, to winne the more authoritie. For as it is an euill thing to flatter the common people to winne credit: euen so is it besides dishonesty, and iniustice also, to attaine to credit and authoritie, for one to make him selfe terrible to the people, by offering them wrong and violence. It is true that Martius was euer counted an honest natured man, plaine and simple, without arte or cunning: Howbeit Alcibiades merely contrarie, for he was fine, subtil, and deceifull. And the greatest faulte they euer burdened Alcibiades for, was his malice and deceit, whereby he abused the ambassadours of the LACEDÆMONIANS, & that he was a let that peace was not concluded, as Thucydides reporteth. Now, though by this acte he sodainly brought the citie of ATHENS into warres, yet he brought it thereby to be of greater power, and more fearefull to the enemies, by making alliance with the MANTINIANES and the ARGIVES, who by Alcibiades practise entred into league with the ATHENIANES. And Martius, as Dionysius the historiographer writeth: dyd by craft and deceit bring the ROMAINES into warres against the VOLSCES, causing the VOLSCES maliciously, and wrongfully to be suspected, that went to ROME to see the games played. But the cause why he dyd it, made the fact so much more fowle and wicked. For it was not done for any ciuill disension, nor for any ielousy and contention in matters of gouernment, as Alcibiades dyd: but only following his cholerike moode, that would be pleased with no thing, as Dion sayed, he would

A world needes trouble and turmoile the most parte of ITALIE, and so beinge angrie with his countrie, he destroyed many other townes and cities that could not helpe it, nor doe with all. This is true also, that Alcibiades spite and malice did worke great muchiefe and miserie to his countrie: but when he saw they repented them of the iniurie they had done him, he came to him selfe, and did withdrawe his armie. An other time also, when they had banished Alcibiades, he would not yet suffer the captaines of the ATHENIANES to runne into great errors, neither would he see them cast away, by followinge ill counsell which they tooke, neither would he forsake them in any danger they put them selues into. But he did the very same that Aristides had done in olde time vnto Themistocles, for which he was then, and is yet so greatly praised. For he went vnto the captaines that had charge then of the armie of the ATHENIANES, although they were not his friends, and tolde them wherein they did amisse, and what they had further to doe. Where Martius to the contrarie, did first great hurte vnto the whole citie of ROME, though all in ROME had not generally offended him: yea, and when the best and chiefe part of the citie were grieved for his sake, and were very sone and angrie for the iniurie done him. Furthermore, the ROMAINES sought to appeale one onely displeasure and despite they had done him, by many ambassades, petitions and requestes they made, whereunto he neuer yielded, while his mother, wife, and children came, his hate was so hardened. And hereby it appeared he was entred into this cruell warre (when he would harken to no peace) of an intent vtterly to destroy and spoyle his countrie, and not as though he ment to recouer it, or to returne thither againe. Here was in deede the difference betwene them: that spialls beinge layed by the LACEDÆMONIANS to kill Alcibiades, for the malice they did beare him, as also for that they were affrayed of him, he was compelled to returne home againe to ATHENS. Where Martius contrariwise, hauing bene so honorably receiued and entertained by the VOLSCES, he could not with honestie forsake them, considering they had done him that honour, as to choole him their generall, and trusted him so farre, as they put all their whole armie and power into his handes: and not as thother, whome the LACEDÆMONIANS rather abused, then vfed him, suffering him to goe vp and downe their citie (and afterwards in the midst of their campe) without honour or place at all. So that in the ende Alcibiades was compelled to put him selfe into the handes of Tisaphernes: vnlesse they will say that he went thither of purpose to him, with intent to saue the citie of ATHENS from vtter destruction, for the desire he had to returne home againe. Moreover, we read of Alcibiades, that he was a great taker, and would be corrupted with money: and when he had it, he would most licentiously and dishonestly spend it. Where Martius in contrarie maner would not so much as accept giftes lawefully offered him by his Captaines, to honour him for his valliantesse. And the cause why the people did beare him such ill will, for the controuersie they had with the Nobilitie about clearing of dettes, grew: for that they knewe well enough it was not for any gayne or benefite he had gotten thereby, so much as it was for spite and displeasure he thought to doe them. Antipater in a letter of his, writing of the death of Aristotle the philosopher, doth not without cause commending the singular giftes that were in Alcibiades, and this inespically: that he passed all other forwinning mens good willes. Whereas Alcibiades noble actes and vertues, wanting that affabilitie, became hatefull euen to those that receiued benefit by them, who could not abide his feueritie and selfe will: which causeth delolation (as Plato sayeth) and men to be ill followed, or altogether forsaken. Contrariwise, seeing Alcibiades had a trimme entertainment, and a very good grace with him, and could fashion him selfe in all companies: it was no maruell if his well doing were gloriously commended, and him selfe much honoured and beloued of the people, considering that some faultes he did, were oftentimes taken for matters of sporte, and toyes of pleasure. And this was the cause, that though many times he did great hurte to the common weale, yet they did ofte make him their generall, and trusted him with the charge of the whole citie. Where Martius suing for an office of honour that was due to him, for the fundrie good seruices he had done to the state, was notwithstanding repulled, and put by. Thus doe we see, that they to whome the one did hurte, had no power to hate him: and thother that honoured his vertue, had no liking to loue his person. Martius also did neuer any great explayte, beinge generall of his contrie men, but when he was generall of their enemies against his naturall contrie: whereas Alcibiades, being both a priuate person, and a generall, did notable seruice vnto the ATHE-NIANS. By reason whereof, Alcibiades wherefoeuer he was present, had the vpper hande euer of his accusers, euen as he would him selfe, and their accusations tooke no place against him: onlesse it were in his absence. Where Martius being present, was condemned by the RO-MAINES: and in his person murdered, and slaine by the VOLSCES. But here I can not say they haue done well, nor iustly, albeit him selfe gaue them some colour to doe it, when he openly denied the ROMAINE Ambassadors peace, which after he priuadly graunted, at the request of women. So by this dede of his, he tooke not away the enmity that was betwene both people: but leauing warre still betwene them, he made the VOLSCES (of whome he was generall) to lose the oportunitie of noble victory. Where in deede he should (if he had done as he ought) haue withdrawn his armie with their counsaill & consent, that had reposed so great affiance in him, in making him their generall: if he had made that accompt of them, as their good will towards him did in duety binde him. Or else, if he did not care for the VOLSCES in the enterprise of this warre, but had only procured it of intent to be reuenged, and afterwards to leaue it of, when his anger was blowne ouer: yet he had no reason for the loue of his mother to par-done his contrie, but rather he should in pardoning his contrie, haue spared his mother, because his mother & wife were members of the bodie of his contrie and city, which he did besiege. For in that he vncurtously reiected all publike petitions, requestes of Ambassadors, in-treaties of the bishoppes & priestes, to gratifie only the request of his mother with his departure: that was no acte so much to honour his mother with, as to dishonour his contrie by the which was preferred for the pitie and intercession of a woman, & not for the loue of it selfe, as if it had not bene worthie of it. And so was this departure a grace, to say truly, very odious and cruell, and deserued no thanks of either partie, to him that did it. For he withdrew his army, nor at the request of the *ROMAINE*s, against whom he made warre: nor with their consent, whose charge the warre was made. And of all his misfortune and ill happe, the austeritie of his nature, and his hawtie obstinate minde, was the onely cause: the which of it selfe being hatefull to the world, when it is ioyned with ambition, it groweth then much more churlish, fierce, and intollerable. For men that haue that fault in nature, are not affable to the people, seeming thereby as though they made no estimation or regard of the people: and yet on the other side, if the people should not geue them honour and reuerence, they would straight take it in scorne, and litle care for the matter. For so did Metellus, Aristides, and Epaminondas, all vsed this manner: not to seeke the good will of the common people by flatterie and dissimulation: which was in deede, because they despised that which the people could geue or take away. Yet would they not be offended with their citizens, when they were amerced, and set at any fines, or that they banished them, or gaue them any other repulle: but they loued them as wel as they did before, so soone as they shewed any token of repentance, & that they were sorie for the wrong they had done them, and were easely made frendes againe with them, after they were restored from their banishment. For he that didd ineith to make much of the people, and to haue their fauour, should much more scorne to seeke to be reuenged, when he is repulled. For, to take a repulle and deniall of honour, so inwardly to the hart: commeth of no other cause, but that he did too earnestly desire it. Therefore Alcibiades did not dissemble at all, that he was not very glad to see him selfe honored, and sorie to be reiected and denied any honour: but also he fought all the meanes he could to make him selfe beloued of those amongst whome he liued. Whereas Martius stowtnes, and hawty stomake, did stay him from making much of those, that might aduaunce and honour him: and yet his ambition made him gnawe him selfe for spite and anger, when he sawe he was despised. And this is all that reasonably may be reprov'd in him: for otherwise he lacked no good commendable vertues and qualities. For his temperance, and cleane handes from taking of bribes and money, he may be compared with the most perfect, vertuous, and honest men of all GREEKS: but not with Alcibiades, who was in that vndoubtedly alwayes too licentious & loosely geuen, and had too small regard of his credit and honestie.

Paulus Æmilius.

WHEN I first beganne to write these liues, my intent was to profit other: but since, continuing and going on, I haue muche profited my self by looking into these histories, as if I looked into a glasse, to frame and facion my life, to the mould and patteredne of these vertuous noble men. For ronning ouer their manners in this sorte, and seeking also to describe their liues: me thinks I am still conuersant and familiar with them, and doe as it were lodge them with me, one after another. And when I come to peruse their histories, and to waye the ver-tues and qualities they haue had, and what singularitie eche of them possessed: and to choose and culle out the chiefest things of note in them, and their best spea-ches and doings most worthie of memorie: Then Icrie out,

O gods, can there be more passing pleasure in the world?

Or is there any thing of more force, to teach man ciuill maners, & a ruled life, or to reforme the vice in man? Democritus the philosopher writeth, that we should praye we might euer see happy images and sightes in the ayer, and that the good which is meete and proper to our nature, maye rather come to vs, then that is euill and vnfortunate: presupposing a false opinion and doctrine in philosophie, which allureth men to infinite superstitions. That there are good and bad images flying in the ayer, which geue a good or ill impression vnto men, and incline men to vice, or to vertue. But as for me, by continuall reading of auncient histories, and gathering these liues together which now I leaue before you, and by keeping allwayes in minde the actes of the most noble, vertuous, and best geuen men of former age, and worthie memo-rie: I doe teache and prepare my selfe to shake of & banishe from me, all lewde and dishonest condition, if by chance the companie and conuersation of them whose companie I keepe, and must of necessitie haunte, doe acquainte me with some vnhappy or vngratious touche.
This is easie vnto me, that doe dispose my quiet minde, & not troubled with any passion, vnto the deepe consideration of so many noble examples. As I doe present vnto you now in this volume, the liues of Timoleon the CORINTHIAN, and of Paulus Æmilius the ROMAINE, who had not only a good & an vpright minde with them, but were also fortunate and happie, in all the matters they both did take in hand. So as you shall hardly iudge, when you haue red ouer their liues, whether wisdome, or good fortune brought them to archieue to suche honorable actes and employes as they dyd. Many (& the most parte of historiographers) doe write, that the house and familie of the Æmylians in ROME, was allwayes of the most ancient of the nobilitie, which they call Patricians. Some writers affirme also, that the first of the house that gaue name to all the posteritie after, was Marcus, the sonne of Pythagoras the wife, whom king Numa for the sweetnes and pleasaunt grace of his tongue, furnished Marcus Æmylius, and those specially affirme it, that saye king Numa was Pythagoras scholler. Howsoever it was, the most parte of this familie that obtained honour and estimation for their vertue, were euer fortunate also in all their doings, sauing Lucius Paulus only, who dyed in the battell of CANNES. But his misfortune doth beare manifest testimonie of his wilddome and valliancy together. For he was forced to fight against his will, when he sawe he could not brydle the rashnes of his fellowe Consul that would neder ioyne battell, and to doe as he dyd, flied that he fled not as the other, who being first procurer of the battell, was the first that ranne awaye where he to the contrary, to his power dyd what he could to let him, and dyd sicke by it, & fought it valliantly vnto the last gaspe. This Æmylius left a daughter behind him called Æmylia, which was married vnto Scipio the great: and a sonne, Paulus Æmylius, being the same man whose life we presently treat of. His youth fortunately fell out in a flourishing time of glorie and honour, through the sundrie vertues of many great and noble persones liuing in those dayes, among whom he made his name famous also: and it was not by that ordinarie arte and course, which the best esteemed young men of that age dyd take and followe. For he dyd not vse to plead priuate mens causes in lawe, neither would creepe into mens fauour by fawning vpon any of them: though he sawe it a common practise, & policie of men, to seeke the peoples fauour and good willes by such meanes. Moreover, he refused not that common course which other tooke, for that it was contrary to his nature, or that he could not frame with either of both, if he had bene so disposed: but he rather fought to winne reputation by his honestie, his valliantnes, and vpriight dealing, as chooseth that the better waye, then either of thother two, in so much as in maruelous thorte time he passed all those that were of his age. The first office of honour he sued for, was the office of Ædilis, in which sure he was preferred before twelue other that sued for the selfe same office: who were men of no small qualitie, for they all came afterwards to be Consuls. After this, he was chosen to be one of the number of the priestes, whom the ROMAINES call Augures: who haue the charge of all the diuinations and soothesayings, in telling of things to come by flying of byrdes, & signes in the ayer. He was so carefull, and tooke suche paynes to vnderstand how the ROMAINES dyd vse the same, & with suche diligence fought the obseruation of the ancient religion of ROMAINES in all holie matters: that where that priesthood was before esteemed but a title of honour, & desired for the name only: he brought it to passe, that it was the most honorable science, & best reputed of in ROME. Wherein he confirmed the philosophers opinion: that religion is the knowledge how to serue God. For when he dyd any thing belonging to his office of priesthood, he dyd it with great experience, iudgment, and diligence, leauing all other thoughtes, & without omitting any auncient ceremonie, or adding to any newe, contending oftentimes with his companions, in things which seemed light, and of small moment: declaring vnto them, that though we doe presume the goddesses are easie to be pacified, and that they readilie pardon all faultes & escapes committed by negligence, yet if it were no more but for respect of common wealths sake, they should not lightly, nor carelesly dissemble or passe ouer faultes committed in those matters. For no man (sayeth he) at the first that committeth any faulte, doth alone trouble the state of the common wealth: but withall, we must thincke he leaueth the groundes of ciuill gouernment, that is not as carefull to keepe the institutions of small matters, as also of the great. So was he also a seuerer captaine, and strict obseruer of all marshall discipline, not seeking to winne the souldiers loue by flatterie, when he was general in the field, as many dyd in that time: neither corrupting them for a second charge, by shewing him selfe gentle and curteous in the first, vnto those that serued vnder him: but him selfe dyd orderly shew them the very rules and preceptes of the discipline of warres, euen as a priest that should expresse the names and ceremonies of some holy sacrifice, wherein was danger to omit any parte or parcell. Howbeit, being terrible to execute the lawe of armes upon rebellious lious and disobedient souldiers, he kept vp thereby the state of the common weale the better: iudging, to overcome the enemy by force, was but an accefforie as a man maye terme it, in respect of well training and ordering his citizens by good discipline. While the ROMAINES were in warres against king Antiochus furnished the great, in the South partes: all the chiefe captaines of ROME being employed that wayes, there fell out another in the necke of that, in the West partes towards SPAYNE, where they were all vp in armes. Thither they sent Æmylius Prætor, not with sixe axes as the other Prætors had borne before them, but with twelue: so that vnder the name of Prætor, he had the authoritie and dignitie of a Consul. He twice overcame the barbarous people in mayne battell, and slue a thirtie thousand of them, and got this victorie through his great skill and wilddome, in chooseth the aduantage of place and time, to fight with his enemies, euen as they passed ouer a riuer: which easely gaue his souldiers the victorie. Moreover he tooke there, two hundred and fiftie citties, all which dyd open, and gladly receyue him in. So, leauing all that countrie quiet and in good peace, and hauing re- ceaued their fealtie by othe made betwene his handes, he returned againe to ROME, not enriched the value of a Drachma more then before. For then he tooke little regard to his expences, he spent so frankly, neither was his purse his master, though his reue- nue was not great to beare it out: as it appeared to the world after his death, for all that he had, was little enough to satisfie his wives ioynter. His first wife was Pappia, the daughter of a noble Consul Pappyrus Masso, and after they had liued a long time together, he was diuorced from her, notwithstanding he had goodly children by her. For by her he had that famous Scipio the second, and Fabius Maximus. The iust cause of the diuorfe betwene them, appeareth not vs in writing: but me thinckes the tale that is tolde concerning the separation of a certaine marriage is true. That a certain ROMAINE hauing forsaken his wife, her friendes fell out with him, and asked him: what fault dost thou finde in her? is she not honest of her bodie? is she not fayer? doth she not bring thee goodly children? But he putting forth his foote, shewed them his shoe, and answered them. Is not this a goodly thoe? is it not finely made? and is it not newe? yet I dare saye there is neuer a one of you can tell where it wringeth me. For to saye truly, great and open faultes are commonly occasions to make husbands put awaye their wives: but yet oftentimes house- hold wordes runne so betwene them (proceeding of crooked conditions, or of diuersitie of natures, which strangers are not priuie vnto) that in processe of time they doe begete such a straunge alteration of loue and mindes in them, as one house can no longer holde them. So Æmylius, hauing put awaye Pappia his first wife, he married another that brought him two sonnes, which he brought vp with him selfe in his house, and gaue his two first sonnes (to wit, Scipio the second, and Fabius Maximus) in adoption, to two of the noblest and richest families of the citie of ROME. The elder of the twaine, vnto Fabius Maximus, he that was sixe times Consul: and the younger vnto the house of the Cornelians, whom the sonne of the great Scipio the AFRICAN dyd adopt, being his cosin germaine, and named him Scipio. Concerning his daughters, the sonne of Cato married the one, and Ælius Tubero the other, who was a maruelous honest man, and dyd more nobly mainteine him selfe in his pouertie, then any other ROMAINE: for they were sixtene persones all of one name, and of the house of the Ælians, very neere a kynne one to the other, who had all but one litle house in the citie, and a small farme in the countrie, wherewith they entertained them selues, and liued all together in one house, with their wiues, and many litle children. Amongst their wiues, one of them was the daughter of Paulus Æmylius, after he had bene twice Consul, and had triumphed twice, not being alhamed of her husbands pouertie, but wondering at his vertue that made him poore. Whereas brethren and kynsmen, as the world goeth now, if they dwell not farre a fonder, and in other countries, not one neere another, and that riuers parte them not, or f wallies deuide their landes, leauing great large waistes betwene them: they are neuer quiet, but still in quarrell one with another. Goodly examples doth this storie laye before the wife, and well aduised readers, to learne thereby howe to frame their life, and wisely to behaue them selues. Now Æmylius being chosen Consul, went to make warre with the LIGVRIANS, who dwelled in the ALPES, & which otherwise are called LIGVSTINES. These are very valliant & warlike men, & were very good souldiers at that time, by reason of their continual warres against the ROMAINEs, whose neere neighbours they were. For they dwelt in the best parte of ITALIE, that bordereth vpon the great ALPES, & the rowe of ALPES, whereof the foote ioyneth to the THYSCAN sea, & pointeth towards AFRIKE, and are mingled with the GAVLES, & SPANYARDS, neighbours vnto that sea coast: who scowling all the Mediterranean sea at that time, vnto the straight of Hercules pillars, dyd with their litle light pinnacles of pirates, let all the trafficke & entercoure of marchandise. Æmylius being gone to seeke them in their countrie, they taried his coming with an armie of forty thousand men: neuertheles, though he had but eight thousand men in all, and that they were fiew to one of his, yet he gaue the onset apon them, and ouerthrew them, and draue them into their cities. Then he sent to offer them peace, for the ROMAINEs would not altogether destroye the LIGVRIANS, because their countrie was as a rampeyr or bullwarke against the inuasion of the GAVLES, who laye lurking for opportunitie and occasion to inuade ITALIE: whereupon these LIGVRIANS deliuered them selues vnto him, and put all their fortes and shippes into his handes. Æmylius deliuered vnto them their holdes againe, without other hurte done vnto them, sauing that he raised the walles of their fortifications: howbeit he tooke all their shippes from them, leauing them litle botes of three owers only, and no greater, & set all the prisoners at libertie they had taken, both by sea and by lande, as well ROMAINEs as other, which were a maruelous number. These were all the notable acts he dyd worthe memorie, in the first yere of his Consulshippe. C Afterwards, he oftentimes shewed him self very desirous to be Consul againe, & dyd put forth him selfe to sue for it: but when he was denied it, he neuer after made lute for it againe, but gaue him selfe only to studie diuine things, and to see his children virtuously brought vp, not only in the ROMAINE tongue which him selfe was taught, but also a litle more curiously in the GREEKE tongue. For he dyd not only retaine Grammarians, Rethoricians, and Logicians, but also painters, grauers of images, riders of horses, and huntres of GREECE about his children: and he him selfe also (if no matters of common wealth troubled him) was euer with them in the schoole when they were at their bookes, and also when they otherwise dyd exercise them selues. For he loued his children as much, or more, then any other ROMAINE. Now concerning the state of the common wealth, the ROMAINEs were at warres with king Perseus, & they D much blamed the captaines they had sent thither before, for that for lacke of skill and corage, they had so cowardly behaued them selues, as their enemies laughed them to scorn: and they receyued more hurte of them, then they dyd vnto the King. For not long before, they had driuen king Antiochus beyond mount Taurus, and had made him forsake the rest of ASIA, and had shut him vp within the borders of SYRIA: who was glad that he had bought that countrie with fiftene thousand talents, which he payed for a fine. A litle before also, they had ouercome Philip, king of MACEDON, in THESSALY, and had deliuered the GRECIANS from the bondage of the MACEDONIANS. And moreover, hauing ouercome Hannibal (vnto whom no Prince nor King that euer was in the worlde was comparable, either for his power or valiantnes) they thought this to great a dishonour to them, that this warre they had against king Perseus, should hold so long of euen hande with them, as if he had bene an enemy equall with the people of ROME: considering also that they fought not against them, but with the refuse and scattered people of the ouerthrowen armie his father had lost before, and knew not that Philip had left his armie stronger, and more experte by reason of his ouerthrowe, then it was before. As I will briefly reherse the storie from the beginning. Antigonus, who was of the greatest power of all the captaines & successours of Alexander the great, hauing obtained for him self & his posteritie the title of a King, had a sonne called Demetrius, of who came Antigonus the second, that was surnamed Gonatas, whose sonne was also called Demetrius, that reigned no long time, but dyed, and left a young sonne called Philippe. By reason whereof, the Princes and Nobilitie of MACEDON, fearing that the Realme should be left without heire: they preferred one Antigonus, cosin to the last deceased King, and made him marie the mother of Philip the lesse, geuing him the name at the first of the Kings protectour only, and lieutenant

A lieutenant generall of his maiestie. But after, when they had founde he was a good and wise prince, and a good husband for the Realme, they then gaue him the absolute name of a King, and surnamed him Dofon, to saye, the giuer: for he promised much, and gaue litle. After him reigned Philip, who in his grene youth gaue more hope of him selfe, then any other of the Kings before: in so much they thought that one daye he would restore MACEDON her ancient fame and glorie, and that he alone would plucke downe the pride and power of the ROMAINEs, who rose against all the world. But after that he had lost a great battell, and was ouerthrowen by Titus Quintus Flaminius neere vnto the cittie of SCOTVA: then he beganne to quake for feare, and to leaue all to the mercie of the ROMAINEs, thinking he escaped good cheape, for any light ranfome or tribute the ROMAINEs should impose apon him. Yet afterwards coming to vnderstand him selfe, he grewe to disdaine it much, thinking that to reigne through the fauour of the ROMAINEs, was but to make him selfe a slaue, to seeke to liue in pleasure at his ease, & not for a valliant & noble prince borne. Whereupon he set all his minde, to studie the discipline of warres, and made his preparations as wisely and closely, as possible he could. For he left all his townes alongest the sea coast, & standing vpon any high wayes, without any fortification at all, & in manner desolate without people, to the end there might appeare no occasion of doubt or mistrust in him: & in the meane time, in the high countries of his Realme farre from great beaten wayes, he leauied a great number of men of warre, & replenished his townes & strong holdes that laye scattering abroad, with armour & weapon, money, & men, prouiding for warre, which he kept as secretly as he could. For he had prouision of armour in his armorie, to arme thirtie thousand men, & eight million busshels of corne safely lott vp in his fortes & stronger places, & ready money, as much as would serue to entertaine tenne thousand strangers in paye, to defend his countrie for the space of tenne yerres. But before he could bring that to passe he had purposed, he dyed for grief & sorowe, after he knewe he had vniustly put Demetrius the best of his sonnes to death, apon the false accusation of the worlde, that was Perseus: who as he dyd inherite the Kingdom of his father by succession, so dyd he also inherite his fathers malice against the ROMAINEs. But he had no shouldres to beare so heauy a burden, and especially being as he was, a man of so vile and wicked nature: for among many lewde & naughty conditions he had, he was extreme couetous & miserable. They saye also, that he was not legitimate, because *Philippe*s wife had taken him from Gnathania (a tailours wife borne at ARGOS) immediately after he was borne, & dyd adopt the child to be hers. And some think that this was the chiefest cause why he practised to put Demetrius to death, fearing least this lawful sonne would seeke occasiō to proue him a bastard. Notwithstanding, (simple though he was, & of vile & base nature, he found the strength of his Kingdom so great, that he was contented to take vpon him to make warre against the ROMAINEs, which he maintained a long time, and fought against their Consuls, that were their generalles, and repulged great armies of theirs both by sea and lande, and ouercame some. As Publius Licinius among other, the first that inuaded MACEDON, was ouerthrowen by him in a battell of horsemen, where he slewe at that time two thousand fise hundred good men of his, and tooke sixe hundred prisoners. And their armie by sea, riding at anchor before the cittie of OREVM, he dyd sodainly set apon, and tooke twenty great shippes of burden, and all that was in them, and loncke the rest, which were all laden with corne: & tooke of all fortes besides, about foure & fiftie foyltes, and galliots of fiftie owers a peece. The second Consul & generall he fought with all, was Hostilius, whom he repulged, attempting by force to inuade MACEDON, by waye of the cittie of ELVMIA. Another time again, whē he entred in by stealth vpon the coast of THESSALY, he offered him battell, but the other durst not abide it. Furthermore, as though the warre troubled him nothing at all, & that he had cared litle for the ROMAINEs: he wet and fought a battell in the meane time with the DARDANIANS, where he slue tēne thousand of those barbarous people, & brought a maruelous great spoyle awaye with him. Moreover he procured the nation of the GAVLES dwelling vpon the riuier of Danubie, which they call Basarnas (mē very warlike, & excellēt good horsemen) & did practise with the ILLYRIANS also by meane of their king Gtius, to make the ioynie with him in these warres: so that there ranne a rumour all about, that for money he had gotten these GAVLES to come downe into ITALIE, from the high contrie of GAVLE, all alongest the Adriatick sea. The ROMAINES being aduertised of these newes, A thought the time serued not now to dispose their offices in warres. any more by grace & fauour vnto those that sued for them: but contrariwise, that they should call some noble man that were very skillfull, and a wife captaine, and could discretely gouerne and performe things of great charge. As Paulus Æmylius, a man well stepped on in yerres, being three score yere olde: and yet of good power, by reason of the lusty young men his sonnes, & sones in law, besides a great number of his friends and kinsfolke. So all that bare great authoritie, dyd altogether with one consent counsaill him to obey the people, which called him to the Consulshippe. At the beginning, in deede he delayed the people muche that came to importune him, and vterly denied them: saying, he was no meete man neither to desire, nor yet to take vpon him any charge. Howbeit in the ende, seeing the people dyd vrge it upon him, by knocking continually at his gates, and calling him alowde in the streetes, willing him to come into the market place, and perceyuing they were angry with him, because he refused it: he was content to be perswaded. And when he stood among them that sued for the Consulshippe, the people thought straight that he stood not there so muche for desire of the office, as for that he put them in hope of assured victorie, and happie successe of this begonne warre: so great was their loue towards him, and the good hope they had of him, that they chose him Consul againe the second time. Wherefore so sone as he was chosen, they would not proceede to drawing of lottes according to their custome, which of the two Consuls should happen to goe into MACEDON: but presently with a full and whole consent of them all, they gaue him the whole charge of the warres of MACEDON. So being Consul now, and appointed to make warre upon king Perseus, all the people dyd honorably companie him home vnto his house: where a litle girle (a daughter of his) called Tertia, being yet an infant, came weeping vnto her father. He making muche of her: asked her why she wept. The poore girle answered, colling him about the necke, and kissing him: Alas, father, wote you what? our Perseus is dead. She ment it by a litle whelpse so called, which was her play fellowe. In good hower, my girle, sayd he, I like the signe well. Thus doth Cicero the orator reporte it in his booke of diuinations. The ROMAINES had a custome at that time, that sutch as were elected Consuls (after that they were openly proclaimed) should make an oration of thanckes vnto the people, for the honour and fauour they had shewed him. The people then (according to the custome) being gathered together to heare Æmylius speake, he made this oration vnto them. That the first time he sued to be Consul, was in respect of him selfe, standing at that time in neede of sutch honour: now he offered him selfe the second time vnto it, for the good loue he bare vnto them, who stood in nede of a generall, wherefore he thought him selfe nothing bounde nor beholding vnto them now. And if they dyd thincke allo this warre might be better followed by any other, then by him selfe, he would presently with all his harte resigne the place. Furthermore, if they had any trust or confidence in him, that they thought him a man sufficient to discharge it: then that they would not speake nor medle in any matter that concerned his duetie, and the office of a generall, sauing only, that they would be diligent (without any wordes) to doe whatsoeuer he commaunded, and should be necessarie for the warre and seruice they tooke in hande. For if euery man would be a commander, as they had bene heretofore, of those by whom they should be commaunded: then the world would more laughe them to scorne in this seruice, then euer before had bene accustomed. These wordes made the ROMAINES very obedient to him, and conceyued good hope to come, being all of the very glad that they had refused those ambitious flatterers that sued for the charge, & had geue it vnto a man, that durst boldly & frankly tell them the troth. Marke how the ROMAINES by yielding vnto reason & vertue, came to comend all other, & to make them selues the mightiest people of the world. Now that Paulus Æmylius setting forward to this warre, had winde at will, and fayer passage to bring him at his iourneys ende: I impute it to good fortune, that so quickly and safely conueyed him to his campe. But for the rest of his employes he dyd in all this warre, when parte of them were performed by his owne hardines, other by his wisdom and good counsell, other by the diligence of his friendes in seruing him with good will, other by his owne resolute constancy and corage in extremest Æmylius chosen Consul the second time, taketh charge of the warres of MACEDON.

Good lucke promised by Tertia, a litle girle.

Paulus Æmylius orator of thankes to the ROMAINES when he was Consul, observing the custome.

See what fruit fouler receiue by obedience & reason.

A extremest danger, and last, by his maruelous skill in determining at an instant what was to be done: I cannot attribute any notable acte or worthy seruice vnto this his good fortune, they talke of so much, as they maye doe in other captaines doings. Onles they will saye peraduenture, that Perseus couetousnes and miserie was Æmylius good fortune: for his miserable feare of spending money, was the only cause and destruction of the whole realme of MACEDON, which was in good state and hope of continuing in prosperitie. For there came downe into the countrie of MACEDON at king Perseus request, tenne thousand Bastarnæ a horse backe, and as many footemen to them, who alwayes ioyned with them in battell, all mercenary souldiers, depending vpon paye and enterainment of warres, as men that could not plowe nor sowe, nor trafficke marchandise by sea, nor skill of grating to gaine their liuing with: & to be shorte, that had no other occupation or marchandise, but to serue in the warres, and to overcome with whom they fought. Furthermore, when they came to incampe & lodge in the MEDICA, neere to the MACEDONIANS, who sawe them so goodly great men, and so well trained & exercised in handling all kinde of weapons, so braue and lustie in wordes and threats against their enemies: they beganne to plucke vp their hartes, & to looke bigge, imagining that the ROMAINES would neuer abide them, but would be afeard to looke them in the face, and only to see their marche, it was so terrible and fearefull. But Perseus, after he had encouraged his men in this forte, and had put them in such a hope and iollitie, when this barbarous supply came to aske him a thousand crownes in hande for euery captaine, he was so damped & troubled withall in his minde, casting vp the summe it came to, that his only couetousnes and miserie made him returne them backe, and refuse their seruice: not as one that ment to fight with the ROMAINES, but rather to spare his realme, and to be a husband for them, as if he should haue geuen vp a straight account vnto them of his charges in this warre, against whom he made it. And notwithstanding also his enemies dyd teache him what he had to doe, considering that besides all other their warlike furniture & munition, they had no lesse then a hundred thousand fighting meny in campe together, ready to execute the Consuls commaundement. Yet he taking vpon him to resist to pusillan an armie, and to mainteine the warres, which forced his enemies to be at extreme charge in enterreining such multitudes of men, and more then needed: hardly would depart with his gold and siluer, but kept it safe locked vp in his treasure, as if he had bene affrayed to touche it, and had bene none of his. And he dyd not shewe that he came of the noble race of these kings of LYDIA, and of PHOENICIA, who gloried to be riche: but shewed howe by inheraunce of bloude he challenged some parte of the vertue of Philip, and of Alexander, who both because they esteemed to buye victorie with money, not money with victorie, dyd many notable things, and thereby conquered the world. Hereof came the common saying in olde time, that it was not Philip, but his gold and siluer that wanne the citties of GRECE. And Alexander when he went to conquer the INDES, seeing the MACEDONIANS carie with them all the wealth of PERSEA, which made his campe very heauie, and slowe to marche: he him selfe first of all set fire of his owne cariage that conueyed all his necessaries, and perswaded other to doe the like, that they might marche more lightly, and easelier goe on the iorney. But Perseus contrariwise would not spend any parte of his goodes, to saue him selfe, his children and Realme, but rather yielded to be led prisoner in triumphe with a great ranfome, to shewe the ROMAINES howe good a husband he had bene for them. For he dyd not only fend away the GAVLES without geuing them paye as he had promised, but moreover hauing perswaded Gentius king of ILLYRIA to take his parte in these warres, for the summe of three hundred talents which he had promised to furnish him with: he caused the money to be told, and put vp in bagges by those whom Gentius sent to receiue it. Whereupon Gentius thinking him selfe sure of the money promised, committed a fond and fowle parte: for he stayed the ambassadours the ROMAINES sent vnto him, and committed them to prison. This parte being come to Perseus eares, he thought now he needed not hier him with money to be an enemy to the ROMAINES, considering he had waded so farre, as that he had already done, was as a manifest signe of his ill will towards them, and that it was to late to looke backe and repent him; now that his fowle parte had plunged him into certain warres, for an vnccerten hope. So dyd he abuse the vnfortunate King, and defrauded him of the three hundred talents he had promised him. And worse then this, shortly after he suffered Lucius Anticus the ROMANE Prætor, whom they sent against him with an army, to plucke king Gentius, his wife, and children, out of his Realme and Kingdome, and to carie them prisoners with him. Now when Æmylius was arrived in MACEDON, to make warre against such an enemy: he made no manner of reckoning of his person, but of the great preparation and power he had. For in one campe he had foure thousand horlemen, and no lesse then forty thousand footemen, with the which armie he had planted him selfe alongest the sea side, by the foote of the mount Olympus, in a place vnpossible to be approached: and there he had so well fortified all the straites and passages vnto him with fortifications of woode, that he thought him selfe to lye safe out of all daunger, and imagined to dale with Æmylius, and by tract of time to eate him out with charge. Æmylius in the meane season laye not idle, but occupied his wittes throughly, and left no meanes vnattempted, to put some thing in proofe. And perceyuing that his souldiers by ouermuche licentious libertie (wherein by sufferance they liued before) were angrie with delaying and lying still, and that they dyd busilie occupie them selues in the generall office, saying this, and suche a thing would be done that is not done: he tooke them vp roundly, and commaunded them they should medle no more to curiously in matters that pertained not to them, and that they should take care for nothing els, but to see their armour & weapon ready to serue valiantly, & to vse their swordes after the ROMAINES facion, when their generall should appoint and commaund them. Wherefore, to make them more carefull to looke to them selues, he commaunded those that watched should haue no speares nor pykes, bicause they should be more wakefull, hauing no long weapon to resist the enemy, if they were assaulted. The greatest trouble his army had, was lacke of freshe water, bicause the water that ranne to the sea was very lide, and maruelous fowle by the sea side. But Æmylius considering they were at the foote of the mount Olympus (which is of a maruelous height, and full of woode withall) coniectured, seeing the trees so freshe and grene, that there should be some litle pretie springes among them, which ranne vnder the grounde. So he made them digge many holes and welles alongest the mountaine, which were straight filled with fayer water, being pent within ground before for lacke of breaking open the heades, which then ranne downe in streames, and met together in sundrie places. And yet some doe denie, that there is any meeting of waters within the grounde, from whence the springes doe come. For they saye, that running out of the earth as they doe, it is not for that, that the water breaketh out by any violence, or openeth in any place, as meeting together in one place of long time: but that it ingendred and riseth at the same time and place where it runneth out, turning the substance into water, which is a moist vapour, thicketh and waxeth cold by the coldnes of the earth, and so becommeth a streame, and runneth downe. Euen so, saye they, as womens brestes are not alwayes full of milke, as milke pannes are that continually keepe milke, but doe of them selues conuert the nutriment women take into milke, and after commeth forth at their nipples: the very like are springes and watery places of the earth, from whence the fountaines come, which haue no meeting of hidden waters, nor hollowe places capable, readily to deliuer water from them, as one would drawe it out of a pompe, or sesterne, from so many great brookes, and deepe riuers. But by their naturall coldnes and moisture, they waxe thicke, and put forth the vapour & ayer so strong, that they turne it into water. And this is the reason why the places where they digge and open the earth, doe put forth more abundance of water by opening the grounde: like as womens brestes doe geue more milke, when they are most drawn and sucked, bicause in a sorte they doe better feede the vapour within them, and conuert it thereby into a running humour. Where, to the contrarye, those partes of the earth that are not digged, nor haue no vent outward, are the more vnable, and lesse mete to ingender water, hauing not that prouocation and course to runne, that causeth the bringing forth of moisture. Yet such as mainteine this opinion, doe geue them occasion that loue argument, to contrarye them thus. Then we may saye by like reason also, that in the bodies of beastes there is no blood long before, and that it ingendred vpon a sodaine, when they are hurte, by transferring of some spirite or fleshe that readilie chaungeth into some running licoure. And moreover, they are confuted by the comon experience of these mine men, that digge in the mines for mettell or that vndermine castles to winne them: who when they digge any great depth, doe many times meete in the bowells of the earth with running riuers, the water whereof is not ingendred by litle and litle, as of necessity it should be, if it were true, that vpon the present opening of the ground, the humour should immediately be created, but it falleth vehemently all at one time. And we see oftentimes that in cutting through a mountaine or rocke, sodainly there runneth out a great quantitie of water. And thus much for this matter. Now to returne to our historie againe. Æmylius laye there a convenient time, & stirred not: and it is sayed there were neuer seene two so great armies one so neere to the other, and to be so quiet. In the ende, casting many things with him selfe, and deuising sundrie practises, he was enformed of another waye to enter into MACEDON, through the cuntry of PERRÆBIA, ouer against the temple called Pythion, & the rocke vpon which it is built, where there laye no garrison: which gaue him better hope to passe that waye, for that it was not kept, then that he feared the narrownes & hardnes of the waye vnto it. So, he brake the matter to his counsaill. Thereupon Scipio called Nasica (the sonne adopted of that great Scipio the African, who became afterwards a great mā, & was president of the Senate or counsell) was the first man that offered him selfe to leade them, whom it would please him to send to take that passage, & to assault their enemies behind. The second was Fabius Maximus, the eldest sonne of Æmylius, who being but a very young man, rose notwithstanding, & offered him selfe very willingly. Æmylius was very glad of their offers, & gaue them not so many men as Polybius writeth, but so many as Nasica him selfe declareth, in a letter of his he wrote to a King, where he reporteth all the storie of this iorney. There were 3000 ITALIANS leauied in ITALIE, by the confederates of the ROMAINES, who were not of the ROMAINES legions, & in the left winge about 5000. Besides those, Nasica tooke also 120 men at armes, & about 200 CRETANS & THRACIANS mingled together, of those Harpalus had sent thither. With this number Nasica departed from the campe, & tooke his waye toward the sea side, & lodged by the temple of Hercules, as if he had determined to doe this feate by sea, to ensuronne the cape of the enemies behind. But when the souldiers had supped, & that it was dark night, he made the captaines of euery bande priuie to his enterprize, & so marched all night a contrary waye from the sea, vntill at the length they came vnder the temple of Pythion, where he lodged to rest the souldiers that were fore trauelled all night. In this place, the mount Olympus is about tenne furlonges highe, as appeareth in a place ingrauen by him that measured it.

Olympus mounte is iust, by measure made with line, & vntwelve hundred seuentie paces trodde, as measure can assigne. The measure being made, right ore against the place, whereas Apolloes temple stands, built with stately grace. Euen from the leauell plot, of that same countrie plaine. vnto the toppe which all on high, doth on the hill remaine. And so Xenagoras the sonne of Emulius, in olden dayes by measure made, the same dyd finde for vs. And dyd engraua it here in writing for vs see, when as he tooke his laste leaue (Apollo god) of thee.

Yet the Geometricians saye, that there is no mountaine higher, nor sea deeper, then the length of tenne furlonges: so that I thinke this Xenagoras (in my opinion) dyd not take his measure at auenture, and by gesse, but by true rules of the arte, and instruments Geometricall. There Nasica rested all night. King Perseus perceyuing in the meane time that Æmylius stirred not from the place where he laye, mistrusted nothing his practise, and the coming of Nasica who was at hande: vntill such time as a traitour of CRETA (stealing from Nasica) dyd reueale vnto him the pretended practise, as also the ROMAINES compassing of him about. He was dispatched much at these newes; howbeit he removed not his campe from the place he laye in, but dispatched one of his captaines called Nitron, with tenne thousand straungers, and two thousand MACEDONIANS; and straightly commaunded him with all the possible speede he could, to get the toppe of the hill before them: Polybius sayeth, that the ROMAINES came and gaue them an alarme, when they were sleeping. But Nasica writeth, that there was a maruelous sharpe and terrible battell on the toppe of the mountaine: and sayed plainly, that a THRACIAN souldier comming towards him, he threwe his darre at him, and hitting him right in the brest, slue him starke dead: and hauing repulsed their enemies, Milon their capitaine shamefully running awaye in his coate without armour or weapon, he followed him without any danger, and so went downe to the valley, with the safety of all his companie. This conflict fortuning thus, Perseus raised his campe in great haste from the place where he was, and being disappointed of his hope, he retired in great feare, as one at his wittes ende, and not knowing howe to determine. Yet was he constrained either to staye, and incampe before the cittie of PYDNE, there to take the hazard of battell: or els to deuide his armie into his citties & strong holds, and to receyue the warres within his owne cuntry, the which being once crept in, could neuer be driuen out againe, without great murder & bloudfshed. Hereupon his friends dyd counsell him, to choofe rather the fortune of battell: alledging vnto him, that he was the stronger in men a great waye, & that the MACEDONIANS would fight lustely with all the courage they could, considering that they fought for the safety of their wiues and children, & also in the presence of their King, who should both feare euery mans doing, and fight him selfe in person also for them. The King moued by these persuasions, determined to venter the chaice of battell. So he pitched his campe, and viewed the situation of the places all about, and deuided the companies amongst his captaines, purposing to geue a whorte charge vpon the enemies when they should drawe nere. The place and cuntry was luche, as being all champion, there was a goodly valley to rounge a battell of footemen in, and litle pretty hilles also one depending vpon another, which were very comodious for archers, naked men, and such as were lightly armed, to retire them selues vnto being distressed, & also to enuirone their enemies behind. There were two small riuers also, Æson and Lencus that rane through the same, the which though they were not very deepe, being about the later ende of the sommer, yet they would annoy the ROMAINES notwithstanding. Now when Æmylius was ioyned with Nasica, he marched on straight in battell raye towards his enemies. But perceyuing a farte of their battell marched in very good order, and the great multitude of men placed in the same: he wondered to behold it, and sodainly stayed his armie, considering with him selfe what he had to doe. Then the young captaine hauing charge vnder him, desirous to fight it out presently, went vnto him to praye him to geue the onfet: but Nasica specially about the rest, hauing good hope in the former good lucke he had at his first encounter. Æmylius smiling, answered him: so would I doe, if I were as young as thou. But the sundry victories I haue wonne heretofore, hauing taught me by experience the fautes the vanquished doe commit: doe forbid me to goe so whortely to worke (before my souldiers haue reited, which dyd returne but now) to assault an armie set in suche order of battell. VVhen he had answered him thus, he commaunded the first bands that were now in viewe of the enemies, should imbattell them selues, shewing a countenance to the enemy as though they would fight: and that those in the rereward should lodge in the meane time, and forsake the campe. So, bringing the foremost men to be hindmost, by chaunging front man to man before the enemies were ware of it: he had broken his battell by litle and litle, and lodged his men, fortified within the campe without any tumult or noyse, and the enemies neuer perceyuing it: But when night came, and euery man had supped, as they were going to sleepe and take their rest: the moone which was at the full, and of a great height, begonne to darken, & to chaunge into many forties of cullers, losing her light, vntill suche time as the vanished awaye, and was eclipsed altogether. Then the ROMAINES begonne to make a noyse with bassons and pannes, as their facion is to doe in suche a chaunce, thinking by this sound to call her againe, and to make her come to her light, lifting up many torches lighted, and firebrands into the ayers. The MACEDONIANS on the other side dyd no suche matter within their campe, but were all together stricken with an horrible feare, and there rane straight a whispering rumour through the people, that this signe in the element signified the eclipse of the King. For Æmylius was not ignoraunt of the diuicities of the eclipses, and he had heard saye the cause is, by reason that the moone making her ordinarie course about the world (after certain reuolutions of time) doth come to enter into the round shadowe of the earth, within the which she remaineth hidden: vntill suche time as hauing

A past the darke region of the shadow, she cometh afterwards to recouer her light which she taketh of the sunne. Neuertheles, he being a godly deuout man, so sone as he perceyued the moone had recouered her former brightnes againe, he sacrificed eleuen calues. And the next morning also by the breake of day, making sacrifice to Hercules, he could neuer haue any signes or tokens that promised him good lucke, in sacrificing twenty oxen one after another: but at the one & twentieth, he had signes that promised him victorie, so he defended him self. VVherfore, after he had vowed a solemne sacrifice of a hundred oxen to Hercules, and also games of prices at the weapons, he commaunded his captaines to put their men in readines to fight: & so fought to winne time, tarying till the sunne came about in the after noone towards the West, to the ende that the ROMAINES which were turned towards the East, should not haue it in their faces when they were fighting. In the meane time, he reposed him selfe in his tent, which was all open behind towards the side that looked into the valley, where the campe of his enemies laye. When it grewe towards night, to make the enemies fet upon his men: some saye he vied this policie. He made a horse be driuen towards them without a bridell, & certain ROMAINES followed him, as they would haue taken him againe: and this was the cause of procuring the skirmish. Other saye, that the THRACIANS seruing vnder the charge of captaine Alexander, dyd set upon certain forragers of the ROMAINES, that brought forage into the campe: out of the which, seven hundred of the LIGURIANS ranne sodainly to the rescue, and relief comming still from both armies, at the last the mayne battell followed after. Wherefore Æmylius like a wise generall foreseeing by the daunger of this skirmish, and the stirring of both camps, what the furie of the battell would come to: came out of his tent, and passing by the bandes, dyd encourage them, and prayed them to stick to it like men. In the meane time, Nasica thrusting him selfe into the place where the skirmish was whotest, perceyued the army of the enemies marching in battell, ready to ioyne. The first that marched in the vaward, were the THRACIANS, who seemed terrible to looke upon, as he writeth him self: for they were mightie made men, and caried maruelous bright targets of Steele before them, their legges were armed with greaues, and their thighes with safes, their coates were blacke, & marched shaking heauy halberds vpon their shouldrs. Next vnto these THRACIANS, there followed them all the other strangers and souldiers whom the King had hired, diuersely armed and set forth: for they were people of sundrie nations gathered together, among whom the PÆONIANS were mingled. The third squadron was of MACEDONIANS, and all of them chofen men, as well for the flower of their youthe, as for the valliantnes of their perfonnes: and they were all in goodly gilt armours, and braue purple cassocks upon them, spicke, and spanne newe. And at their backes came after them, the olde bandes to shewe them selues out of the campe, with targets of copper, that made all the plaine to shine with the brightnes of their Steele and copper. And all the hilles and mountaines thereabouts dyd ringe againe like an Eccho, with the crie and noyse of so many fighting men, one encouraging another. In this order they marched so fiercelly, with so great hart burning, & such swiftnes: that the first which were slaine at the encounter, fell dead two furlonges from the campe of the ROMAINES. The charge being geuen, and the battell begonne, Æmylius galloping to the vaward of his battell, perceyued that the captaines of the MACEDONIANS which were in the first rankes, had already thrust their pikes into the ROMAINES targets, so as they could not come neere them with their swordes: and that the other MACEDONIANS carying their targets behinde them, had now plucked them before them, and dyd base their pikes all at one time, and made a violent thrust into the targets of the ROMAINES. Which when he had considered, and of what strength and force his walle and rancke of targets was, one ioyning so neere another, and what a terrour it was to see a fronte of a battell with so many armed pikes and Steele heades: he was more afeard and amazed withall, then with any sight he euer sawe before. Neuertheles he could wisely dissemble it at that time, and so passing by the companies of his horsemen, without either curaces or helmet vpon his head, he shewed a noble cherefull countenance vnto them that fought. But on the contrarie side, Perseus the king of MACEDON, as Polibius writeth, so sone as the battell was begonne, withdrewe him self, and got into the cittie of PYDNE, vnder pretence to goe to doe sacrifice vnto Hercules: who doth not accept the fainte sacrifice of cowards, neither doth receyue their prayers, because they be unreasonable. A For it is no reason, that he that shooteth not, should hyt the white: nor that he should winne the victorie, that bideth not the battell: neither that he should haue any good, that doeth nothing toward it: nor that a naughty man should be fortunate, and prosper. The goddes dyd fauour Æmylius prayers, because he prayed for victorie with his sworde in his hande, and fighting dyd call to them for ayde. Howbeit there is one Posidonius a writer, who sayeth he was in that time, and moreover, that he was at the battell: and he hath written an historie containing many bookes of the actes of king Perseus, where he sayeth that it was not for fainte harte, nor vnder culler to sacrifice vnto Hercules, that Perseus went from the battell: but because he had a stripe of a horse on the thighe the day before. Who though he could not very well helpe him self, and that all his friends fought to perswade him not to goe to the battell: yet he caused one of his horse to be brought to him notwithstanding (which he commonly vsed to ryde vp and downe on) and taking his backe, rode into the battell vnarmed, where an infinite number of dartes were thrown at him from both sides. And among those, he had a blowe with a darte that hurte him somewhat, but it was ouerthwart, and not with the pointe, and dyd hit him on the left side glawning wise, with such a force, that it rent his coate, and rased his skynne vnderneath, so as it left a marke behinde a long time after. And this is all that Posidonius writeth to defend and excuse Perseus. The ROMAINES hauing their hands full, and being stayed by the battell of the MACEDONIANS that they could make no breache into them: there was a capitaine of the PELIGNIANS called Salinus, who tooke the ensigne of his band, and cast it among the preafe of his enemies. Then all the PELIGNIANS brake in upon them, with C a maruelous force & furie into that place: for all ITALIANS thinke it to great a shame & dishonour for souldiers, to lose, or forsake their ensigne. Thus was there maruelous force of both sides vsed in that place: for the PELIGNIANS proued to cut the MACEDONIANS pikes with their swordes, or els to make them geue backe with their great targets, or to make a breache into them, and to take the pikes with their hands. But the MACEDONIANS to the contrarie, holding their pikes fast with both hands, ranne them thorow that came neere vnto them: so that neither target nor corselet could hold out the force and violence of the pulste of their pikes, in so muche as they turned vp the heeles of the PELIGNIANS and TERRACINIANS, who like desperate beastes without reason, shutting in them selues among their enemies, ranne wilfully vpon their owne deatthes, and their first rancke were slaine euery man of them. D Thereupon those that were behind, gaue backe a litle, but fled not turning their backes, and only retired geuing backe, towardes the mountaine Olocrus. Æmylius seeing that (as Posidonius writeth) rent his arming coate from his backe for anger, because that some of his men gaue backe: other durst not fronte the battell of the MACEDONIANS, which was so strongly im- battelled of euery side, and so mured in with a wall of pikes, presenting their armed heades on euerie side a man could come, that it was impossible to breake into them, no not so muche as to come neere them only. Yet notwithstanding, because the field was not altogether plaine and euen, the battell that was large in the fronte, could not allwayes keepe that walle, continuing their targets close one to another, but they were driuen of necessite to breake and open in many places, as it happeneth oft in great battells, according to the great E force of the souldiers: that in one place they thrust forward, and in another they geue backe, and leaue a hole. Wherefore Æmylius sodainly taken the vantage of this occasion, deuised his men into small companies, and commaunded them they should quickly thrust in betwene their enemies, and occupie the places they sawe voyde in the fronte of their enemies, and that they should set on them in that sorte, and not with one whole continuall charge, but occupying them here and there with diuers companies, in sundry places. Æmylius gaue this charge vnto the priuate captaines of euery band and their lieutenants, and the captaines also gaue the like charge vnto their souldiers that could skillfully execute their commaundement. For they went presently into those partes where they sawe the places open, and being once entered in among them, some gaue charge vpon the flankes of the MACEDONIANS, where F they were all naked and vnarmed: other set vpon them behind: so that the strength of all the corpes of the battell (which consisteth in keeping close together) being opened in this sorte,

WAS

A was straight ouerthrowen. Furthermore, when they came to fight man for man, or a few against a few: the MACEDONIANS with their litle shorte swordes, came to strike vpon the great sheldes of the ROMAINES, which were very strong, and couered all their bodies downe to the foote. And they to the contrarie, were driuen of necessite to receaue the blowes of the strong heauy swordes of the ROMAINES, vpon their litle weake targettes: so that what with their heauines, and the vehemement force wherewith the blowes lighted vpon them, there was no target nor corselet, but they passed it through, and ranne them in. By reason whereof they could make no long resistance, whereupon they turned their backes, and ranne awaye. But when they came to the Squadron of the olde beate souldiers of the MACEDONIANS, there was the cruelllest fight and most desperate seruice, where they saye that Marcus Cato (sonne of B great Cato, and sonne in lawe of Æmylius) shewing all the vallianties in his persone that a noble minde could possibly performe, lost his sword which fell out of his hande. But he like a young man of noble corage, that had bene valliantly brought vp in all discipline, & knew how to follow the steppes of his father (the noblest persone that euer man sawe) was to shewe then his value and worthines: and thought it more honour for him there to dye, then liuing to suffer his enemies to enioye any spoyle of his. So, by & dy he ranne into the ROMAINES army, to finde out some of his friendes, whom he tolde what had befallen him, and prayed them to helpe him to recouer his sworde: whereto they agreed. And being a good company of lusty valliant souldiers together, they rushed straight in among their enemies, at the place where he brought them, and so dyd set apon them with such force and furie, that they made a lane C through the middelt of them, and with great slaughter and spilling of bloude, euen by plaine force, they cleared the waye still before them. Now when the place was voyded, they sought for the sworde, and in the ende founde it with great a doe, amongst a heape of other swordes and dead bodies, whereto they reioyced maruelously. Then singeing a songe of victorie, they went againe more fiercely then before to geue a charge vpon their enemies, who were not yet broken a sonder: vntill such time as at the length, the three thousand chosen MACEDONIANS fighting valliantly euen to the last man, and neuer forsaking their rankes, were all slaine in the place. After whose ouerthrowe, there was a great slaughter of other also that fled: so that all the valley and foote of the mountaines thereabouts was couered with dead bodies. The next daye after the battell, when the ROMAINES dyd passe ouer the riuer of Leucus, they D founde it running all a bloude. For it is sayed there were slaine at this field, of Perseus men, aboute five and twentie thousand: and of the ROMAINES side, as Posidonius sayeth, not aboute sixe score, or as Nasica writeth, but foure score only. And for so great an ouerthrowe, it is reported it was wonderfull quickly done, and executed. For they beganne to fight about three of the clocke in the after noone, and had wonne the victorie before foure, and all the rest of the daye they followed their enemies in chase, an hundred & twenty furlonges from the place where the battell was fought: so that it was very late, and farre forth night, before they returned againe into the campe. So such as returned, were receyued with maruelous great ioye of their pages that went out with linckes and torches lighted, to bring their masters into their tentes, where their men had made great bonfires, and decked them vp with crownes and E garlands of laurell, sauing the generalltes tent only: who was very heauy, for that of his two sonnes he brought with him to the warres, the younger could not be founde, which he loued best of the twaine, because he sawe he was of a better nature then the rest of his brethren. For euen then, being newe crept out of the shell as it were, he was maruelous valliant and hardie, and desired honour wonderfully. Now Æmylius thought he had bene cast awaye, fearing least forlacke of experience in the warres, and through the rashnes of his youthe, he had put him selfe to farre in fight amongst the preafe of the enemies. Hereupon the campe heard straight what forowe Æmylius was in, and how grievously he tooke it. The ROMAINES being set at supper, rose from their meate, and with torches light (some ranne to Æmylius tent, other went out of the campe to seeke him among the dead bodies, if they might knowe him: so all the F campe was full of forowe and mourning, the vallies & hillies all about dyd ringe againe with the cries of those that called Scipio aloude. For euen from his childhood he had a naturall gift in him, of all the rare and singular partes required in a capitaine & wise gouernour of the common weale about all the young men of his time. At the last, when they were out of all hope of his coming againe, he happily returned from the chase of the enemies, with two or three of his familiars only, all bloudied with new bloude (like a swift running greyhounde fished with the bloude of the hare) hauing pursued very farre for ioye of the victorie. It is that Scipio which afterwards destroyed both the cities of CARTHAGE and NUMANTIVM, who was the greatest man of warre, and valliantest capitaine of the ROMAINES in his time, and of the greatest authoritie and reputation among them. Thus fortune deferring till another time the execution of her spite, which she dyd beare to so noble an exploitte, suffered Æmylius for that time to take his full pleasure of that noble victorie. And as for Perseus, he fled first from the citie of PYDNE, vnto the citie of PELLA, with his horsemen, which were in manner all faued. Whereupon the footemen that faued them selues by flying, meeting them by the waye, called them traitours, cowards, and villaines: & worse then that, they turned them of their horse backs, and fought it out lustely with them. Perseus seeing that, and fearing lest this mutinie might turne to light on his necke, he turned his horse out of the highe waye, and pulled of his purple coate, and caried it before him, and tooke his diademe, fearing lest they should knowe him by these tokens: and bicause he might more easely speake with his friends by the waye, he lighted a foote, and led his horse in his hande. But fuche as were about him, one made as though he would inende the latchet of his shooe, another seemed to water his horse, another as though he would drinke: so that one dragging after another in this sorte, they all left him at the last, and ranne their waye, not fearing the enemies furie so muche, as their Kings crueltie: who being greued with his misfortune, sought to laye the faulte of the ouerthrowe vpon all other, but him selfe. Now he being come into the citie of PELLA by night, Eucritus and Eudemus, two of his treasurers came vnto him, and speaking boldly (but out of time) presumed to tell him the great faulte he had committed, and dyd counsell him also what he should doe. The King was so moued with their presumption, that with his owne handes he stabbed his dagger in them both, and flue them outright. But after this facte, all his seruantes and friendes refused him, and there only taried with him but Euaner CARTANUS, Archadamus ETOLIAN, and Neo BOEOTIAN. And as for the meane fouldiers, there were none that followed him but the CRETANS, & yet it was not for the good will they dyd beare him, but for the loue of his golde and siluer, as bees that keepe their hives for loue of the hony. For he caried with him a great treasure, and gaue them leaue to spoyle certain plate and vessell of golde and siluer, to the value of fiftie talents. But first of all, when he was come into the citie of AMPHIPOLIS, and afterwards into the citie of ALEPSE, and that the feare was well blowne ouer: he returned againe to his olde humour, which was borne and bred with him, and that was, avarice and miserie. For he made his complainte vnto those that were about him, that he had vnwares geuen to the fouldiers of CRETA, his plate and vessell of gold to be spoyled, being those which in olde time belonged vnto Alexander the great: & prayed them with reares in his eyes that had the plate, they would be contented to chaunge it for ready money. Now fuche as knewe his nature, founde streight this was but a fraude and a CRETAN lye, to deceaue the CRETANS with: but those that trusted him, and dyd restore againe the plate they had, dyd loose it euery iotte, for he neuer payed them pennie of it. So he got of his friendes, the value of thirtie talents which his enemies sone after dyd take from him. And with that summe he went into the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where he tooke the sanctuary and priuiledge, of the temple of Castor and Pollux. They saye, that the MACEDONIANS of long continuance dyd naturally loue their Kings: but then seeing all their hope and expectation broken, their hartes failed them, and broke withall. For they all came and submitted them selues vnto Æmylius, and made him lorde of the whole Realme of MACEDON in two dayes: and this doth seeme to confirme their wordes, who impute all Æmylius doings vnto his good fortune. And surely the maruelous fortune he happened on in the citie of AMPHIPOLIS, doth confirme it muche, which a man cannot ascribe otherwise, but to the speciall grace of the godds. For one daye beginning to doe sacrifice, lightning fell from heauen, and set all the wodde a fire upon the altier, & sanctified the sacrifice. But yet the miracle of his fame is more to be wondred at. For foure dayes after Perseus had lost the battell, & that

A the citie of PELLA was taken, as the people of ROME were at the listes or shoue place, seeing horses runne for games: sodainly there rose a rumour at the entring into the listes where the games were, how Æmylius had wonne a great battell of king Perseus, and had conquered all MACEDON. This newes was rise straight in euery mans mouth, and there followed vpon it a maruelous ioye and great cheere in euery corner, with shoutes and clapping of handes, that continued all the daye through the citie of ROME. Afterwards they made diligent enquierie, how this rumour first came vp, but no certaine author could be knowne, and euery man sayed they heard it spoken: so as in the ende it came to nothing, and passed awaye in that sorte for a time. But shortly after, there came letters, and certain newes that made them wonder more then before, from whence the messenger came that reported the first newes of it: which could be deuised by no naturall meanes, and yet proued true afterwards. We doe reade also of a battell that was fought in ITALIE, nere vnto the riuer of SAGRA, wherof newes was brought the very same daye vnto PELOPONNESVS. And of another all in like manner that was fought in ASIA against the MEDES, before the citie of MYCALA: the newes wherof came the same daye vnto the campe of the GRECIANS, lying before the citie of PLATOBS. And in that great iorney where the ROMAINES ouerthrowe the Tarquines, and the armie of the LATINES: immediately after the battell was wonne, they sawe two goodly young men come newly from the campe, who brought newes of the victorie to ROME, and they iudged they were Castor and Pollux. The first man that spake to them in the market place before the fontaine, where they watered their horse being all of a white fume, tolde them: that he wondred howe they could so quickly bring these newes. And they laughing came to him, and tooke him softly by the beard with both their handes, and euen in the market place his heare being blacke before, was presently turned yellowe. This miracle made them beleue the reporte the man made, who euer after was called Æmylius, as you would saye, bearded as yellowe as golde. Another like matter that happened in our time, maketh all fuche newes credible. For when Antonius rebelled against the emperor Domitian, the citie of ROME was in a maruelous perplexitie, bicause they looked for great warres towards GERMANIE. But in this feare, there grewe a sodaine rumour of his victorie, and it went curantly through ROME, that Antonius him selfe was slaine, and all his armie ouerthrowen, & not a man left a liue. This rumour was so rise, that many of the chieft men of ROME beleued it, and dyd sacrifice thereupon vnto the goddes, deuoting them thanks for the victorie. But when the matter came to sifting, who was the first author of the rumour: no man could tell. For one put it ouer still to another, and dyed so in the ende amongst the people, as in a bottomes matter, for they could neuer bould out any certain grounde of it: but euen as it came flying into ROME, so went it flying awaye againe, no man can tell howe. Notwithstanding, Domitian holding on his iorney to make this warre, met with postes that brought him letters for the certain victorie: and remembering the rumour of the victorie that ranne before in ROME, he founde it true, that it was on the very same daye the victorie was gotten, and the distance betweene ROME & the place where the field was wonne, was about twenty thousand furlonges of. Euery man in our time knoweth this to be true. But againe to our historie. Cn. Ossauius, lieutenant of the armie of Æmylius by sea, came to ancker vnder the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where he would not take Perseus by force out of the sanctuary where he was, for the reuerence he dyd beare vnto the goddes Castor and Pollux: but he dyd besiege him in suche sorte, as he could not scape him, nor flye by sea out of the llande. Yet he had secretly practised with one Oroandes a CRETAN, that had a brigantine, and was at a prise with him for a summe of money to conuey him awaye by night: but the CRETAN serued him a right CRETANS tricke. For when he had taken a borde by night into his vessell, all the Kings treasure of golde and siluer, he sent him worde that he should not faile the next night following to come vnto the peere by the temple of Ceres, with his wife, his children and seruantes, where in deede was no possibilitie to take shipping: but the next night following he hoied faile, and got him awaye. It was a pittiefull thing that Perseus was driven to doe and suffer at that time. For he came downe in the night by ropes, out of a lide straight windowe vpon the walles, and not only him self, but his wife and little babes, who neuer knewe before what flying and hardnes ment. And yet he fetched a more grieuous common weale about the young men of his time. At the last, when they were out of all hope of his coming againe, he happily returned from the chase of the enemies, with two or three of his familiars only, all bloudied with new bloude (like a swift running greyhounde flethed with the bloude of the hare) hauing pursued very farre for ioye of the victorie. It is that Scipio which afterwards destroyed both the citties of CARTHAGE and NUMANTIVM, who was the greatest man of warre, and valliantest capitaine of the ROMAINES in his time, and of the greatest authoritie and reputation amongst them. Thus fortune deferring till another time the execution of her spite, which she dyd beare to so noble an employe, suffered Æmylius for that time, to take his full pleasure of that noble victorie. And as for Perseus, he fled first from the cittie of PYDNE, vnto the cittie of PELLA, with his horsemen, which were in manner all faued. Whereupon the footemen that faued them felues by flying, meeting them by the way, called them traitours, cowards, and villanes: & worse then that they turned them of their horie backs, and fought it out lustely with them. Perseus seeing that, and fearing lest this mutinie might turne to light on his necke, he turned his horie out of the highe way, and pulled of his purple coate, and caried it before him, and tooke his diademe, fearing lest they should knowe him by these tokens: and because he might more easely speake with his friends by the way, he lighted a foote, and led his horie in his hande. But suche as were about him, one made as though he would mende the latchet of his shooe, another seemed to water his horie, another as though he would drinke: so that one dragging after another in this sorte, they all left him at the last, and ranne their way, not fearing the enemies furie so muche, as their Kings crueltie: who being greued with his misfortune, fought to laye the faulte of the ouerthrowe vpon all other, but him selfe. Now he being come into the cittie of PELLA by night, Eucius and Eudæus, two of his treasurers came vnto him, and speaking boldly (but out of time) presumed to tell him the great faulte he had committed, and dyd counsell him also what he should doe. The King was so moued with their presumption, that with his owne handes he stabbed his dagger in them both, and slue them outright. But after this facte, all his seruantes and friends refused him, and there only taried with him but Euaner CRETAN, Archædamus ÆTOLIAN, and Neo BOEOTIAN. And as for the meane fouldiers, there were none that followed him but the CRETANS, & yet it was not for the good will they dyd beare him, but for the loue of his golde and siluer, as bees that keepe their huiues for loue of the honey. For he caried with him a great treasure, and gaue them leaue to spoyle certen plate and vessell of golde and siluer, to the value of fiftie talents. But first of all, when he was come into the cittie of AMPHIPOLIS, and afterwards into the cittie of ALEPSE, and that the seare was well blown ouer: he returned againe to his olde humour, which was borne and bred with him, and that was, avarice and miserie. For he made his complainte vnto those that were about him, that he had vnwares geuen to the fouldiers of CRETA, his plate and vessell of gold to be spoyled, being those which in olde time belonged vnto Alexander the great: & prayed them with reares in his eyes that had the plate, they would be contented to chaunge it for ready money. Now suche as knewe his nature, founde straight this was but a fraude and a CRETAN lye, to deceaue the CRETANS with: but those that trusted him, and dyd restore againe the plate they had, dyd loose it euery iorte, for he neuer paid them pennie of it. So he got of his friendes, the value of thirtie talents which his enemies (one after dyd take from him. And with that summe he went into the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where he tooke the sanctuary and priuledge, of the temple of Castor and Pollux. They saye, that the MACEDONIANS of long continuance dyd naturally loue their Kings: but then seeing all their hope and expectation broken, their hartes failed them, and broke withall. For they all came and submitted them felues vnto Æmylius, and made him lorde of the whole Realme of MACEDON in two dayes: and this doth seeme to confirme their wordes, who impute all Æmylius doings vnto his good fortune. And surely the maruelous fortune he happened on in the cittie of AMPHIPOLIS, doth confirme it muche, which a man cannot ascribe otherwise, but to the speciall grace of the godds. For one daye beginning to doe sacrifice, lightning fell from heauen, and set all the wodde a fire apon the altare, & sanctified the sacrifice. But yet the miracle of his fame is more to be wondred at. For foure dayes after Perseus had lost the battell, & that

A the cittie of PELLA was taken, as the people of ROME were at the listes or shoue place, seeing horses runne for games: sodainly there rose a rumour at the entring into the listes where the games were, how Æmylius had wonne a great battell of king Perseus, and had conquered all MACEDON. This newes was rife straight in euery mans mouth, and there followed vpon it a maruelous ioye and great cheere in euery corner, with shoutes and clapping of handes, that continued all the daye through the cittie of ROME. Afterwards they made diligent enquierie, how this rumour first came vp, but no certaine authour could be knowne, and euery man sayed they heard it spoken: so as in the ende it came to nothing, and passed awaye in that sorte for a time. But shortly after, there came letters, and certen newes that made them wonder more then before, from whence the messenger came that reported the first newes of it: which could be deuised by no naturall meanes, and yet proued true afterwards. We doe reade also of a battell that was fought in ITALIE, nere vnto the riuer of SAGRA, wherof newes was brought the very same daye vnto PELOPONNESVS. And of another also like manner that was fought in ASIA against the MEDES, before the cittie of MYCALA: the newes wherof came the same daye vnto the campe of the GRECIANS, lying before the cittie of PLATOES. And in that great iorney where the ROMAINES ouerthrowe the Tarquines, and the armie of the LATINES: immediately after the battell was wonne, they sawe two goodly young men come newly from the campe, who brought newes of the victorie to ROME, and they iudged they were Castor and Pollux. The first man that spake to them in the market place before the fontaine, where they watered their horie being all of a white foame, tolde them: that he wondred howe they could so quickly bring these newes. And they laughing came to him, and tooke him softly by the beard with both their handes, and euen in the market place his heare being blacke before, was presently turned yellowe. Ænobarbus why so called.

Cn. Octavianus, Æmylius lieutenant by sea.

The miserable fate Perseus was brought vnto, by the craft & subtiltie of a Cretan.

bitter fighe, when one tolde him on the peere, that he sawe Oroandes the Creyan vnder sale in the mayne seas. Then daye beginning to breake, and seeing him selfe voyde of all hope, he ranne with his wife for life to the wall, to recouer the sanctuarie again, before the ROMAINES that sawe him could ouertake him. And as for his children, he had geuen them him selfe into the hands of one Ion, whom before he had maruelously loued, and who then dyd traiterously betraye him: for he deliuered his children vnto the ROMAINES. Which parte was one of the chiefest causes that draue him (as a beast that will followe her lide ones being taken from her) to yeld him selfe into their hands that had his children. Now he had a speciall confidence in Scipio Nasica, and therefore he asked for him when he came to yeld him selfe: but it was answered him, that he was not there. Then he beganne to lament his hard and miserable fortune eury waye. And in the ende, considering howe necessitie enforced him, he yelded him selfe into the hands of Cneus Octanius, wherein he shewed plainly, that he had another vice in him more vnmanly and vile, then avarice: that was, a fainte harte, and feare to dye. But hereby he deprivied him selfe of others pittie & compassion towards him, being that only thing which fortune cannot denie and rake from the afflicted, and specially from them that haue a noble harte. For he made request they would bring him vnto the generall Æmylius, who rose from his chayer when he sawe him come, and went to mete him with his friends, the water standing in his eyes, to mete a great King, by fortune of warre, and by the will of the goddes, fallen into that most lamentable facte. But he to the contrarie, vnmanly, and shamefully behaued him selfe. For he fell downe at his feete, and embraced his knees, and vttered suche vncomely speache and vile requestes, as Æmylius selfe could not abide to heare them: but knitting his browes against him, being hartely offended, he spake thus vnto him. Alas poore mā, why dost thou discharge fortune of this faulte, where thou mightest iustly charge and accuse her to thy discharge, doing things, for the which eury one iudgeth thou hast deserued thy present miserye, & art vnworthie alio of thy former honour? why dost thou defame my victorie, & blemish the glory of my doings, shewing thy selfe to be a mā, as my honour is not great, to ouercome so vnworthie an enemye? The ROMAINES haue euer esteemed magnanimitie, euen in their greatest enemies: but dastardlines, though it be fortunate, yet is it hated of eury bodie. Notwithstanding, he tooke him vp, and taking him by the hande, gaue him into the custodie of Ælius Tubero. Then Æmylius went into his tent, & caried his sonnes, & sonnes in law with him, & other men of qualitie, and specially the younger sorte. And being set downe, he continued a great space very pensue with him selfe, not speaking a word: in so much as all the standers by, wondered much at the matter. In the ende, he beganne to enter into discourse & talke of fortune, & the vnconstancy of these worldly things, & sayed vnto them. Is there any man liuing, my friends, who hauing fortune at will, should therefore boast and glorie in the prosperitie of his doings, for that he hath conquered a contrie, cittie, or Realme: & not rather to feare the vnconstancy of fortune: who laying before our eyes, & all those that professe armes at this present, so notable an example of the common frailtie of men, doth plainly teache vs to thinke, that there is nothing constant or perdurable in this world. For when is it, that men maye thinke them selues assured, considering that when they haue ouercome others, then are they driuen to mistrust fortune most, & to mingle feare & mistrust, with ioye of victorie: if they will wisely consider the common course of fatall destenie that altereth daylie, sometime fauouring one, other while throwing down another? you see, that in an howers space we haue trode vnder our feete, the house of Alexander the great: who hath bene the mightiest & most redouted prince of the world. You see a King, that not long tyme was followed & accompanied, with many thousand souldiers of horsemen & footemen: brought at this present into such miserable extremitie, that he is enforced to receiue his meate & drinke daylie at the hands of his enemies. Should we haue any better hope then, that fortune will allwayes fauour our doings, more then she doth his now, at this present? no out of doubt. Therefore digesting this matter well, you young men I say, be not to bragge nor foolish prowde, of this conquest & noble victorie: but thinke what maye happè hereafter, marking to what end fortune will turne the enuie of this our present prosperitie. Such were Æmylius words to these young men, as it is reported, briding by these & such like persuations, the lusty brauery of this youth, euen as with the bit & bridle of reason. Afterwards

Awardes he put his armie into garrisons to resrefe them: and went him selfe in persone in the meane time to visite Grecians, making it an honorable progresse, and also a commendable. For as he passed through their cities, he releued the people, reformed the gouernment of their state, and euer gaue them some gifte or present. had gathered for the warres: and vnto other he gaue oyles, meeting with so great store of prouision, that he rather lacked people to geue it vnto, to receiue it at his handes, then wanting to geue, there was so much. As he passed by the cittie of Delfes, he sawe there a great pillar, foure square, of white stone, which they had set vp, to put king Perseus image of gold vpon it. Whereupon he commaunded them to set vp his in that place, saying: it was reason the conquered should geue place vnto the conquerours. And being in the cittie of Olympia, visiting the temple of Iupiter Olympian, he spake thus openly, which euer since hath bene remembered: that Phidias had rightly made Iupiter, as Homer had described him. Afterwards when the tenne ambassadours were arriued that were sent from Rome to establish with him the realme of Macedon, he redeliuered the Macedonians their countie. and townes againe, to liue at libertie, according to their lawes, paying yerely to the ROMAINES for tribute, a hundred talents: where before they were wont to paye vnto their Kings tenne times as much. And he made playes and games of all sortes, and dyd celebrate sumptuous sacrifices vnto the goddes. He kept open court to all comers, and made noble feastes, and defrayed the whole charge thereof, with the treasure Perseus had gathered together, sparing for no coste. But through his care and foresight there was suche a speciall good order taken, eury man so courteously receiued and welcomed, and so orderly marshalled at the table according to their estate and calling: that the Grecians wondered to see him so careful in matters of sporte and pleasure: and that he tooke as great paynes in his owne persone, to see that small matters should be ordered as they ought: as he tooke great regard for discharge of more weighty causes. But this was a maruelous pleasure to him, to see that among such sumptuous fighes prepared to shewe pleasure to the persones inuiued, no light nor statelie shewe dyd so delight them, as to enioye the sight and company of his persone. So he told them, that seemed to wonder at his diligence and care in these matters: that to order a feast well, required as great iudgement and discretion, as to set a battell: to make the one fearefull to the enemies, and the other acceptable to his friends. But men esteemed his bountie and magnanimitie for his best vertue and qualitie. For he dyd not only refuse to see the Kings wonderful treasure of golde and siluer, but caused it to be told, and deliuered to the custodie of the treasurers, to carie to the coffers of store in Rome: and only suffered his sonnes that were learned, to take the bookes of the Kings librarie. When he dyd rewarde the souldiers for their valliant seruice in this battell, he gaue his sonne in lawe Æmylius Tubero a cuppe, of five talents. It is the same Tubero we tolde you of before, who liued with sixteene of his kynne all in one house, and of the only reuenuie they had of a litle farme in the countie. Some saye, that cuppe was the first peece of plate that euer came into the house of the Ælians, and yet it came for honour and reward of vertue: but before that time, neither them selues, nor their wiues, would euer haue, or weare, any gold or siluer. After he had wery well ordered and disposed all things, at the last he tooke leaue of the Grecians, and counseled the Macedonians to remember the libertie the ROMAINES had geuen them, and that they should be careful to keepe it, by their good gouernment and concord together. Then he departed from them, and tooke his iorney towards the countie of Epirus, hauing receiued commission from the Senate of Rome, to suffer his souldiers who had done seruice in the battell, and ouerthrowe of king Perseus, to spoyle all the cities of that countie. Wherefore that he might surpise them on a sodaine, and that they should mistrust nothing, he sent to all the cities that they should send him by a certaine daye, tenne of the chiefest men, of eury cittie. Who when they were come, he commaunded them to goe and bring him by suche a daye, all the golde and siluer they had within their cities, aswell in their priuate houses, as in their temples and churches, and gaue vnto euerie one of them a captaine and garrison with them, as if it had bene only to haue reucaled and searched for the gold and siluer he demanded, But when the daye appointed was come, the souldiers in diuers places, (and all at one time)

set vpon their enemies, and dyd rife and spoyle them of that they had, and made them also a paye ranfome euery man: So as by this policie, there were taken and made slaues in one daye, a hundred and fittie thousand perfoncs, and three fcore and tenne cities fpoyled and facked euery one. And yet when they came to deuide the spoyle of this generall destruction of a whole Realme by the polle, it came not to euery fouldiers parte, about eleuen filuer Drachmes a peece. Which made euery one to wonder greatly, and to feare also the terror of the warres, to fee the wealth and riches of fo great a Realme, to amownte to fo litle for euery mans share. When Æmylius had done this fafte againft his owne nature, which was very gende and courteous: he went vnto the fea fyde to the city of ORICA, and there embarked with his armie bounde for ITALIE. Where when he was arriued, he went vp the riuier of Tyber againft the ftream, in king Perfius chief galley, which had fixteene owens on B a fide, richly fet out with the armour of the prifoners, riche clothes of purple culler, and other fuche fpoyles of the enemies: fo that the ROMAINES ranning out of ROME in multitudes of people to fee this galley, and going fide by fide by her as they rowed fpeitly, Æmylius tooke as great pleafure in it, as in any open games or feaftes, or triumphe that had bene fhewed in deede. But when the fouldiers fawe, that the golde and filuer of king Perfius treasure was not deuided amongst them according vnto promife, and that they had a great deale leffe then they looked for, they were marueloufly offended, and inwardly grugged Æmylius in their hartes. Neuertheles they durft not fpeake it openly, but dyd accufe him, that he had bene to ftraight vnto them in this warre, and therefore they dyd fhewe no great defire, nor forwardnes, to procure him the honour of triumphe. Which Seruius Galba C vnderftanding, that had bene an olde enemy of his, notwithstanding he had the charge of a thousand men vnder him in this warre: he like an enuious viper tolde the people, howe Æmylius had not deferved the honour of triumphe, and fowed feditious wordes againft him among the fouldiers, to aggrauate their ill will the more againft him. Moreover, he craued a daye of the Tribunes of the people, to haue refpit to bring forth fuche matter as they determined to obieft againft him: faying the time then was farr fpent, the fomme being but foure howers high, and that it would require longer time and leysure. The Tribunes made him anfwer, that he fhould fpeake then what he had to faye againft him, or otherwife they would not graunte him audience. Hereupon he beganne to make a long oration in his difpraise, full of railing wordes, and spent all the reft of the daye in that rayling oration. Afterwardes when night came on, the Tribunes brake vp the affembly, and the next morning the fouldiers being incouraged by Galbas oration, and hauing confedered together, dyd flocke about Galba, in the mount of the Capitoll, where the Tribunes had geuen warning they would be their affembly. Now being broade daye, Æmylius triumphe was referred to the number of voyces of the people, and the firft tribe flatly dyd denie his triumphe. The Senate, and the residue of the people hearing that, were very forie to fee they dyd Æmylius fo open wrong and iniurie. The common-people fayed nothing to it, they feemed to be very forie, howbeit they fought no redrefle. The lordes of the Senate cried out upon them, & fayed it was to much fhame, and exhorted one another to bridell the infolencie and boldnes of thefe fouldiers, who would growe in the ende to fuch tumulte and diforder, that they E would commit all mifchief and wickednes, if betimes they were not looked to, and preuented, feeing they dyd fo openly ftand againft their generall, seeking to deprive him of the honour of his triumphe and victorie. So they affembled a good company of them together, and went vp to the Capitoll, and prayed the Tribunes they would ftaye to take the voyces of the people, vntill they had acquainted them with fuch needfull matter, as they had to open vnto them. The Tribunes graunted to it, and fentence was made. Then Marcus Seruilus, who had bene Conful, and had fought three and twenty combats of life and death in his owne perfon, and had allwayes flaine as many of his enemies as challenged him man for man: role vp, and fpake in fauour of Æmylius in this manner. I knowe now (fayed he) better then before, how noble and worthe a capitaine Paulus Æmylius is, who hath achieved fuch glorie F and honorable victorie, with fo difhonorable and difobedient fouldiers. What reafon haue ye, that not long fince, upon a flying rumour that Æmylius had wonne the battell againft Perfius, you straight made facrifices to the goddes with great ioye, praying them that you might be witnesses of the trothe thereof: and now that the perfon him felfe whom you made generall is returned home, and doth deliuer you moft affured victorie, you doe frustrate the goddes wonted glorie in fuch a cafe? as if you were afraid to fee the greatnes of your propfperitie, or B that you ment to pardone a King your flau and prifoner. And yet of the two, you haue more reafon to hinder the triumphe, as pityting the King: then enuying your captaine. But the malice of the wicked, through your pacience is grown to fuche an infolent audacitie and boldnes, that we fee men prefent here before vs, which neuer went fro the fmoke of the chimney, nor caried away any blowes in the field, being crammed at home like women & houfedowes: and yet they are fo impudent and fhameles, as they dare presume vnreuerently to your faces, to prate of the office and duety of a generall of an armie, and of the defert of triumphe, before you I faye, who by experience of many a fore cut and wounde upon your bodies in the warres, haue learned to knowe a good and valliant captaine, from a vile and cowardly perfon. And fpeaking thefe wordes, he caft open his gowne, and fhewed before them all, the infinite C fcarres and cuttes he had receyued vpon his brest: and then turning him behinde, fhewed all fuche places as were not fitte to be feene openly, and fo turned him againe to Galba, and fayed vnto him. Thou mockeft me for that I fhewe thee: but I reioyce before my countrie men and citizens: that for feruing my cōtrie night & daye a horfe backe, I haue thefe wounds upon me which thou feelt. Now get thee about thy bufinnes, & receiue their voyces: & I wil come after, noting them that are naughtie and vnthankfull citizens, who like to be fothed with flatterie, and not flowely commaunded, as behoueth a generall in the warre. Thefe wordes fo reined the harde headed fouldiers with the curbe of reafon, that all the other tribes agreed in one, and graunted Æmylius triumphe: the order and folemnitie whereof was performed in this D fote. Firft, the people hauing fet vp fundrie fcaffolde, afwel in the liftes & field (called Circus by the LATINES) where the games and common running of hories and charretts are made, as also about the market place, and in other ftreetes of the citie, through the which, the fhewe of the triumphe should paffe: they all prefented them felues in their beft gownes to fee the magnificence and ftate thereof. All the temples of the goddes also were fet wide open, hanged full of garlands of flowers, and all perfumed within: and there were fet through all the quarters of the citie, numbers of fergeaunts and other officers holding tipftaues in their hands, to order the ftraging people, and to keepe them vp in corners and lanes endes, that they should not pester the ftreetes, & hinder the triumphe. Furthermore, the fight of this triumphe was to continue three dayes, whereof the firft was fcaut fufficient to fee the paffing by of the images, tables, & pictures, & ftatues of wonderfull bignes, all wonne and gotten of their enemies, and drawn in the fhowe, vpon two hundred & fiftie charretts. The fecond daye, there were caried E vpon a number of cartes, all the faireft and richeft armour of the MACEDONIANS, afwell of copper, as also of iron and Steele, all glittering bright, being newly furnifhed, and artificeilly layed in order (and yet in fuch fote, as if they had bene caft in heapes one vpon another, without taking any care otherwife for the ordering and laying of them) fayer burganers vpon targets: habergions, or brigantines and corflets, vpon greaues: rounde targets of the CYRETANS, and iaulings of the THRACIANS, and arrowes amongst the armed pykes: all this armour and carriage, being bound one to another fo trimly (neither being too loole, nor too ftraight) that one hitting againft another, as they drue them vpon the cartes through the citie, they made fuche a found and noyfe, as it was fearefull to heare it: fo that the only fight of thefe F fpoyles of the captiues being overcome, made the fight fo muche more terrible to behold it. After thefe cartes laden with armour, there followed three thousand men, which caried the ready money in feuen hundred & fiftie veflels, which wayed about three talens a peece, & euery

one of them were caried by foure men: & there were other that caried great bowles of filuer, & cuppes & goblets facioned like hornes, & other pottes to drinke in, goodly to behold, as wel for their bignes, as for their great & singular inbowed workes about it. The third day early in the morning, the trumpets beganne to found & set forwardes, founding no marche nor swete notes, to bewaite triumphe withall: but they blew out the braue alarm they founde at an assault, to geue the souldiers corage for to fight. After them followed fixe score goodly fat oxen, hauing all their hornes gylte, & garlands of flowes & nosegayes about their heads, & there wex by them certayne yong men, with aprons of needle worke, girt about their midle, who led them to the sacrifice, & yong boyes with them also, that caried goodly basons of gold & siluer, to cast & sprinkle the blood of the sacrifices about. And after these, followed those that caried all coynes of gold deuided by basons & vessels, & euery one of them waying three talents as they dyd before, that caried the great holy cuppe, which Æmylius had caused to be made of mass gold, set full of precious stones, waying the weight of tenne talents, to make an offering vnto the godds. And next vnto them went other that caried plate, made & wrought after antique facion, & notable cuppes of the auncient kings of MACEDON: as the cuppe called Antigonus, & another Selenus: & to be shorte, all the whole cubberd of plate of gold & siluer of king Perseus. And next them came the charret of his armour, in the which was all king Perseus harnesse, & his royall bande (they call a Diademe) vpon his armour. And a litle space betweene them, followed next the Kings children, whom they led prisoners, with the traine of their schoolemasters & other officers, & their seruants, weeping & lamenting: who held vp their hands vnto the people that looked upon them, & taught the Kings young children to doe the like, to aske C mercie & grace at the peoples hands. There were three prety litle children, two sonnes and a daughter amongst them, whose tender yeres and lacke of vnderstanding, made them (poore soules) they could not feele their present miserie, which made the people so much more to pittie them, when they saw the poore litle infants, that they knew not the chaunge of their hard fortune: so that for the cōpassion they had of the, they almost let the father passe without looking vpon him. Many peoples harts did melt for very pittie, that the teares ranne downe their cheekes, so as this sight brought both pleasure & sorow, together to the lookers on, vntill they were past & gone a good way out of sight. King Perseus the father, followed after his children & their traine, & he was clothed in a blacke gowne, wearing a payer of slippers on his feete after his contrie māner. He shewed by his countenance his troubled minde, oppressed with sorow D of his most miserable state & fortune. He was followed with his kinsfolks, his familiar friends, his officers & household seruants, their faces disfigured by blubbering, shewing to the world by their lamenting teares, & sorowfull eyes cast upon their vnfortunate master, how much they sorowed & bewailed his most hard & cursed fortune, litle accōpting of their own miserie. The voice goeth, that Perseus sent vnto Æmylius to intreate him, that he should not be led through the citie in the shoue & sight of the triūphe. But Æmylius mocking (as he deserved) his cowardly faint hart, answered: as for that, it was before, & is now in him, to doe if he wil. Meaning to let him vnderstand thereby, that he might rather chuse to dye, then liuing to receiue such open shame. Howbeit his hart would not serue him, he was so cowardly, & made so effeminate, by a certain vaine hope he knew not what, that he was cōtented to make one amōg his own spoiles. After all this, there followed 400. princely crownes of golde, which the cities and townes of GREECE had purposely sent by their ambassadours vnto Æmylius, to honour his victorie: & next vnto the, he came him selfe in his charret triūphing, which was passing sumptuously set forth & adorned. It was a noble sight to behold: & yet the person of him self only was worth the looking on, without all that great pōpe & magnificēce. For he was apparelled in a purple gowne branched with gold, & caried in his right hand a lawrell bough, as all his armie did besides: the which being deuided by bands & cōpanies, followed the triūphing charret of their capitaine, some of the souldiers singing songes of victorie, which the ROMANES vse to singe in like triūmphes, mingling the with mery pleasant toyes, reioycing at their captaine. Other of the also dyd sing songes of triūphe, in the honour & praise of Æmylius noble cōquest & victorie. He was openly praised, blessed, & honored of euery body, & neither hated nor enuied of honest men. Sawing the ordinary vse of some god, whose proprietie is allwayes to lessen or cut of some part of

A of mans exceeding prosperitie & felicitie, mingling with mans life the sence & feeling of good & euill together: because that no liuing persone should passe all his time of life, without some aduersitie or misfortune, but that such (as Homer sayeth) should only thinke the felices happie, to whom fortune hath equally sorted the good with the euill. And this I speake, because Æmylius had 4. sonnes, two of the which he gaue in adoptiō vnto the families of Scipio & of Fabius, as we haue sayed before: & two other which he had by his secōd wife, be brought vp with him in his owne house, & were both yet very young. Of the which one dyed, being 14. yeres of age five dayes before his fathers triūphe: & the other dyed also, 3. dayes after the pompe of triūphe, at 12. yeres of age. When this sorowfull chaunce had befallen him, euery one in ROMAN did pittie him in their hartes: but fortunes spite & crueltie did more greue & feare them, to see B her litle regard towards him, to put into a house of triūphe (full of honour & glorie, & of sacrifices & ioye) such a pittiefull mourning, & mingling of sorowes & lamentations of death, amongst such songes of triūphe & victorie. Notwithstanding this, Æmylius taking things like a wise man, thought that he was not only to vse constancie & magnanimitie, against the sword & pike of the enemy: but a like also against all aduersitie and enmitie of spitefull fortune. So he wisely wayed & considered his present misfortune, with his former prosperitie: & finding his misfortune cōterpealed with felicitie, & his priuate grieues cut of with cōmon ioye, he gaue no place to his sorowes & mischāces, neither blemished any way the dignity of his triūphe & victorie. For when he had buried the eldest of his two last sonnes, he left not to make his triūphant entrie, as you haue heard before. And his secōd sonne also being deceased after his triūphe, he C caused the people to assemble, & in face of the whole citie he made an oration, nor like a discomfōrted man, but like one rather that dyd cōfōrt his sorowfull contrymen for his mischāce. He told them, that concerning mens matters, neuer any thing dyd feare him: but for things above, he euer feared fortune, mistrusting her chaunge & inconstācie, & specially in the last warre, doubting for so great prosperitie as could be wished, to be passed home with an after intollerable aduersitie, & sinister chaunce. For as I went (sayed he) I passed ouer the gulfe of the Adriaticke sea, from B RINDIS vnto CORFV in one daye. And from thence in fīue dayes after, I arrived in the citie of DELPHES, where I dyd sacrifice vnto Apollo. And within fīue other dayes, I arrived in my cāpe, where I found mine armie in MACEDON. And after I had done the sacrifice, & due ceremonies for purifying of the same, I presently begāne to followe the purpose & D cause of my cōming: so as in 15. dayes after, I made an honorable ende of all those warres. But yet, mistrusting fortune allwayes, seing the prosperous course of my affaires, & considering that there were no other enemies, nor daungers I neded to feare: I feared sorely she would chaunge at my returne, when I should be vpon the sea, bringing home so goodly & victorious an armie, with so many spoiles & so many Princes and Kings taken prisoners. And yet when I was safely arrived in the hauen, & seing all the citie at my returne full of ioye, & of feastes & sacrifices: I still suspected fortune, knowing her manner well enough, that the vñeth not to gratifie men so frankly, nor to graunt them so great things clearly, without some certen sparke of enuie waiting on them. Neither dyd my minde being still occupied in feare of some thing to happen to the cōmon wealth, shake of this feare behind me: but that I sawe, this home mishappe & miserie lighted vpon me, enforcing me with mine owne hands in these holy dayes of my triūphe, to burie my two young sonnes one after another, which I only brought vp with me, for the succession of my name & house. Wherefore, me thinks now I may saye, I am out of all daunger, at the least touching my chiefeest & greatest misfortune: & doe beginne to stablish my selfe with this assured hope, that this good fortune henceforth shall remaine with vs euermore, without feare of other vñucky or sinister chaunce. For the hath sufficiently conuerted the favorable victorie she gaue you, with the enuious mishappe wherewith the hath plagued both me and mine: shewing the cōquerour & triūpher, as noble an exāple of mans miserie & weaknes, as the party cōquered, that had bene led in triūphe. Sawing that Perseus yet, cōquered as he is, hath this cōfōrt left him: to see his childre liuing, & that the cōquerour Æmylius hath lost his. And F this was the summe of Æmylius notable oration he made vnto the people of ROMAN, proceeding of a noble & honorable disposed minde. And though it pittied him in his harte to see the strange chaunge of king Perseus fortune, and that he hartely desired to helpe him, and to doe him good: yet he could neuer obtaine other grace for him, but only to remoue him from the common priſone (which the ROMAINES call Carcer) into a more clemly and ſweter houſe where being ſtraitly garded and looked vnto, he killed him ſelfe by abſtinenſe from meate, as the moſt parte of hitoriographers doe write. Yet ſome writers tell a maruelous ſtrange tale, and manner of his death. For they ſaye the ſouldiers that garded him, kept him from ſleepe, watching him ſtraightly when ſleepe tooke him, and would not ſuffer him to ſhut his eye liddes (only apon malice they dyd beare him, becauſe they could not otherwiſe hurte him) keeping him awake by force, not ſuffering him to take reſt: vntill ſuche time as nature being forced to geue ouer, he gaue vp the ghoſt. Two of his ſonnes dyed alſo: but the third called Alexander, became an excellent turner and ioyner, and was learned, and could ſpeake the ROMAINES tongue very well, and dyd write it ſo trimly, that afterwards he was chancelour to the magiſtrates of ROME, and dyd wiſely and diſcretly behaue him ſelfe in his office. Furthermore, they doe adde to this goodly conqueſt of the realme of MACEDON, that Æmylius conquered another ſpeciall good thing, that made him maruelouſly well liked of the common people: that is, that he brought fo much gold and ſiluer vnto the treaſurie ſtore of ROME, as the common people needed neuer after to make contribution for any thing, vntill the very time and yere that Hircius and Panſa were Conſuls, which was about the beginning of the firſt warres of Auguſtus and Antonius. And yet Æmylius had one ſingular good gift in him: that though the people dyd greatly loue and honour him, yet he euer tooke parte with the Senate and nobilitie, and dyd neuer by worde nor dede any thing in fauour of the people, to flatter or pleaſe them, but in matters concerning gouernment, he dyd euer leane to the nobilitie and good men. And this dyd Appius afterwards caſt in his ſonnes teethe, Scipio Africanus. For both of them being two of the chiefeſt men of their time, and contending together for the office of Cenſor: Appius had about him to fauour his ſure, all the Senate and Nobilitie, as of auncient time the familie of the Appians had euer held on their parte. And Scipio Africanus, though he was a great man of him ſelfe, yet he was in all times laoured and beloued of the common people. Whereupon when Appius ſawe him come into the market place, followed with men of ſmall qualitie and baſe condition, that had bene ſlaues before, but otherwiſe could ſkilfully handle ſuche praſtiſes, bring the people together, and by oportunitie of cries and lowde voyces (if neede were) obtaine what they would in the aſſembles of the cittie: he ſpake out alowde, and ſayed, O Paulus Æmylius, now haſt thou good cauſe to ſighe, and mourne in thy graue where thou lyeſt (if the dead doe know what we doe here on earth) to ſee Æmylius a common ſergeant, and Licinius a prating fellowe, howe they bring thy ſonne vnto the dignitie of a Cenſor. And as for Scipio, he was alwayes beloued of the common people, becauſe he dyd fauour them in all things. But Æmylius alſo, although he tooke euer the noble mens parte, he was not therefore leſſe beloued of the common people, then thoſe that allwayes flattered them, doing all things as the people would, to pleaſe them: which the common people did witneſſe, aſwell by other honours & offices they offered him, as in the dignitie of the Cenſor which they gaue him. For it was the holieſt office of all other at that time, and of greateſt power and authoritie, ſpecially for inquierie and reformation of euery mans life and manners. For he that was Cenſor, had authoritie to put any Senatour of the counſell, and to diſgrade him, if he dyd not worthily behaue him ſelfe according to his place and calling: and might name and declare any one of the Senate, whom he thought to be moſt honeſt, and fitteſt for the place againe. Moreover, they might by their authoritie, take from licentious young men, their horſe which was kept at the charge of the common weale. Furthermore, they be the ſeſſours of the people, and the muſter maſters, keeping bookes of the number of perſones at euery muſtering. So there appeared numbred in the regiſter booke Æmylius made then of them, three hundred, ſeuē and thirtie thouſand, foure hundred, and two and ſiftie men, and Marcus Æmylius Lepidus named preſident of the Senate, who had that honour foure times before, and dyd put of the counſell three Senatours, that were but meane men. And the like meane and moderation he & his companion, Marcus Philippus kept, vpon viewe and muſter taken of the ROMAINES horſemen. And after he had ordered and diſpoſed the greateſt matters of his charge and office, he fell ſicke of a diſeaſe

A ſeaſe that at the beginning ſeemed very dangerous, but in the ende there was no other danger, ſauing that it was a lingering diſeaſe, and hard to cure. So, following the counſell of phiſicians, who willed him to goe to a cittie in ITALY called Velia, he tooke ſea, and went thither, and continued there a long time, dwelling in pleaſant houſes vpon the ſea ſide, quietly and out of all noyſe. But during this time of his abſence, the ROMAINES wiſhed for him many a time and ofte. And when they were gathered together in the Theaters, to ſee the playes and ſportes, they cried out diuers times for him: whereby they ſhewed that they had a great deſire to ſee him againe. Time being come about when they vſed to make a ſolemne yerely ſacrifice, and Æmylius finding him ſelfe alſo in good perfect health: he returned againe to ROME, where he made the ſacrifice with the other prieſtes, all the people of ROME gathering about him, reioycing muche to ſee him. The next daye after, he made another particular ſacrifice, to geue thanks vnto the goddeſs for recouerie of his healthe. After the ſacrifice was ended, he went home to his houſe, & ate him downe to dinner: he ſodainly fell into a rauing (without any perſeuerance of ſickneſs ſpied in him before, or any change or alteration in him) and his wittes went from him in ſuche ſorte, that he dyed within three dayes after, lacking no neceſſarie thing that an earthly man could haue, to make him happy in this world. For he was euen honoured at his funeralles, and his vertue was adorned with many goodly glorious ornaments, neither with gold, ſiluer, nor iuorie, nor with other ſuche ſumptuouſnes or magnificence of apparell, but with the loue and good will of the people, all of them confeſſing his vertue and well doing: and this dyd not only his naturall country men performe in memorie of him, but his very enemies alſo. For all thoſe that met in ROME by chaunce at that time, that were either come out of SPAYNE, from GENVA, or out of MACEDON, all thoſe that were young and ſtrong, dyd willingly put them ſelues vnder the coffin where his bodie laye, to helpe to carie him to the church: and the olde men followed his bodie to accompany the ſame, calling Æmylius the benefactour, ſauour, and father of their countrie. For he dyd not only intreate them gently, and graciouſly, whom he had ſubdued: but all his life time he was euer ready to pleaſure them, and to ſet forwardes their cauſes, euen as they had bene his confederates, very friends, and neere kinſemen. The inventory of all his goodes after his death, dyd ſcant amownte vnto the ſumme of three hundred, three ſcore, and tenne thouſand ſiluer Drachmes, which his two ſonnes dyd inherite. But Scipio being the younger, left all his right vnto his elder brother Fabius, becauſe he was adopted into a very riche houſe, which was the houſe of the great Scipio Africanus. Suche they ſaye was Paulus Æmylius conditions and life.

O Paulus Æmylius, now haft thou good caufe to fighe, and mourne in thy graue where thou lyeft (if the dead doe know what we doe here on earth) to fee Æmylius a common fergeant, and Licinius a prating fellowe, howe they bring thy fonne vnto the dignitie of a Cenfor. And as for Scipio, he was alwayes beloued of the common people, bicaufe he dyd fauour them in all things. But Æmylius alfo, although he tooke euer the noble mens parte, he was not therefore leffe beloued of the common people, then thofe that alwayes flattered them, doing all things as the people would, to pleafe them: which the common people did witneffe, as well by other honours & offices they offered him, as in the dignitie of the Cenfor which they gaue him. Moreover, they might by their authoritie, take from licentious young men, their horfe which was kept at the charge of the common weale. So there appeared numbered in the regiftre booke Æmylius made then of them, three hundred, feuen and thirtie thoufand, foure hundred, and two and fiftie men, and Marcus Æmylius Lepidus named prefident of the Senate, who had that honour foure times before, and dyd put of the counfell three Senatours, that were but meane men. And the like meane and moderation he & his companion, Marcus Philippus kept, vpon viewe and mufter taken of the ROMAINE horfemen. A feafe that at the beginning feemed very daungerous, but in the ende there was no other daunger, faying that it was a lingring difeafe, and hard to cure. So, following the counfell of phifitians, who willed him to goe to a cittie in ITALY called VELIA, he tooke fea, and went thither, and continued there a long time, dwelling in pleaſant houſes vpon the ſea ſide, quietly and out of all noyſe. But during this time of his abſence, the ROMAINES wiſhed for him many a time and ofte. And when they were gathered together in the Theaters, to ſee the playes and ſportes, they cried out diuers times for him: whereby they ſhewed that they had a great deſire to ſee him againe. Time being come about when they vſed to make a ſolemne yerely ſacrifice, and Æmylius finding him ſelfe alſo in good perfect health: he returned againe to ROME, where he made the ſacrifice with the other prieſtes, all the people of ROME gathering about him, reioycing muche to ſee him. The next daye after, he made another particular ſacrifice, to geue thanks vnto the goddes for recouerie of his healtie. After the ſacrifice was ended, he went home to his houſe, & fate him downe to dinner: he ſodainly fell into a rauing (without any perfeuerance of ſicknes ſpied in him before, or any change or alteration in him) and his wittes went from him in fuche forte, that he dyed within three dayes after, lacking no neceſſarie thing that an earthly man could haue, to make him happy in this world. For he was euen honoured at his funerall, and his vertue was adorned with many goodly glorious ornaments, neither with gold, ſiluer, nor iuorie, nor with other fuche ſumptuouſnes or magnificence of apparell, but with the loue and good will of the people, all of them confeſſing his vertue and well doing: and this dyd not only his naturall country men performe in memorie of him, but his very enemies alſo. For all thoſe that met in ROME by chaunce at that time, that were either come out of SPAYNE, from GENVA, or out of MACEDON, all thoſe that were young and ſtrong, dyd willingly put them ſelues vnder the coffin where his bodie laye, to helpe to carie him to the church: and the olde men followed his bodie to accompany the ſame, calling Æmylius the benefaكتور, ſauour, and father of their countrie. For he dyd not only intreate them gently, and graciouſly, whom he had ſubdued: but all his life time he was euer ready to pleaſure them, and to ſet forwardes their cauſes, euen as they had bene his confederates, very friends, and neere kinſemen. The inuentorie of all his goodes after his death, dyd ſcant amownte vnto the ſumme of three hundred, three ſcore, and tenne thouſand ſiluer Drachmes, which his two ſonnes dyd inherite. But Scipio being the younger, left all his right vnto his elder brother Fabius, bicaufe he was adopted into a very riche houſe, which was the houſe of the great Scipio Africanus.

The state of the Syracusans before Timo-leons coming.

BEFORE Timoleon was sent into SICILE, thus stood the state of the SYRACUSANS. After that Dion had driven out the tyrant Dionysius, he him selfe after was slaine immediatly by treason: and those that ayded him to restore the SYRACUSANS to their libertie, fell out, and were at dissention among them selves. By reason whereof, the citie of SYRACUSA chaunging continually newe tyrannies, was so troubled and turmoiled with all sorte of euills, that it was left in manner desolate, and without inhabitants. The rest of SICILE in like case was vtterly destroyed, and no citie in manner left standing, by reason of the long warres: and those fewe that remained, were most inhabited of forreine souldiers & straungers (a company of lose men gathered together that tooke paye of no prince nor citie) all the dominions of the same being easely vsurped, and as easie to chaunge their lorde. In so much, Dionysius the tyrant, tenne yeres after Dion had driven him out of SICILE, hauing gathered a certain number of souldiers together againe, and through their helpe driven out Nisemus, that reigned at that time in SYRACUSA: he recovered the Realme againe, and made him selfe King. So, if he was straungely expelled by a small power out of the greatest Kingdome that euer was in the worlde: likewise he more straungely recovered it againe, being banished and very poore, making him selfe King ouer them, who before had driven him out. Thus were the inhabitants of the citie compelled, to serue this tyrant: who besides that of his owne nature he was neuer curteous nor ciuill, he was now growen to be farre more dogged and cruell, by reason of the extreme miserie and misfortune he had endured. But the noblest citizens repaired vnto Iscetes, who at that time as lorde ruled the citie of the LEONTINES, and they chose him for their generall in these warres: not for that he was any thing better then the open tyrannes, but because they had no other to repaire vnto at that time, & they trusted him best, for that he was borne (as them selves) within the citie of SYRACUSA, & because also he had men of warre about him, to make head against this tyrant. But in the meane time, the CARTHAGINIANS came downe into SICILE with a great armie, and invaded the countie. The SYRACUSANS being affrayed of them, determined to send ambassa-

Iscetes, tyrant of the Leontines.

A dours into GRÆCE vnto the CORINTHIANS, to praye ayde of them against the barbarous people, hauing better hope of them, then of any other of the GRÆCIANS. And that not altogether because they were lineally descended from them, and that they had receyued in times past many pleasures at their handes: but also for that they knewe that CORINTH was a citie, that in all ages and times, dyd euer loue libertie, and hate tyrannes, and that had alwayes made their greatest warres, not for ambition of Kingdomes, nor of couetous desire to conquer and rule, but only to defend and maintaine the libertie of the GRÆCIANS. But Iscetes in another contrarie sorte, he tooke upon him to be generall, with a minde to make him selfe king of SYRACUSA. For he had secretly practised with the CARTHAGINIANS, and openly notwithstanding, in words he commended the counsell and determination of the SYRACUSANS, and sent p ambassadours from him selfe also with theirs, vnto PELOPONNESVS: not that he was desirous any ayde should come from them to SYRACUSA, but because he hoped if the CORINTHIANS refused to send them ayde (as it was very likely they would, for the warres and troubles that were in GRÆCE) that he might more easely turne all ouer to the CARTHAGINIANS, and vse them as his friends, to ayde him against the SYRACUSANS, or the tyrant Dionysius. And that this was his full purpose, and intent, it appeared plainly sone after. Now when their ambassadours arriued at CORINTH, & had deliuered their message, the CORINTHIANS, who had euer bene careful to defend such citie as had fought vnto them, & specially SYRACUSA: very willingly determined in counsaill to send them ayde, and the rather for that they were in good peace at that time, hauing warres with none of the GRÆCIANS. So their only staye rested, vpon choosing of a generall to leade their armie. Now as the magistrates and gouernours of the citie were naming suche citizens, as willingly offered their seruice, desirous to aduance them selves: there stept vp a meane commoner, who named Timoleon, Timodemus sonne, a man that vntill that time was neuer called on for seruice, neither looked for any suche preferment. And truly it is to be thought it was the secret working of the gods, that directed the thought of this meane commoner to name Timoleon: whose election fortune fauored very much, and ioyned to his valliantnes and vertue, maruelous good successe in all his doings afterwards. This Timoleon was borne of noble parents, both by father and mother: his father was called Timodemus, and his mother Demareta. He was naturally inclined to loue his countie and common weale: and was alwayes gentle and curteous to all men, sauing that he mortally hated D tyrantes and wicked men. Furthermore nature had framed his bodie apt for warres and for paynes: he was wise in his grenest youth in all things he tooke in hande, and in his age he shewed him selfe very valliant. He had an elder brother called Timophanes, who was nothing like to him in condition: for he was a rashe harebraynd man, & had a greedy desire to reigne, being put into his head by a companie of meane men, that bare him in hande they were his friends, and by certain souldiers gathered together, which he had alwayes about him. And because he was very hotte and forward in warres, his citizens tooke him for a noble captain, & a man of good seruice, and therefore oftentimes they gaue him charge of men. And therein Timoleon dyd helpe him muche to hide his faulte he committed, or at the least made them seeme lesse, & lighter then they were, still increasing that small good gifte that nature brought E forth in him. As in a battell the CORINTHIANS had against the ARGIENS and the CLEONIANS, Timoleon serued as a priuate souldier amongst the footemen: and Timophanes his brother, hauing charge of horsemen, was in great daunger of being cast away, if present helpe had not bene. For his horse being hurte, threw him on the grounde in the midst of his enemies. Whereupon parte of those that were about him, were affrayed, and dispersed them selves here and there: and those that remained with him, being fewe in number, and hauing many enemies to fight withall, dyd hardly withstand their force and charge. But his brother Timoleon seeing him in suche instant daunger a farre off, ranne with all speede possible to helpe him, and clapping his target before his brother Timophanes, that laye on the grounde, receyving many woundes on his bodie with sword and arrowes, with great difficultie he repulled F the enemies, and saved his owne and his brothers life. Now the CORINTHIANS, fearing their like matter to come that before had happened vnto them, which was to lose their citie through default of their friends helpe: they resolved in counsell, to entertaine in paye continually foure hundred souldiers that were strangers, whom they assigned ouer to Timophanes charge. VVho, abandoning all honestie and regarde of the trust reposed in him, dyd presently practise all the wayes he could to make him selfe lorde of the citie: and hauing put diuers of the chiefe citizens to death without order of lawe, in the ende, he openly proclaimed him selfe King. Timoleon being very forie for this, and taking his brothers wickednes would be the very high waye to his fall and destruction: sought first to winne him with all the good words and persuation he could to moue him to leaue his ambitious desire to reigne, and to false (as neere as might be) his harde dealing with the citizens. Timophanes set light by his brothers persuations, and would geue no care vnto them. Thereupon Timoleon then went vnto one Aeschylus his friend, and brother vnto Timophanes wife, and to one Satyrus a soothesayer (as Theopompus the historiographer calleth him, and Ephorus calleth him Orthagoras) with whom he came againe another time vnto his brother: and they three coming to him, instantly be- fought him to beleue good counsell, and to leaue the Kingdome. Timophanes at the first dyd but laughe them to scorne, and sported at their persuations: but afterwards he waxed warme, and grew into great chollier with them. Timoleon seeing that, went a litle to aside, and couering his face fell a weeping: and in the meane season, the other two drawing out their iwordes, slue Timophanes in the place. This murder was straight blown abroad through the citie, and the better sorte did greatly commend the noble minde and hate Timoleon bare against the tyrante considering that he being of a gentle nature, and louing to his kinne, dyd notwithstanding re- gard the benefit of his cuntrye, before the naturall affection to his brother, and preferred duety and iustice, before nature and kinned. For, before he had saued his brothers life, fighting for defence of his cuntrye: and now in seeking to make him selfe King, and to rule the same, he made him to be slaine. Suche then as misliked popular government and libertie, and al- wayes followed the Nobilitie: they set a good face of the matter, as though they had bene glad of the tyrantes death. Yet still reprobuing Timoleon for the horrible murder he had committed against his brother, declaring howe detestable it was both to the gods and men: they fo hand- led him, that it grieved him to the harte he had done it. But when it was told him that his mo- ther tooke it maruelous euill, and that she pronounced horrible curses against him, and gave out terrible wordes of him, he went vnto her in hope to comfort her: howbeit she could ne- uer abide to see him, but allwayes shut her doore against him. Then he being wounded to the harte with sorowe, tooke a conceit sodainly to kill him selfe by absteyning from meate: but his friends would neuer forsake him in this despaire, and vrged him so farre by intreaty and per- suasion, that they compelled him to eate. Thereupon he resolved thenceforth to giue him selfe ouer to a solitary life in the cuntrye, secluding him selfe from all companie and dealings so as at the beginning, he dyd not only refuse to repaire vnto the citie, and all accesse of com- panie, but wandring vp and downe in most solitarie places, consumed him selfe and his time with melancholie. And thus we see, that counsell and iudgements are lightly caried away (by prayre or disprayre) if they be not shored vp with rule of reason, and philosophie, and not confounded in them selues. And therefore it is very requisite and necessarie, that not only the acte be good and honest of it selfe, but that the resolution thereof be also constant, and not subiect vnto chaunge: to the ende we maye doe all things considerately. Left we be like vnto li- kerous mowthd men, who as they desire meates with a greedy appetite, and after are sore weary, disliking the same: euen so we do suddenly repent our actions, grounded vpon a weak imagination, of the honestie that moued vs thereunto. For repentance maketh the acte, which before was good, naught. But determination, grounded vpon certaine knowledge and truthe of reason, doth neuer chaunge, although the matter enterprised, haue not allwayes happy successe. And therefore Phocion the ATHENIAN hauing resisted (as muche as in him laye) certain things which the generall Leoitheues dyd, and which contrarie to his minde tooke good effect: and perceiving the ATHENIANS dyd open sacrifice vnto the goddess, to geue them thanks for the same, and muche reioyce at the victorie they had obtained, I would haue reioyced to (sayd he) if I had done this: but so would I not for any thing, but I had geuen the counsell. And after that sorte, but more sharply dyd Aristides LOCRIAN (a very friend and companion of Platoes) answer Diomyssus the elder, tyrante of SYRACUSA: who asked his

A goodwill to marie one of his daughters. I had rather see my daughter deade (sayd he) then married vnto a tyranne. And within a certayne tyme after, the tyranne put all his sonnes to death: and then he asked him in derision, to greue him the more, if he were still of his former opinion for the marrying of his daughter. I am very forye, (sayd he) with all my harte, for that thou hast done: but yet I doe not repent me of that I haue sayd. That peraduenture proceeded of a more perfect vertue. But to returne againe to Timoleon. Whether that in- ward sorowe strooke him to the harte for the death of his brother, or that shame did so- bash him, as he durst not abide his mother: twenty yeares after, he neuer did any notable or famous acte. And therefore, when he was named to be generall of the ayde that should be sent into SICILE, the people hauing willingly chosen and accepted of him: Tyrsidides, who was chiefe gouernour at that time in the citie of CORINTHE, standing vpon his feete before the people, spake vnto Timoleon, and did exhort him to behaue him selfe like an honest man, and valiant Capitaine in his charge. For, sayd he, if you handle your selfe well, we will thinke you haue killed a tyranne: but if you doe order your selfe otherwise then well, we will iudge you haue killed your brother. Nowe Timoleon being blisse in leauing of men, and prepa- ring him selfe: letters came to the CORINTHIANS from Ietes, whereby plainly appeared, that Ietes had caried two faces in one hooide, and that he was become a traitor. For he had no sooner dispatched his Ambassadors vnto them, but he straight tooke the CARTHAGI- NIANS parte, and dealt openly for them, intending to driue out Diomyssus, and to make him selfe King of SYRACUSA. But fearing least the CORINTHIANS would send ayde before he C had wrought his feate: he wrote againe vnto the CORINTHIANS, sending them worde, that they shoulde not neede nowe to put them selues to any charge or danger for coming into SICILE, and specially, because the CARTHAGINIANS were very angrie, and did also lye in waye in the way as they shoulde come, with a great flecte of shippes to meete with their armie: and that for him selfe, because he sawe they taried long, he had made league and amitie with them, against the tyranne Diomyssus. When they had red his letters, if any of the CORINTHIANS were before but coldely affected to this iorney, chollier did then so warme them a- gainst Ietes, that they frankly graunted Timoleon what he would aske, and did helpe to fur- nish him to set him out. When the shippes were ready rigged, and that the souldiers were furnished of all things necessary for their departure, the Nunnes of the goddesse Proserpina D sayd, they sawe a vision in their dreame, and that the goddesse Ceres and Proserpina did ap- peare vnto them, apparelled like trauellers to take a iorney: and tolde them, that they would goe with Timoleon into SICILE. Apon this speache onely, the CORINTHIANS rigged a galley, they called, the galley of Ceres and Proserpina: and Timoleon him selfe before he would take the seas, went into the citie of DELPHES, where he made sacrifice vnto Apollo. And as he entered within the Sanctuarie where the aunswers of the Oracle are made, there happened a wonderfull signe vnto him. For amongst the vowes and offerings that are hangd vppe vpon the walles of the Sanctuarie, there fell a bande directly vpon Timoleon's heade, imbrodered all about with crownes of victorie: so that it seemed Apollo sent him already crowned, before he had let out one foote towards the iorney. He tooke E shippe, and sayled with seuen gallyes of CORINTHE, two of CORPHE, and tenne the LEVCIANS did set out. When he was launched out in the mayne sea, hauing a francke gale of winde and large, he thought in the night that the element did open, and that out of the same there came a maruelous great bright light ouer his shippe, and it was much like to a torch burning, when they shewe the ceremonies of the holy mysteries. This torch did accompanie and guide them all their voyage, and in the ende it vanished away, and seemed to fall downe vpon the coast of ITALY, where the Shippemasters had deter- mined to arrive. The wise mens opinions being asked what this might signifie, they an- swered. That this wonderfull sight did betoken the dreame, the Nunnes of the goddesse Ceres dreamed, and that the goddesse fauoring this iorney, had shewed them the waye, F by sending of this light from heauen: because that the Ile of SICILE is consecrated vnto the goddesse Proserpina, and specially for that they reporte her rauishment was in that Ile, and that the whole realme was assigned vnto her for her ioynter, at the day of her mariage.

Thus did this celestiall signe of the goddess bothe encourage those that went this iorney, and deliuer them also assured hope, who sayled with all possible speede they coule: vntill such time, as hauing crossed the seas, they arriued vpon the coast of ITALIE. But when they came thither, the newes they vnderstoode from SICILE put Timoleon in great perplexitie, and did maruelously discourage the souldiers he brought with him. For Iscetes hauing ouerthrowe the battell of the tyranne DIONYSIVS, and possessed the greatest parte of the citie of SYRACUSA: he did beleage him within the castell, and within that parte of the citie which is called the Ile, where he had pent him vp, and inclosed him in with walles rounde about. And in the meane time he had prayed the CARTHAGINIANS, that they would be carefull to keepe Timoleon from landing in SICILE, to the ende that by preventing that ayde, they might easily deuide SICILE betwene them, and no man to let them. The CARTHAGINIANS following his request, sent twenty of their gallyes vnto RHEGIO, amonge which Iscetes Ambassadors were sent to Timoleon, with testimonie of his doings: for they were sayer flattering wordes, to cloke his wicked intent he purposed. For they willed Timoleon he shoulde goe him selfe alone (if he thought good) vnto Iscetes, to counsell him, and to accompanie him in all his doings, which were nowe so farre onwarde in good towardsness, as he had almost ended them all. Furthermore, they did also perswade him, he shoulde send backe his shippes and souldiers to CORINTHE agayne, considering that the warre was nowe brought to good passe, and that the CARTHAGINIANS woulde in no case that his men should passe into SICILE, and that they were determined to fight with them, if they made any force to enter. So the CORINTHIANS at their arriuall into the citie of RHEGIO, finding there C these Ambassadors, and seeing the flecte of the CARTHAGINIANS shippes, which did ryde at ancker not farre of from them: it spyted them on the one side to see they were thus mocked and abused by Iscetes. For euery one of them were maruelous angrye with him, and were greatly afeard also for the poore SYCILIANS, whome to playnely they sawe left a praye vnto Iscetes for rewarde of his treason, and to the CARTHAGINIANS for recompence of the tyrannie, which they suffered him to establish. So on the other side they thought it impossible to conquer the shippes of the CARTHAGINIANS, which laye in wayte for them, and so neare vnto them: considering they were twyfe as many in number as they, and hard for them to subdue the armie also that was in the handes of Iscetes in SICILE, considering that they were not come to him, but onely for the mayntenance of the warres. Notwithstanding, Timoleon spake very curteously vnto those Ambassadors, and captaynes of the CARTHAGINIANS shippes, letting them vnderstande that he would doe as much as they would haue him: and to say truly, if he woulde haue done otherwise, he could haue wonne nothing by it. Neuertheles he desired for his discharge, they woulde say that openly, in the presence of the people of RHEGIO, (being a citie of GRECE, friend and common to both parties) which they had spoken to him in secrete: and that done, he woulde departe incontinently, alledging that it stode him very much vpon for the safetie of his discharge, and that they them selues also shoulde more faithfully keepe that they promised vnto him touching the SYRACVSANS, when they had agreed vpon it, and promised it, before all the people of RHEGIO, who should be witnes of it. Now all this was but a fetche and policie deliuered by him, E to shadowe his departure, which the Captaynes and gouerners of RHEGIO did fauor, and seeme to helpe him in: bicause they wished SICILE should fall into the handes of the CORINTHIANS, and feared much to haue the barbarous people for their neighbours. For this cause they commaunded a generall assembly of all the people, during which tyme, they caused the gates of the citie to be shut: geuing it out, that it was bicause the Citizens should not goe about any other matters in the meane time. Then when all the people were assembled, they beganne to make long orations without concluding any matter: the one leauing alwayes to the other a like matter to talke of, to the ende they might winne time, vntill the gallyes of the CORINTHIANS were departed. And staying the CARTHAGINIANS also in this assembly, they mistrusted nothing, bicause they sawe Timoleon present: who made a countenance, F as though he woulde ryse to say something. But in the meane tyme, some one did secretly aduertise Timoleon, that the other gallyes were vnder sayle, and gone their waye, and that there

A there was but one galley left, which taried for him in the haue. Thereupon he sodainly stole away through the prease, with the helpe of the RHEGIANS, being about the chayer where the orations were made: and trudging quickly to the haue, he embarked incontinently, and hoped faste also. And when he had ouertaken his flecte, they went all safe together to lande at the citie of TAVROMENTION, which is in SICILE: there they were very well receiued by Andromachus, who long before had sent for them, for he gouerned this citie, as if he had bene Lorde thereof. He was the father of Timon the Historiographer, the honestest man of all those that did beare rule at that time in all SICILE. For he did rule his Citizens, in all iustice and equitie, and did alwayes shew him selfe an open enemy of tyrans. And following his affection therein, he lent his citie at that time vnto Timoleon, to gather people together, and perswaded his Citizens to enter into league with the CORINTHIANS, and to ayde them, to deliuer SICILE from bondage, and to restore it againe to libertie. But the captaynes of the CARTHAGINIANS that were at RHEGIO, when they knewe that Timoleon was vnder sayle and gone, after the assembling of the counsell was broken vpe: they were ready to cate their fingers for spyte, to see them selues thus finely mocked and deceived. The RHEGIANS on the other side, were mery at the matter, to see howe the PHENICIANS storied at it, that they had such a fine parte played them. Howbeit in the ende, they determined to send an Ambassador vnto TAVROMENTION, in one of their gallyes. This Ambassador spake very boldly, and barbarously vnto Andromachus, and in a choller: and last of all, he shewed him first the palme of his hande, then the backe of his hande, and did threaten him that his citie shoulde be so turned C ouer hand, if he did not quickly send away the CORINTHIANS. Andromachus fell laughing at him, and did turne his hande vpe and downe as the Ambassador had done, and bad him that he shoulde get him going, and that with speede out of his citie, if he woulde not see the keele of his galley turned vpwart. Iscetes nowe vnderstanding of Timoleon's coming, and being affrayed, sent for a great number of gallyes vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. Then the SYRACVSANS beganne to despayre vterly, when they sawe their haue full of the CARTHAGINIANS gallyes, the best parte of their citie kept by Iscetes, and the castell by the tyrannus Dionysius. And on thother side, that Timoleon was not yet come but to a litle corner of SICILE, hauing no more but the litle citie of TAVROMENTION, with a small power, and lesse hope: bicause there was not about a thousand footemen in all, to furnishe these warres, D neither prouision of vittells, nor so much money as woulde serue to entertayne and pay them. Besides also, that the other cities of SICILE did nothing trust him. But by reason of the violent extorcions they had alate suffered, they hated all Captaynes and leaders of men of warre to the deathe, and specially for the trecherie of Calippus and Pharax, whereof the one was an ATHENIAN, and the other a LACEDÆMONIAN. Both of them layed they came to set SICILE at libertie, and to driue out the tyrans: and yet neuertheles they had done so much hurte vnto the poore SYCILIANS, that the miserie and calamitie which they had suffered vnder the tyrans, seemed all to be golde vnto them, in respect of that which the Captaynes had made them to abyde. And they did not thinke them more happy, that had willingly submitted them selues vnto the yoke of seruitude: then those which they sawe restored, and set at libertie. Therefore perswading them selues, that this CORINTHIAN woulde be no better vnto them, then the other had bene before, but supposing they were the selfe same former craftes, and alluring baytes of good hope and fayer wordes, which they had tasted of before, to drawe them to accept newe tyrans: they did fore suspect it, and reiected all the CORINTHIANS perswasions. Sauer the ADRANIANS onely, whose litle citie being consecrated to the god Adranus, (and greatly honored and reuerenced through all SICILE) was then in dissention one against another: in so muche as one parte of them tooke parte with Iscetes, and the CARTHAGINIANS, and an other side of them sent vnto Timoleon. So it fortun'd, that bothe the one and the other, making all the possible speede they coule, who shoulde come first: arriued bothe in manner at one selfe tyme. F Iscetes had about fise thousand souldiers, Timoleon had not in all, about twelue hundred men, with the which he departed to goe towards the citie of ADRANVS, distant from TAVROMENTION, about three hundred and fortie furlonges. For the first dayes iorney, he went no great way, but lodged betimes: but the next morning he marched very hastily, & had mar-uelous ill way. When night was come, and day light shut in, he had newes that Ietes did but newly arrive before ADRANVS, where he encamped. When the priuate captaines vnderstood this, they caused the vaward to stay, to eate & repose a litle, that they might be the lustier, & the stronger to fight. But Timoleon did not still forwards, & prayed them not to stay, but to go on with all the speede they could possible, that they might take their enemies out of order (as it was likely they should) being but newly arriued, & troubled with making their cabbons, & preparing for supper. Therewithall as he spake these wordes, he tooke his target on his arme, and marched him selfe the foremost man, as brauely and coragiously as if he had gon to a most assured victorie. The souldiers seeing him marche with that life; they followed at his heeles with like corage. So they had not passing thirty furlonges to goe, when they had ouercomen, they straight fey upon their enemies, whom they found all out of order, and began to flye, so loone as they saw they were vpon their backs before they were aware. By this meanes there were not about three hundred men slayne, and twice as many moe taken prisoners, and so their whole campe was possessed. Then the ADRANITANS opening their gates, yielded vnto Timeleon, declaring vnto him with great feare, and no lesse wonder, how at the very time when he gaue charge among the enemies, the dore of the temple of their god opened of them selues, & that the laueling which the Image of their god did hold in his hand, did shake at the very end where the iron head was, and how all his face was seene to sweate. This (in my opinion) did not only signifie the victorie he had gotten at that time, but all the notable employes he did afterwardes, vnto the which, this first encounter gaue a happy beginning. For immediately after, many cities sent vnto Timoleon, to ioine in league with him. And Mamercus, the ty-ran of CATANA, and very full of money, did also seeke his friendship. Furthermore, Dionysius the tyrann of SYRACUSA, being weary to follow hope any longer, and finding him selfe in manner forced vnto it by long continuance of seige: made no more reckoning of Ietes, when he knewe that he was so shamefully ouerthrowen. And contrariwise, much esteeming Timoleons valiantnes, he sent to aduertise him, that he was contented to yelde him selfe and the castell into the handes of the CORINTHIANS. Timoleon being glad of this good happe vnlooked for, sent Eucledes and Telemachus, two Captaines of the CO-RINTHIANS, to take possession of the castell, with fowre hundred men, not all at a tyme, nor openly (for it was vnpossible, the enemies lying in wayte in the hauen) but by small companies, and by stelte, he conueyed them all into the castell. So the souldiers possessed the castell, and the tyrans pallace, with all the moueables and munition of warres within the same. There were a great number of horse of seruice, great store of staues and weapons of feruice of all sortes, and engynes of batterie to thoothe farre of, and sundry other weapons of defence, that had bene gathered together of long tyme, to arme three score and tenne thousand men. Moreouer, besides all this, there were two thousand souldiers, whome with all the other things rehearsed, Dionysius deliuered vp into the handes of Timoleon: and he him selfe, with his money and a few of his friends, went his way by sea, Ietes not knowing it, and so came to Timoleons campe. This was the first tyme that euer they sawe Dionysius a priuate man, in base and meane estate. And yet within fewe dayes after, Timoleon lent him from thence vnto CORINTHE in a shippe, with litle store of money. Who was borne and brought up in the greatest and most famous tyrannie, and kingdom, conquered by force, that euer was in the world: and which him selfe had kept by the space of tenne yeares after the death of his father. Since Dion draue him out, he had bene maruelously turmoyled in warres, by the space of twelue yeares: in which time, although he had done much mischief, yet he had suffered also a great deale more. For he sawe the death of his sonnes when they were men growen, and able to serue and cary armor. He saw his daughters rauished by force, & deflow-red of their virginite. He saw his owne sister (who was also his wife) first of all shamed, & cruelly handled in her person, with the greatest villanies & most vile partes done vnto her, that his enemies could deuise: & afterwardes horribly murdered with his childre, & their bodies in the end throwen into the sea, as we haue more amply declared in the life of Dion. Now when Dionysius was arriued in the citie of CORINTHE, euery GRACIAN was wonderfull desirous

A to go see him, and to talke with him. And some went thither very glad of his ouerthrow, as if they had troden him downe with their feete, whom fortune had ouerthrowen, so bitterly did they hate him. Other pittying him in their heartes, to see so great a change, did behold him as it were with a certaine compassion, considering what great power, secret and diuine causes haue ouer mens weakenes and frailtie, and those things that daily passeth ouer our heades.
For the world then, did neuer bring forth any worke of nature, or of mans hand so wonderfull, as was this fortune. Who made the world see a man, that before was in manner Lorde and King of all SICILE, sit then commonly in the citie of CORINTHE, talking with a vaitaler, or sitting a whole day in a perfumers shopp, or commonly drinking in some celler or tauerne, or to brawle and scold in the midst of the streetes, with common whores in face of the world, or els to teach common minstrels in euery lane & alley, and to dispute with them with the belt reason he had, about the harmony & musike, of the songs they sang in the THEATERS.
Now some say he did this, because he knew not els how he should driue the time away, for that in dede he was of a base mynde, and an effeminate person, giuen ouer to all dishonest lusts and desires. Other are of opinion, he did it to be the lesse regarded, for feare left the CORINTHIANS should haue him in gealouzy and suspicion, Imagining that he did take the change and state of his lyfe in grieuous part, and that he should yet looke backe, hoping for a tyme to recouer his state againe: and that for this cause he did it, and of purpose fained many things against his nature, seeming to be a starke nideotte, to see him do those things he did. Some notwithstanding haue gathered together certaine of his answers, which doe testifie that he did not all these things of a base brutish mynde, but to fite himselfe only to his present misery and misfortune. For when he came to LEUCADES, an ancient citie built by the CORINTHIANS, as was also the city of SYRACUSA: he told the inhabitants of the same, that he was like to yong boyes that had done a fault. For as they flye from their fathers being ashamed to come in their sight, & are gladder to be with their brethren: euo so it is with me, said he: for it would please me better to dwell here with you, then to go to CORINTHE our head city. Another tyme, being at CORINTHE, a stranger was very bulie with him, (knowing how familiar Dionysius was with learned men and Philosphers, while he reigned in SYRACUSA) and asked him in the ende in derision: what benefite he got by Platoes wilddome and knowledge? he answered him againe: how thinkest thou, hath it done me no good, whe thou seest me beare so patiently this change of fortune? Aristoxenus a musitian, and other, asking him what offence Plato had done vnto him: he answered. That tyransfate is euer vnfortunate, and subiect to many euills: but yet no euill in their state was comparable to this. That none of all those they take to be their most familiars, dare once tell them truly any thing: and that through their fault, he left Platoes company. Another tyme there cometh a pleasaunt fellow to him, and thinking to mocke him finely, as he entred into his chamber, he shooke his gowne, as the manner is when they come to tyrans, to shewe that they haue no weapons vnder their gownes. But Dionysius encountered him as pleasauntly, saying to him: do that whe thou goest hence, to see if thou hast stollē nothing.
And again, Philip King of MACEDON, at his table one day disciddē into talke of songs, verlic and tragedies, which Dionysius his father had made, making as though he wondered at the, how E possibly he could haue leisure to do them: he answered him very trimly, and to good purpose.
He did them euen at such tymes (quod he) as you and I, and all other great Lodes whom they reken happy, are disposed to be drunke, & play the foolles. Now for Plato, he neuer saw Dionysius at CORINTHE. But Diogenes Sinopian, the first tyme that euer he met with Dionysius, sayd vnto him. O, how vnworthy art thou of this state. Dionysius stayed sodainely, and replied: Truly I thanke thee (Diogenes) that thou hast compassion of my milery. Why sayd Diogenes again: Doeest thou thinke I pity thee? Nay it pitieth me rather to see such a flauie as thou (worthy to dye in the wicked state of a tyrant like thy father) to lyue in such securitie, and idle lyfe, as thou ledest amongst vs. VVhen I came to compare these wordes of Diogenes, with Philistus wordes the Historiographer, bewailing the harde fortune of the daughters of the F LAPTINES, saying that they were brought from the toppe of all worldly felicity, honor, and goodes, (whereof tyrannicall state aboundeth) vnto a base, priuate, and humble life: me thinks they are the proper lamentations of a woman, that forsooth for the losse of her boxes of painting cullers, or for her purple gownes, or for other such pretty fine trimmes of golde, as women vse to weare. So, me thinkes these things I haue intermingled concerning Diomyus, are not impartinent to the description of our liues, neither are they troublefome nor vnprofitable to the hearers, onely they haue other hasty busines to let or trouble them. But now if the tyrant Diomyus wretched state seeme strange, Timoleon's prosperitie then was no lesse wonderfull. For within fiftie dayes after he had set foote in SICILE, he had the castell of SYRACUSA in his possession, and sent Diomyus as an exile to CORINTE. This did let the CORINTHIANS in such a iollitie, that they sent him a supply of two thousand footemen, and two hundred horsemen, which were appointed to land in ITALIE, in the countrie of the THYRIANS. And perceyuing that they could not possiblie goe from thence into SICILE, because the CARTHAGINIANS kept the seas with a great naue of shippes, and that thereby they were compelled to staye for better opportunitie: in the meane time they bestowed their leysure in doing a notable good acte. For the THYRIANS, being in warres at that time with the BRITIANS, they dyd put their citie into their hands, which they kept very faithfully and friendly, as it had bene their owne native countrie. Ietes all this while dyd besiege the castell of SYRACUSA, preuenting all he could possiblie, that there should come no come by sea vnto the CORINTHIANS that kept within the castell: and he had hiered two straunge souldiers, which he sent vnto the citie of ADRANTIS, to kill Timoleon by treason, who kept no garde about his persone, and continued amongst the ADRANTIS, mistrusting nothing in the world, for the trust and confidence he had in the safeguard of the god of the ADRANTIS. These souldiers being sent to do this murder, were by chance enformed that Timoleon should one day do sacrifice vnto this god. So upon this, they came into the temple, hauing daggers vnder their gownes, & by litle and litle thrust in through the prease, that they got at the length hard to the altar. But at the present time as one encouraged another to dispatche the matter, a third person they thought not of, gaue one of the two a great cut in the head with his sword, that he fell to the ground. The man that had hurte him thus, fled straight vpon it, with his sword drawn in his hande, and recovered the topp of a highe rocke. The other souldier that came with him, and that was not hurte, got holde of a corner of the altar, and besought pardon of Timoleon, and told him he would discouer the treason practised against him. Timoleon thereupon pardoned him. Then he tolde him howe his companion that was slaine, and him selfe, were both hiered, and sent to kill him. In the meane time, they brought him also that had taken the rocke, who cried out alowde, he had done no more then he should doe: for he had killed him that had slaine his owne father before, in the citie of the LEONTINES. And to iustifie this to be true, certaine that stood by dyd affirme, it was so in deede. Whereat they wondered greatly to consider the maruelous working of fortune, howe she doth bring one thing to passe by meanes of another, & gathereth all things together, howe farre a sonder locuer they be, & linketh them together, though they seeme to be cleane contrary one to another, with no manner of likenes or coniunction betwene them, making the ende of the one, to be the beginning of another. The CORINTHIANS examining this matter thoroughly, gaue him that slue the souldier with his sword, a crowne of the value of tenne minas, because that by meanes of his iuste anger, he had done good seruice to the God that had preserued Timoleon. And furthermore, this good hadde dyd not only serue the present turne, but was to good purpose euer after. For those that sawe it, were putte in better hope, and had thenceforth more care and regard vnto Timoleons persone, because he was a holy man, one that loued the goddes, and that was purposely sent to deliuer SICILE from captiuitie. But Ietes hauing missed his first purpose, and seeing numbers daylie drawn to Timoleons deuotion: he was mad with him self, that hauing so great an armie of the CARTHAGINIANS at hand at his commaundement, he tooke but a fewe of them to serue his turne, as if he had bene ashamed of his acte, and had fed their friendship by stelh. So he sent hereupon for Mago their generall, with all his fleet. Mago at his request brought an huge armie to see to, of a hundred and fiftie saile, which occupied and couered all the haue: and afterwards landed three score thousand men, whom he lodged euery man within the citie of SYRACUSA. Then euery man imagined the time was now come, which olde men had threatned SICILE with many yeres before, and that continually usually: that one day it should be conquered, and inhabited by the barbarous people. For in all the warres the CARTHAGINIANS euer had before in the countrie of SICILE, they could neuer come to take the citie of SYRACUSA: and then through Ietes treason, who had receyued them, they were scene encamped there. On the other side, the CORINTHIANS that were within the castell, founde them selues in great distresse, because their vittells waxed scant, and the haue was so straightly kept. Moreover, they were driuen to be armed continually to defend the walles, which the enemies battered, and assailed in sundry places, with all kyndes of engines of batterrie, and sundry sortes of deuised instruments and inuentions to take cities: by reason whereof, they were compelled also to deuide them selues into many companies. Nevertheless, Timoleon without gaue them all the ayde he could possiblie: sending them come from CATANA, in litle fisher botes and small crayers, which got into the castell many times, but specially in storme and fowle weather, passing by the gallyes of the barbarous people, that laye scatteringly one from another, dispersed abroad by tempest, and great billowes of the sea. But Mago and Ietes finding this, determined to goe take the citie of CATANA, from whence those of the castell of SYRACUSA were vittelled: and taking with them the best souldiers of all their armie, they departed from SYRACUSA, and sayled towards CATANA. Nowe in the meane space, Leon CORINTHIAN, captaine of all those that were within the castell, perceyuing the enemies within the citie kept but slender warde: made a sodaine sallie out upon them, and taking them vnwares, slue a great number at the first charge, and draue awaye the other. So by this occasion he wanne a quarter of the citie, which they call ACRADINA, and was the best parte of the citie, that had receyued least hurte. For the citie of SYRACUSA seemeth to be built of many townes ioyned together. So hauing found there great plenty of come, golde, and siluer, he would not forsake that quarter no more, nor returne againe into the castell: but fortifying with all diligence the compasse and precinct of the same, and ioyning vnto the castell with certain fortifications he built vp in haste, he determined to keepe both the one and the other. Now were Mago and Ietes very neere vnto CATANA, when a post ouertooke them, purposely sent from SYRACUSA vnto them: who brought them newes, that the ACRADINA was taken. Whereat they both wondered, and returned backe againe with all speede possiblie (hauing failed of their purpose they pretended) to keepe that they had yet left in their handes. Now for that matter, it is yet a question, whether we should impute it vnto D wisdomed and valliance, or vnto good fortune: but the thing I will tell you now, in my opinion, is altogether to be ascribed vnto fortune. And this it is. The two thousand footemen and two hundred horsemen of the CORINTHIANS, that remained in the citie of the THYRIANS, partly for feare of the gallyes of the CARTHAGINIANS that laye in wayte for them as they should passe, Hanno being their admiral: and partly also for that the sea was very rough and highe many dayes together, and was allwayes in storme and tempest: in the ende, they ventured to goe through the countrie of the BRITIANS. And partly with their good will (but rather by force) they got through, and recovered the citie of REGGIO, the sea being yet maruelous highe and rough. Hanno the admiral of the CARTHAGINIANS, looking no more then for their passage, thought with him selfe that he had deuised a maruelous fine policie, to deceyue the enemies. Thereupon he willed all his men to put garlands of flowers of triumphe vpon their heades, and therewithall also made them dresse vp, and fer forth his gallyes, with targets, corselets, and brigantines after the GRECIANS facion. So in this brauery he returned backe againe, sailing towards SYRACUSA, & came in with force of owers, rowing vnder the castells side of SYRACUSA, with great laughing, and clapping of hands: crying out alowde to them that were in the castell, that he had ouerthrowen their ayde which came from CORINTE, as they thought to passe by the coast of ITALIE into SICILE, flattering them selues, that this dyd muche discourage those that were besieged. But whilst he sported thus with his sonde deuise, the two thousand CORINTHIANS being arriued through the countrie of the BRITIANS in the citie of REGGIO, perceyuing the coaste cleare, and that the passage by sea was not kept, & that the raging seas were by miracle (as it were) made of purpose calme for them: they tooke seas forthwith in such fisher boates & passengers as they found readie, in the which they went into SICILE, in such good safety, as they drue their horse (holding them by the raynes) alone-

get their boates with them. When they were all passed ouer, Timoleon hauing receiued them, A went immediatly to take Messina, and marching thence in battell raye, tooke his way to- wards Syracusa, trusting better to his good fortune, then to his force he had: for his whole number in all, were not aboue foure thousand fighting men. Notwithstanding, Mago hearing of his comming, quaked for feare, & doted the more vpon this occasion. About Syracusa are certeyne marishes, that receiue great quantitie of sweete fresh water, aswell of fountaynes and springes, as also of litle running brookes, lakes, & riuers, which runne that wayes towards the sea: and therefore there are great store of eeles in that place, and the fishing is great there at all tymes, but specially for such as delite to take eeles. Whereuppon the Grecians that tooke paye on both sides, when they had leysure, and that all was quiet betwene them, they intended fishing. Now, they being all contrey men, and of one language, had no priuate quarrell one with another: but when tyme was to fight, they did their duties, and in tyme of peace also frequented familiarly together, and one spake with an other, and specially when they were busie fishing for eeles: saying, that they marvelled at the scituation of the goodly places thereabouts, and that they flooked to pleasantly and commodious apon the sea side. So one of the souldiers that serued vnder the Corinthians, chaunced to lay vnto them. Is it possible that you that be Grecians borne, and haue so goodly a citie of your owne, & full of so many goodly commodities: that ye will giue it vpp vnto these barbarous people, the vile Carthaginians, and most cruell murderers of the worlde? where you should rather wille that there were many Sicilies betwixt them and Greece. Haue ye so litle consideration or iudgement to thinke, that they haue assembled an armie out of all Africke, vnto Hercules C pillars, and to the sea Atlantick, to come hether to fight to stablish Ietes tyrannie? who, if he had bene a wise and skillfull Captaine, would not haue cast out his auncestors & founders, to bringe into his contrie the auncient enemies of the same: but might haue receiued such honor and authoritie of the Corinthians and Timoleon, as he could reasonably haue desired, and that with all their fauor and good wil. The souldiers that heard this tale, reported it agayne in their campe: In somuch they made Mago suspect there was treason in hand, and so sought some culler to be gon. But hereuppon, notwithstanding that Ietes prayed him all he could to tary, declaring vnto him how much they were stronger then their enemies, and that Timoleon did rather preuayle by his hardines and good fortune, then excede him in number of men: yet he hoied sayle, and returned with shame enough into Africke, letting slyppe the conquest of all Sicile out of his hands, without any fight of reason or cause at all. The next day after he was gone, Timoleon presented battell before the citie, when the Grecians and he vnderstoode that the Carthaginians were fled, and that they saw the hauey ryd of all the shippes: and then beganne to least at Magos cowardlines, and in derision proclaimed in the citie, that they would giue him a good reward that could bringe them newes, whether the armie of the Carthaginians were fled. But for all this, Ietes was bent to fight, & would not leaue the spoyle he had gotten, but defende the quarters of the citie he had possessed, at the swordes poynt, trusting to the strength and scituation of the places, which were hardly to be approached. Timoleon perceyuing that, deuised his armie, and he with one parte thereof did sett vpon that side which was the hardest to approche, and did stand vpon the riuier of Anapus E: then he appointed an other part of his armie to assault all at one time, the side of Acadina, whereof Istus Corinthian had the leading. The third part of his armie that came last from Corinthe, which Dinarchus and Demaratus led: he appointed to assault the quarter called Epipoles. Thus, assault being giuen on all sides at one time, Ietes bandes of men were broken, and ranne their way. Now that the citie was thus wonne by assault, and come so sodainly to the handes of Timoleon, and the enemies being fled: it is good reason we ascribe it to the valiantnes of the souldiers, and the capitaines great wisdom. But where there was not one Corinthian slayne, nor hurt in this assault: sure me thinkes herein, it was onely the worke and deede of fortune, that did fauor and protect Timoleon, to contende against his valiantnes. To the ende that those which should hereafter heare of his doings, should haue more occasion to wonder at his good happe: then to prayse and commend his valiantnes. For the fame of this great exploitte, did in fewe dayes not onely runne through all Italye, but also through

A through all Greece. In somuch as the Corinthians, (who could scant belecue their men were passed with safetie into Sicile) vnderstoode withall that they were safely arriued there, and had gotten the victorie of their enemies: so prosperous was their iorney, & fortune so speedily did fauor his noble actes. Timoleon hauing now the castell of Syracusa in his hands, did not followe Dion. For he spared not the castell for the beawtie and stately building thereof, but auoyding the suspicion that caused Dion first to be accused, and lastly to be slayne: he caused it to be proclaimed by trompett, that any Syracusan whatsoeuer, should come with crowes of iron, and mattocks, to helpe to digge downe and ouerthrow the forte of the tyrans. There was not a man in all the citie of Syracusa, but went thither straight, and thought that proclamation and day to be a most happy beginning, of the recouerie of their libertie. So they did not onely ouerthrowe the castell, but the pallace also, and the tombes: and generally all that serued in any respect for the memorie of any of the tyrans. And hauing cleared the place in fewe dayes, and made all playne: Timoleon at the sute of the Citizens, made counsell halls, and places of iustice to be built there: and did by this meanes establish a free state and popular gouernment, and did suppress all tyrannicall power. Nowe, when he sawe he had wonne a citie that had no inhabitants, which warres before had consumed, and feare of tyrannie had emptied, so as grassie grew to highe and rancke in the great markett place of Syracusa, as they grafed their horses there, and the horsekeepers laye downe by them on the grasse as they fed: and that all the cities, a fewe excepted, were full of redde deare and wilde bores, so that men geuen to delite in hunting, hauing leysure, might finde game many tymes within the suburbs C and towne dytches, hard by the walles: and that such as dwelt in castells and stronge holdes in the contrie, would not leaue them, to come and dwell in cities, by reason they were all grown so stowte, and did so hate and detest assemblies of counsell, orations, and order of gouernment, where so many tyrans had reigned. Timoleon thereuppon seeing this desolacion, and also so fewe Syracusan borne that had escaped, thought good, and all his Capitaines, to write to the Corinthians, to send people out of Greece to inhabit the citie of Syracusa agayne. For otherwise the contrie would growe barren and vnprofitable, if the grounde were not plowed. Besides, that they looked also for great warres out of Africke: being aduertised that the Carthaginians had hongevp the body of Mago their general vpon a crosse (who had slayne him selfe for that he could not aunswere the dishonor layd to his charge) and that D they did leaue another great nightie armie, to returne againe the next yere following, to make warres in Sicile. These letters of Timoleon being brought vnto Corinthe, and the Embassadors of Syracusa being arriued with them also, who besought the people to take care and protection ouer their poore citie, and that they would once againe be fownders of the same: the Corinthians did not greedily desire to be Lordes of so goodly and great a citie, but first proclaimed by the trompett in all the assemblies, solemne feastes, and common playes of Greece, that the Corinthians hauing destroyed the tyrannie that was in the citie of Syracusa, and driuen out the tyrannes, did call the Syracusans that were fugitiues out of their contrie, home againe, and all other Sicilians that liked to come and dwell there, to enioy all freedom and libertie, with promise to make iust and equall diuision of the landes among them, the one to haue as much as the other. Moreover they sent out postes and messengers into Asia, and into all the llands where they vnderstoode the banished Syracusans remayned: to perswade and intreat them to come to Corinthe, and that the Corinthians would giue them shippes, Capitaines, and meanes to conduct them safely vnto Syracusa, at their owne proper costes and charges. In recompence whereof, the citie of Corinthe receaued euery mans most noble praise and blessing, aswell for deliuering Sicile in that sorte from the bondage of tyrannes: as also for keeping it out of the handes of the barbarous people, and restored the naturall Syracusans, and Sicilians, to their home and contrie againe. Neuertheles, such Sicilians as repayed to Corinthe apon this proclamation (them selues being but a small number to inhabit the contrie) besought the Corinthians to F ioyne to them some other inhabitantes, aswell of Corinthe it selfe, as out of the rest of Greece: the which was performed. For they gathered together about tenne thousand persons, whom they shipped, and sent to Syracusa. Where there were already a great number of other comen vnto Timoleon, as well out of Syracusa itself, as out of all Italy besides, so that the whole number (as Athenius writeth) came to three score thousand persons. Amongst them he deuised the whole contrie, and sold them houses of the citie, vnto the value of a thousand talents. And because he would leaue the olde Syracusans able to recouer their owne, and make the poore people by this meane to haue money in common, to defraye the common charges of the citie, as also their expences in time of warres: the statues or images were sold, and the people by most voyces did condemne them. For they were solemnly indicted, accused & arraigned, as if they had bene men alie to be condemned. And it is reported that the Syracusans did reuerse the statue of Gelon, an auncient tyrant of their citie, honoring his memorie, because of a great victorie he had wonne of the Carthaginians, neare the citie of Himera: and condemned all the rest to be taken away out of euery corner of the citie, and to be sold. Thus beganne the citie of Syracusa to replenish againe, and by litle and litle to recouer it selfe, many people comming thither from all partes to dwell there. Thereupon Timoleon thought to set all other cities at libertie also, and vterly to roote out all the tyrans of Syracusa and to obeyte his purpose, he went to make warres with them at their owne dores. The first he went against, was Ietas: whome he compelled to forsake the league of the Carthaginians, and to promise alowd that he would rafe all the fortresses he kept, and to liue like a priuate man within the citie of the Leontines. Leptines in like manner, that was tyrant of the citie of Apollonia, and of many other litle villages thereabouts: when he saw him selfe in daunger to be taken by force, did yield him selfe. Whereupon Timoleon saued his life, and sent him vnto Corinthe: thinking it honorable for his contrie, that the other Grecians should see the tyrans of Syracusa in their chiefe citie of fame, liuing meanelly and poorely like banished people. When he had brought this to passe, he returned forthwith to Syracusa about the establishment of the common weale, assisting Cephalus and Dionysius, two notable men sent from Corinthe to reforme the lawes, and to helpe them to stablish the goodliest ordinances for their common weale. And now in the meane time, because the fouldiers had a minde to get some thing of their enemies, and to auoyd idleness: he sent them out abroad to a contrie subiect to the Carthaginians, vnder the charge of Dimarchus, and Demaratus. Where they made many litle townes rebell against the barbarous people, and did not only liue in all abundance of wealth, but they gathered money together also to mainteine the warres. The Carthaginians on the other side, while they were busy about the matters, came downe into Lilybea, with an armie of three score and tenne thousand men, two hundred galleys, and a thousand other shippes and vessells that caried engines of batterie, cartes, vitells, munition, and other necessary prouision for a campe, intending to make sporting warres no more, but at once to driue all the Grecians againe quite out of Syracusa. For in deede it was an able armie to ouercome all the Sicilians, if they had bene whole of them selues, and not diuided. Now they being aduertised that the Sicilians had invaded their contrie, they went towards them in great furie, led by Asdrubal & Amilcar, generalls of the armie. This newes was straight brought to Syracusa, and the inhabitants were so stricken with feare of the report of their armie: that being a maruelous great number of them within the citie, scant three thousand of them had the hartes to arme them selues, and to goe to the fild with Timoleon. Now the strangers that tooke pay, were not aboue foure thousand in all: & of them, a thousand of their hartes fayled, and left him in midd way, and returned home againe. Saying, that Timoleon was out of his wittes, and more rashe then his yeares required, to undertake with five thousand footemen, & a thousand horse, to goe against threescore and tenne thousand men and besides, to cary that small force he had to defend him selfe withal, eight great dayes iorney from Syracusa. So, that if it chaunced they were compelled to flye, they had no place whither they might retyre them selues vnto with safetie, nor man that would take care to burye them, when they were slayne. Neuertheles, Timoleon was glad he had that prooffe of them, before he came to battell. Moreouer, hauing incouraged those that remayned with him, he made them marche with speede towards the riuer of Crimesus, where he vnderstoode he should meete with the Carthaginians. So getting vp vpo a litle hill, from whence he might see the campe of the enemies on the other side: by chaunce, certen moyles fell vpon his armie, laden with with smallage. The fouldiers tooke a conceyt at the first apon sight of it, and thought it was a token of ill lucke: because it is a maner we vse, to hange garlands of this erbe, about the tombes of the dead. Hereof came the common prouerbe they vse to speake, when one lyeth a passing in his bed: he lacketh but smallage. Asmuch to say, he is but a dead man. But Timoleon to draw them from this foolish superstition, & discourage they tooke, stayed the armie. And when he had vsed certen perswasions vnto them, according to the time, his leysure, and occasion: he told them that the garland of it selfe came to offer them victorie before hand. For, sayd he, the Corinthians doe crowne them that winne the Istymian games (which are celebrated in their contrie) with garlands of smallage. And at that time also even in the solemne Istymian games, they vse the garland of smallage for reward and token of victorie: and at this present it is also vsed in the games of Nemea. And it is but lately taken vp, that they haue vsed braches of pyne apple trees in the Istymian games. Now Timoleon had thus incouraged his men, as you haue heard before: he first of all tooke of this smallage, and made him selfe a garland, & put it on his head. When they saw that, the Captaines and all the fouldiers also tooke of the same, and made them selues the like. The soothsayers in like maner at the very same time, perceyued two eagles flying towards them: the one of them holding a snake in her talents, which she peared through and through, and the other as she stewe, gaue a terrible cry. So they shewed them both vnto the fouldiers, who did then all together with one voyce call vpon the gods for helpe. Now this fortun'd about the beginning of the sommer, and towards the later ende of Maye, the sunne drawing towards the solstyce of the sommer: when there rose a great myst out of the riuer, that couered all the feilds ouer, so as they could not see the enemies campe, but only heard a maruelous confused noyse of mens voyces, as it had come from a great armie, and rising vp to the toppe of the hill, they layed their targets downe on the ground to take a litle breathe: and the sunne hauing drawn and sucked vp all the moyst vapours of the myste vnto the toppe of the hills, the ayer began to be so thicke, that the toppes of the mountaynes were all couered ouer with clowdes, and contrarily, the valley vnderneath was all cleare and fayer, that they might easily see the riuer of Crimesus, and the enemies also, how they passed iouer in this fort. First, they had put their cartes of warre foremost, which were very hotly armed and well appointed. Next vnto them there followed tenne thousand footemen, armed with white targets vpon their armes: whom they seeing a farr of so well appointed, they considered by their stately marche and good order, that they were the Carthaginians them selues. After them, diuers other nations followed confusedly one with an other, and so they thronged ouer with great disorder. There Timoleon considering the riuer gaue him opportunity to take them before they were halfe past ouer, and to set vpon what number he would: after he had shewed his men with his finger, how the battell of their enemies was deuised in two partes by meanes of the riuer, some of them being already passed ouer, & the other to passe: He commanded Demaratus with his horsemen, to geue a charge on the vaward, to keepe them from putting them selues in order of battell. And him selfe comming downe the hill also with all his footemen into the valley, he gaue to the Sicilians the two wings of his battell, mingling with them some strangers that serued vnder him: and placed with him selfe in the middle, betwixt the Syracusans, with all the choyce & best litle strangers. So he taried not long to ioyne, when he saw the small good his horsemen did. For he perceyued they could not come to geue a lusty charge apon the battell of the Carthaginians, because they were paled in with these armed cartes, that ranne here and there before them: whereupon they were compelled to wheele about continually, (onles they would haue put them selues in daunger to haue bene vterly ouerthrowen) and in their returns to geue venture of charge, by turnes on their enemies. Wherefore Timoleon taking his target on his arme, cried out alowde to his footemen, to follow him coragiously, & to feare nothing. Those that heard his voyce, thought it more then the voyce of a man, whether the furie of his desire to fight did so strayne it beyonde ordinary course, or that some god (as many thought it then) did stretch his voyce to cry out so lowde & sensibly. His fouldiers answered him againe with the like voyce: & prayed him to leadethem without longer delay. Then he made his horsemen vnderstand, that they should draw on the tonneside from the cartes, and that they should charge the Carthaginians on the flankes:

and after he did set the formost ranke of his battell target to target against the enemies, commaunding the trumpets withall to fownd. Thus with great furie he went to geue a charge pon them, who valiantly receyued the first charge, their bodies being armed with good corselets, and their heads with sayet murrions of copper, besides the great targets they had also, which did easily receyue the force of their darts, and the thrust of the pyke. But when they came to handle their swordes, where agilitie was more requisite then force: a fearful tempest of thunder, & flashing lightning withall, came from the mountaynes. After that came darke thicke cloudes also (gathered together from the toppe of the hilles) and fell vpon the valley, where the battell was fought, with a maruelous extreame shower of rayne, fierce violent windes, and hayle withall. All this tempest was vpon the GRECIANS backes, and full before the barbarous people, beating on their faces, and did blindfold their eyes, and continually tormented them with the rayne that came full upon them with the winde, & the lightnings so ofte flashing amongst them, that one vnderstood not another of them. Which did maruelously trouble them, and specially those that were but freshe water fouldiers, by reason of the terrible thunderclapps, and the noyse, the boytous winde and hayle made vpon their bannes: for that made them they could not heare the order of their Captaines. Moreover, the durdid as much annoyne the CARTHAGINIANS, because they were not nimble in their armor, but haeuely armed as we haue told you: and besides that also, when the playtes of their coats were through wet with water, they did lode and hinder them so much the more, that they could not fight with any ease. This flood the GRECIANS to great purpose, to throwe them downe the easier. Thus when they were tomling in the durte with their heauy armor, vpon they could rise no more. Furthermore, the river of CATHYS being risen high through the great rage of waters, and also for the multitude of people that passed ouer it, did ouerflowe the valley all about: which being full of ditches, many caues, and hollow places, it was straight all drowned ouer, and filled with many running streames, that ranne ouerthwart the feild, without any certen channell. The CARTHAGINIANS being compassed all about with these waters, they could hardly get the way out of it. So as in the end they being overcome with the storme that full did beate upon them, and the GRECIANS hauing slayne of their men at the first onset, to the number of foure hundred of their choycest men, who made the first fronte of their battell: all the rest of their armie turned their backs immediatly, and fled for life. In somuch some of them being followed very neare, were put to the sword in the midst of the valley: other, holding one another hard by the armes together, in the midst of the river as they passed ouer, were caried downe the streame and drowned, with the swiftnesse and violence of the river. But the greatest number did thinke by footemanship to recouer the hilles thereabouts, who were ouertaken by them that were light armed, and put to the sword euery man. They saye, that of tenne thousande which were slayne in this battell, three thousande of them were meere naturall citizens of CARTHAGE, which was a very forowfull and greuous losse to the city. For they were of the noblest, the richest, the lustiest, & valiantest men of all CARTHAGE.
For there is no chronicle that mentioneth any former warres at any time before, where there died so many of CARTHAGE at one feild and battell, as were slayne at that present time.
For before that time, they did alwayes entertaine the FIBYANS, the SPANYARDS, and the NO-MADES, in all their warres: so as when they lost any battell, the losse lighted not on them, but the strangers payed for it. The men of accompt also that were slayne, were easily knowen by their spoyle. For they that spoyled them, stood not trifling about getting of copper and iron together, because they found gold and siluer enoughe. For the battell being wonne, the GRE-CIANS passed ouer the river, and tooke the campe of the barbarous people, with all their ca-riages and bagage. And as for the prisoners, the souldiers stole many of them away, and sent them going: but of them that came to short to make common diuision of the spoyle among them, they were about fiftethousand men, and two hundred cartes of warre that were taken besides. On it was a noble sight to behold the tent of Timoleon their generall, how they enuoy-ned it all about with heapes of spoyle of euery forte: amongst which there were a thousand braue corselets guylt, and grauen, with maruelous curious workes, and brought thither with them also tenne thousand targets. So the conquerours being but a small number, to take the spoyle

A spoile of a multitude that were slaine they filled their purses euen to the toppe. Yet were they three daies about it, & in the end, the third day after the battell, they set vp a marke or token of their victorie. The Timoleon sent vnto CORINTH, with the newes of this ouerthrow, the fairest armors that were gotten in the spoyle: because he would make his countrie & native cite spoken of & commended through the world, aboue all the other cities of GRECE. For that at CO-RINTH only, their chief temples were set forth & adorned, not with spoiles of the GRECIANS; nor offerings gotten by spilling the blood of their owne nation & contrie: (which to say truly, are vnpleasant memories) but with the spoiles taken from the barbarous people their enemies, with inscriptions witnessing the valliance & iustice of those also, who by victorie had obtained the. That is to wit, that the CORINTHIANS & their capitaine Timoleon, (hauing deliuered the GRECIANS dwelling in SICILE, from the bondage of the CARTHAGINIANS) had geuen those offerings vnto the gods, to geue thanks for their victorie. That done, Timoleon leauing the strangers he had in pay, in the contrie subiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, to spoile & destroy it: he returned with the rest of his army vnto SYRACUSA. Where at his first coming home, he banished the thousand souldiers that had forsaken him in his iorney, with expresse charge that they should departe the citie before sunne sette. So these thousand cowardly and munitous souldiers passed ouer into ITALIE, where, vnder promise of the countrie, they were all vnfortu-nately slayne by the BRYTAINS: such was the iustice of the goddess to paie their iuste reward of their trealon. Afterwards, Mamercus the tyranne of CATANA, Iestes (whether it was for the enue they did beare to Timoleons famous dedes, or for that they were affrayde of him) perceiuing tyrannes could looke for no peace at his handes: they made league with the CARTHAGI-NIANS, and wrote vnto them that they should fend another armie and capitaine sodainely, if they would not vterly be driue out of SICILE. The CARTHAGINIANS sent Giso thither with threeore & tenne saile, who at his first coming tooke a certen number of GRECIAN souldiers into pay, which were the first the CARTHAGINIANS euer retained in their seruice: for they neuer gaue the pay vntil that present time, when they thought them to be men inuinacible, and the best souldiers of the world. Moreover, the inhabitants of the territorie of MES-SINA, hauing made a secret conspiracie amongst them selues, did slay foure hundred men that Timoleon had sent vnto them: & in the territories subiect vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, nere vnto a place they call HERRIS, there was another ambush layd for Euthimus LEUCADI-AN, so as him self & all his souldiers were cut in peeces. Howbeit the losse of the made Timoleons doings notwithstanding more fortunate: for they were euen those that had forcibly entred the temple of Apollo in the citie of DELPHES, with Philodemus PHOCIAN, & with Onomarchus, who were partakers of their sacriledge. Moreover, they were lofe people & abiectes, that were abhorred of euery body, who vacabondlike wandred vp & downe the contry of PELOPONNE-SVS, when Timoleon for lacke of other was glad to take them vp. And when they came into SI-CILE, they alwayes ouercame in all battells they fought, whilest they were in his company. But in the end, when the furie of warres was pacified, Timoleon lending them about some speciall seruice to the ayde of some of his; they were cast away euery man of them: and not all together, but at diuers times. So as it seemed that Goddess iustice, in fauor of Timoleon, did separate them from the rest; when he was determined to plague them for their wicked desertes, fearing least good men should suffer hurt by punishing of the euill. And so was the grace & goodwill of the goddess wonderful towards Timoleon, not onely in matters against him, but in those things that prospered well with him. Notwithstanding, the common people of SYRACUSA tooke the reas-ting wordes and writings of the tyrans against them, in maruelous euill part. For Mamercus amongst other, thinking well of him selfe, because he could make verses & tragedies, hauing in certain battels gotten the better hand of the strangers, which the SYRACUSANS gaue pay vnto, he gloried very much. And when he offered vp the targets he had gotten of them, in the temples of the gods, the set vp also these cutting verses, in derision of them that were vanquished: E With bucklers pot I'd like, which of no value were;
we haue these goodly targets of bone, so richly trimm'd heres; All gorgeously with golde, and the with iuorie, with purple cutlers finely varnished, and deckt with Ehome.
These things done, Timoleon led his armie before the citie of CALAVRIA, & Iestes there-while entred the confines of the SYRACUSANS with a maine army, & caried away a maruelous great spoile. And after he had done great hurt, & spoiled the contrie, he returned backe againe, & came by CALAVRIA, to despise Timoleon, knowing well enough he had at that time but few men about him. Timoleon suffered him to passe by, but folowed him afterwards with his horsemen & lightest armed footemē. Icetes vnderstanding that, passed ouer the riuier called Damyras, & so staid on the other side as though he would fight, trusting to the swift rōning of the riuier, and the height of the banks on either side of the same. Now the capitaines of Timoleon bands fell out maruelously amongst them selues, struing for honor of this seruice, which was cause of delaying the battel. For none would willingly come behind, but euery man desired to lead the vaward, for honor to begin the charge: so as they could not agree for their going ouer, one thrusting another to get before his companion. Wherefore Timoleon fell to drawing of lots, which of them should passe ouer first, & tooke a ring of euery one of them, and cast them all within the lappe of his cloke: so rolling them together, by chaunce he pluckt one at the first, wheron was grauen the markes & tokens of a triumph. The young Capitaines seeing that, gaue a shoute of ioy, & without tarying drawing of other lottes, they began euery man to passe the riuier as quickly as they could, & to let apō the enemies as fodainely. But they being not able to abide their force, ranne their wayes, and were faine to cast their armor away to make more haist: howbeit there were a thousand of them lay dead in the feilde. And within few daies after, Timoleon leading his armie to the citie of the LEONTINES, tooke Icetes aliuie there, with his sonne Eupolemus, and the general of his horsemen, who were deliuered into his hands by his owne fouldiers. So Icetes & his sonne were put to death, like the traitors & tyrannesses: and so was Euthydemus also, who though he was a valliant souldier, had no better mercie shewed him, then the father & the sonne, because they did burden him with certain iniurious words he spake gainst the CORINTHIANS. For they say, that when the CORINTHIANS came first out of their contrie into SICILE to make war against the tyrannesses: that he making an oration before the LEONTINES, said amongst other things: that they should not neede to be afraide, if

The women of Corinthe were come out of their contrie.

Thus we see, that men do rather suffer hurt, then put vp iniurious words: & do pardon the enemies, though they reuenge by dedes, because they can do no lesse. But as for iniurious words, they seme to proceed of a deadly hate, & of a cancred malice. Furthermore, whē Timoleon was returned againe to SYRACUSA, the SYRACUSANS arraigned the wiues of Icetes, and his sonne, and their daughters: who being arraigned, were also condemned to die by the iudgement of the people. Of al the actes Timoleon did, this of al other (in my opinion) was the fowlest dede: for if he had listid, he might haue saued the poore womē from death. But he passed not for them, & so left them to the wrath of the citizens, who would be reuenged of them, for the iniuries that were done to Dion, after he had driuen out the tyranne Diomysius. For it was Icetes that caused Arete, the wife of Dion, to be cast into the sea, his sister Aristomache, and his sonne that was yet a sucking child, as we haue written in another place in the life of Dion. That done, he wēt to CATANA against Mamercus, who taried him by the riuier of A SOLVS, where Mamercus was ouerthrown in battel, & about two thousand men slaine, the greatest part wherof were the CARTHAGINIANS, whō Gisco had sent for his reliefe. Afterwards he graited peace to the CARTHAGINIANS, vpon earnest sute made vnto him, with conditō, that they should kepe on thother side of the riuier of L YCVS, & that it should be lawfull for any of th inhabitants there that would, to come & dwell in the territory of the SYRACUSANS, & to bring away with thē their goodes, their wiues & their children: and furthermore, that from thenceforth the CARTHAGINIANS should renounce all league, cōfederacy, & alliance with the tyrannesses. Whereupon Mamercus hauing no hope of good successe in his doings, he would goe into ITALY to stir vp the LYCINIANS against Timoleon, and the SYRACUSANS. But they that were in his company, returned backe againe with their gallies in the myd way: and when they were returned into SICILE, they deliuered vp the citie of CATANA into the handes of Timoleon, so as Mamercus was constrained to faue him selfe, and to flye vnto MESSINA, to Hippion the tyranne thereof. But Timoleon followed him, and befeged the citie both by sea and by lande. Whereat Hippion quaked for feare, and thought to flye by taking shippe, but he was taken startyng.

And

And the MESSINIANS hauing him in their hands, made all the childre come from the schole to the THEATRE, to see one of the goodliet fights that they could deuise: to wit, to see the tyrann punished, who was openly whipped, & afterwards put to death. Now for Mamercus, he did yeld him self vnto Timoleon, to be iudged by the SYRACUSANS, so that Timoleon might not be his accuser. So he was brought vnto SYRACUSA, where he attempted to make an oration to the people, which he had premeditated long before. But seeing that the people cryed out, and made a great noyse, because they would not heare him, and that there was no likelyhoode they would pardon him: he ranne ouerthwart the THEATRE, and knocked his head as hard as he could driue, vpon one of the degrees wherupon they sate. there to see the sportes, thinking to haue dashed out his braynes, & haue rid him selfe sodainely out of his paine. But he was not happy to die so, for he was taken straight being yet aliuie, & put to death as theues & murderers are. Thus did Timoleon roote all tyrans out of SICILE, & make an end of all warres there. And whereas he found the whole ile, wilde, savage, & hated of the natural contrymen & inhabitants of the same, for the extreme calamities & miseries they suffred: he brought it to be so ciuill, and so much desired of strangers, that they came farr & neare to dwell there, where the natural inhabitants of the contrie selfe before, were glad to flye and forsake it. For AGRIGENTVM, and GELA, two great cities, did witnesse this, which after the warres of the ATHENIANS, had bene vnterly forsaken and destroyed by the CARTHAGINIANS, and were then inhabited againe. The one, by Megetius and Pheristus, two Capitaines that came from ELEA: and the other by Gorgas, who came from the ile of CERO. And as nere as they could, they gathered againe together the firstauncient Citizens and inhabitants of the same: whom Timoleon did not onely assure of peace and safetie to liue there, to settle them quietly together: but willingly did helpe them besides, with all other things necessary, to his vttermost meane and abilitie, for which they loued and honored him as their father and founder. And this his good loue & fauor, was common also to all other people of SICILE whatsoeuer. So that in all SICILE there was no truce taken in warres, nor lawes establihed, nor landes deuicid, nor institution of any policie or government thought good or auayleable, if Timoleons deuise had not bene in it, as chiefe director of such matters: which gaue him a singular grace to be acceptable to the goddes, and generally to be beloued of al mē. For in those dayes, there were other famous men in GREECE, that did maruelous great things: amongst whom were these, Timotheus, Agessilaus, Pelopides, Dionysius, and Epaminondas, which Epaminondas Timoleon fought to follow in all thinges, as neare as he could, about any of them all. But in all the actions of these other great Capitaines, their glorie was alway mingled with violence, payne, & labor: so as some of them haue bene touched with reprocche, and other with repentance. Whereas contrariwise, in all Timoleons doings (that onely excepted, which he was forced to doe to his brother) there was nothing but they might with trothe (as Timaeus sayd) proclayme the faying of Sophocles:

Oh mightie goddess of heauen, what Venus stately dame, or Cupid, (god) haue thus ynt, their handes vnto this fame?

And like as Antimachus verses, and Diomysius paynting, both COLOPHONIANS, are full of synewes & strength, & yet at this present we fe they are things greatly labored, & trauelled with much payne: & that contrariwise in Nicomachus tables, and Homers verses, besides the passing workmanship & singular grace in thē, a man findeth at the first sight, that they were easily made, & without great payne. Euen so in like manner, whoeuer will compare the paynefull bloody warres & battels of Epaminondas, & Agessilaus, with the warres of Timoleon, in the which, besides equitie & iustice, there is also great ease & quietnes: he shall finde, waying things indifferently, that they haue not bene fortunes doings simply, but that they came of a most noble & fortunate courage. Yet he him selfe doth wisely impute it vnto his good happe, & fauorable fortune. For in his letters he wrote vnto his familiar frendes at CORINTH, & in some other oratiōs he made to the people of SYRACUSA: he spake it many times, that he thanked the almighty gods, that it had pleased thē to saue & deliuer SICILE from bondage, by his meanes & seruice, & to geue him the honor & dignitie of the name. And hauing builded a temple in his house, he did dedicate it vnto fortune, & furthermore did consecrate his whole houle vnto her. For he dwelt in a houle the SYRACUSANS kept for him & gaue him in recompence of the good seruice he had done them in the warres, with a marvelous faire pleaſant houſe in the contrie alſo, where he kept moſt while he was at leiſure. For he neuer after returned vnto CORINTH againe, but ſent for his wife and children to come thither, and neuer delt afterwards with thoſe troubles that fell out amongſt the GREECIANS, nether did make him ſelfe to be enuied of the citizens: for miſchiefe that moſt gouernors and captains do fall into, through their vnſatiabie deſire of honor & authoritie: but liued al the reſt of his life after in SICILE, reioicing for the great good he had done, and ſpecially to ſee ſo many cities and thouſands of people happy by his meanes. But becauſe it is an ordinary matter, and of neceſſitie, (as Simonides ſaith) that not only all ſtates haue a tuſt vpon their heads, but alſo that in all cities there be accuſers, where the people rule: there were two of thoſe at SYRACUSA, that continually made oration to the people, who did accuſe Timoleon, the one called Laphyſius, and the other Demenetus. So this Laphyſius appointing Timoleon a certain day to come & aunſwere to his accuſation before the people, thinking to conuince him: the citizens began to mutine, & wold not in any caſe ſuffer the day of adiournement to take place. But Timoleon did pacifie them, declaring vnto them, that he had taken all the extreme paines & labor he had done, and had paſſed ſo many daungers, becauſe euery citizen & inhabitant of SYRACUSA, might frankly vſe the libertie of their lawes. And another time Demenetus, in open aſſembly of the people, reproving many things Timoleon did when he was generall: Timoleon aunſwered neuer a word, but onely ſaid vnto the people, that he thanked the goddes they had granted him the thing he had ſo oft requested of them in his prayers, which was, that he might once ſee the SYRACVSANS haue full power and libertie to ſay what they would. Now Timoleon in all mens opinion, had done the nobleſt actes that euer GREECIAN captaine did in his time, and had aboute deſerued the fame and glory of al the noble employtes, whiche the rethoricians with all their eloquent orations perſwaded the GREECIANS vnto, in the open aſſembles, and common feaſtes and plaies of GAMES, out of the which fortune deliuered him ſafe and ſound before the trouble of the ciuill warres that folowed ſome after: and moreover he made a great prooſe of his valliance and knowledge in warres, againſt the barbarous people and tyrannes, and had ſhewed him ſelfe alſo a iuſt and merciful man vnto al his frendes, and generally to al the GREECIANS. And furthermore, ſeeing he wonne the moſt part of all his victories & triumphes, with out the ſhedding of any one teare of his men, or that any of them mourned by his meanes, and alſo ryd al SICILE of all the miſeries and calamities raigning at that time, in leſſe then eight yeeres ſpace: he beyng nowe grown olde, his ſight firſt beginning a litle to faile him, ſhortly after he loſt it altogether. This happened, not through any cauſe or occaſion of ſickeſſe that came vnto him, nor that fortune had caſually done him that iniurie: but it was in my opinion, a diſeaſe inheritable to him by his parētes, which by time came to laie hold on him alſo. For the voyce wēt, that many of his kin in like caſe had alſo loſt their ſight, which by litle & litle with age, was cleane takē from thē. Howbeit Athenis the Hiſtoriographer writeth, that during the warres he had againſt Mamercus & Hippas, as he was in his campe at MYLES, there came a white ſpott in his eyes, that dimmed his ſight ſomwhat ſo that euery man perceiued that he ſhould loſe his ſight altogether. Notwithſtanding that, he did not raiſe his ſeiſe, but continued his enterpriſe, vntill he tooke both the tyrans at laſt: & ſo ſoone as he returned to SYRACUSA againe, he did put him ſelfe out of his office of generall, praying the citizens to accept that he had already done, rather becauſe things were brought to ſo good paſſe, as they them ſelues could deſire. Now, that he patiently tooke this miſfortune to be blind altogether, peraduenture men may ſomewhat marvel at it: but this much more is to be wondered at, that the SYRACVSANS after he was blind, did ſo much honor him, & acknowledge the good he had done thē, that they went them ſelues to viſite him oft, and brought ſtraungers (that were trauellers) to his houſe in the city, & alſo in the contrie, to make them ſee their benefactor, reioicing and thinking thē ſelues happy, that he had choſe to end his life with thē, & that for this cauſe he had deſpised the glorious retorne that was prepared for him in GREECE, for the great & happy victories he had wonne in SICILE. But amongſt many other things the SYRACVSANS did, & ordeyned to honor him with, this of all other me thinketh was the chief: that they made a perpetuall lawe, ſo oft as they ſhould haue warres againſt forreyne people, & not agaynſt their owne contry men,

A that they ſhould euer chooſe a CORINTHIAN for their generall. It was a goodly thing alſo to ſee how they did honor him in the aſſembles of their counsell. For if any trifling matter fell in queſtion among them, they diſpatched it of them ſelues: but if it were a thing that required great counſail and aduiſe, they cauſed Timoleon to be ſent for. So he was brought through the market place in his litter, into the Theater, where all the aſſembly of the people was, and caryed in euen ſo in his litter as he ſate: and then the people dyd al ſalute him with one voyce, and he them in lyke caſe. And after he had pawſed a while to heare the praifes and bleſſinges the whole aſſembly gaue him, they dyd propound the matter doubtfull to him, and he deliuered his opinion vpon the ſame: which being paſſed by the voyces of the people, his ſeruantes caryed him backe againe in his litter through the Theater, and the citizens dyd wayte on him a litle way with cries of ioye, and clapping of handes, and that done, they dyd repayre to diſpatche common cauſes by them ſelues, as they dyd before. So his olde age being thus entertaigned with ſuche honour, and with the loue and good wyll of euery man, as of a common father to them al: in the ende a ſickeſſe tooke him by the backe, whereof he dyed. So the SYRACVSANS had a certain tyme appointed them to prepare for his funeralles, & their neighbours alſo therabouts to come vnto it. By reaſon wherof his funeral was ſo much more honorably performed in al things, & ſpecially for that the people apoynted the nobleſt younge gentelmen of the citie to carrie his coſſyn vpon their ſhoulders, richely furniſhed and ſet forth, whereon his body laye, and ſo dyd conuey him through the place, where the Palace and Caſtell of the tyranne Dionyſius had been, which then was rased to the C grounde. There accompanied his body alſo, many thouſandes of people, all crowned with garlandes of flowers, and apparreled in their beſt apparell: ſo as it ſeemed it had been the proceſſion of ſome ſolemne feaſt, and all their wordes were praifes and bleſſinges of the dead, with teares ronnyng downe their cheekes, which was a good teſtimonie they dyd not this as men that were glad to be diſcharged of the honor they dyd him, neither for that it was ſo ordaind: but for the iuſt ſorowe and griefe they tooke for his death, and for very hartie good loue they dyd beare him. And laſtly, the coſſyn being put vpon the ſtacke of wode where it ſhould be burnt, Demetrius one of the heralds that had the lowdeſt voyce, proclaimed the decree that was ordeined by the people, the effect whereof was this. The people of SYRACUSA hath ordeined, that this preſent body of Timoleon CORINTHIAN, the ſonne of Timodemus, ſhould be buried at the charges of the common weale, vnto the ſumme of two hundred MINAS, & hath honored his memorie with playes and games of muſicke, with ronnyng of horſes, and with other exerciſes of the bodie, whiche ſhalbe celebrated yeerely on the day of his death for euermore: and this, becauſe he dyd driue the tyrannes out of SICILE, for that he ouercame the barbarous people, and becauſe he replenished many great cities with inhabitants againe, which the warres had left deſolate and vnhabited: & laſtly, for that he had reſtored the SICILIANS againe to their libertie, & to liue after their owne lawes. And afterwards, his tombe was built in the market place, about the which a certain time after, they builded certain cloyſters and galleries to exerciſe the youth in, with exerciſe of their bodies, and the places ſo walled in, was called Timoleontium: and ſo long as they dyd obſerue the lawes, and ciuill policie he ſtabliſhed amongſt them, they liued long tyme in great continuall proſperitie.

THE COMPARISON OF Paulus Aemilius with Timoleon.

The comparison of Timoleon and Paulus Aemilius for the warres.

SY the these two men were suche as the Historiographers haue described A them to be: it is certayne, that comparing the one with the other, we shall fynde no great oddes nor difference betwene them. For fyrst of all, the warres they made, haue been agaynst great and famous enemies: the one agaynst the MACEDONIANS, and the other agaynst the CARTHAGINIANS, and both their victories very notable. For the one of them conquered the realme of MACEDON, whiche he tooke from the seuenth kyng that raigned by succession from the father to the sonne, since the tyme of the great Antigonus: and the other drave al the tyrannes out of SICILE, and restored the whole Ile & Cities therein, vnto their former libertie. Vnto some will alledge perhappes that there was this difference betwene them, that Aemilius fought agaynst kyng Perseus, when he had al his power whole and entier, and had fought with the ROMANS many tymes before, and had the better of them in all conflicts: where Timoleon set vpon Dionysius, when he was in greatest dyspayre, and in maner vnterly cast away. On the contrarie syde, it may be objected for Timoleon, that he ouercame manie tyrannes, and a myghtie great armie of the CARTHAGINIANS, with a verie small number of men, and yet men of all sortes: not as Aemilius with a great armie of well trayned and expert souldiers in warres, but with men gathered together at aduenture of all sortes, being mercenarie hierlings, and fighting men for paie, lose people, and men vnruely in warres, that woulde doo but what they lysted. For where the goodly deeds are like, and the meanes vnequall: there we must confesse that the praise is due vnto the generall. Bothe the one and the other kept their handes cleane from corruption, in the charge which they tooke vpon them. But it seemeth that Aemilius came so facioned and prepared, by the good ciuill lawe, and moral discipline of his countrie: and that Timoleon came rawly thither, and afterwards facioned him selfe to be that he was. And this is to be proued: for that al the ROMAINS in that time were so ciuilly brought vp, and exceeded al other in straight keeping the lawes of their countrie. Where to the contrarie, there was not one of the captaines of the GREECIANS that came then, or were sent into SICILE, but fell straight to corruption, when he had put his foote in SICILE, Dion onely excepted: and yet they had a certaine suspicion of him, that he aspired to the kingdome, and imagined in his head to stablishe a certaine Empire at SIRACVSA, like vnto that of LACEDAEMON. T. I. M. A. E. V. S. the Historiographer writeth, that the SIRACVSANS sent Gilippus with shame backe againe into his countrie, for his vnfacible greedy couetousnes, and for his great thestes, and bribes taken in his charge. Diuers other haue also writte the great treasons & falschoddes Pharax SPARTAN, & Calippus A THENIAN did comit, both of them seeking to make them selues lordes of SIRACVSA: and yet what men were they, and what meanes had they to haue suche a foolishe vaine hope & fancie in their heades? Considering

A sidering that the one dyd folowe and serue Dionysius, after that he was driuen out of SIRACVSA: and the other also was but a priuate captaine of a bande of foote men, of those that came in with Dion. Timoleon in contrary maner was sent, to be generall of the SIRACVSANS, vpon their great instance and sure. And he hauing no neede to seeke or hunte after it, but onely to keepe the power and authoritie they dyd willingly put into his handes: so soone as he had destroyed and overthrowen all suche as woulde vniustly vsurpe the gouernment, he dyd immediately of his owne good wyll, frankly resigne vp his office and charge. And sure, so is this a notable thing to be commended, and esteemed in Paulus Aemilius: who hauing conquered dyd great and riche a realme, he neuer increased his gooddes the value of one farthing, nether dyd he nor handle any money at all, although he was very liberall, and gaue largely vnto others. I meane not in speaking this to vpbrayde or detest Timoleon, for that he accepted a fayre house the SIRACVSANS gaue him in the citie, and a goodly manor also in the countrie: for in such cases there is no dishonesty in receiuing, but so is it greater honesty to refuse, then to take. But that vertue is most rare and singuler, where we see they will receiue nor take nothing, though they haue iustly deserued it. And if it be so, that the body is stronger & better coposited, which best abideth change of parching heate, and nipping cold: and that the mynde is much more stronger and stable, that swelleth not vp with pride of prosperitie, nor drowpeth for sorowe in aduersitie. Then it appeareth, that Aemilius vertue was so much more perfect, in that he shewed him selfe of no lesse graue and constant a mynde, in the patience he endured for his losse and sorowe happened vnto him: (losing at one tyme in manner, both his children) then he had done before, in al his triumphe and greatest felicitie. VVhere Timoleon to the contrarye, hauing done a worthie act agaynst his brother, could with no reason suppress the griefe and sorowe he felt: but ouercome with bitter griefe and repentaunce, continued the space of twentie yeeres together, and neuer durst once only shewe his face againe in the market place, nor deale any more in matters of the common weale. Truly, for a man to beware to doo euil, and to shonne from euil, it is a verie good and comely thyng: so also to be sorie, and a fearde of euerye reproche, and ill opinion of the worlde, it sheweth a simpleness of nature, and a good and well disposed minde, but no manly corage.

To be bold
of a soldier

The answer
of a soldier
to king Antigonus.

Discreet opinion of life & death.

At the elder, answered certaine on a time, that maruelously commended a bolde, a venturous, and desperate man for the warres that there was great oddes, to esteeme manhodde so much, and lyfe so litle. And surely it was wisely spoken of him. The report goeth, that king Antigonus gaue paye to a souldier among other, that was very hardie and venturous, but he had a noughtie sickly bodye. The king asked him one day, what he ayled to be so pale, and euill culled? The souldier told him, he had a secret disease vpon him, that he might not tell him with reuerence. The king hearing him say so, commaunded his Physicians and Surgeons to looke to him, and if he were curable, that they should heale him with all possible speede: and so they dyd. After the souldier had his health againe, he would venter no more so desperately in the warres, as he dyd before. In somuch, king Antigonus selfe perceiuing his slacknes, and drawing backe, rebuked him, and said vnto him: that he wondred to see so great a chaunge and alteration in him. The souldier neuer shrinking at the matter, told him the troth plainly. Your selfe, and it please your maiestie, is cause of my cowardlynes now, by healing my disease, that made my life lothsome to me. Much like were a SEBASTIAN words, towching the life and manner of the LACEDÆMONIANS, That it was no maruail they had such a desire to die in the warres, seeing they did it to ridde them selues of their troubles, and most miserable and straight life. But we must not wonder though the SYBARITANS, being womanish men, and altogether geuen to pleasure, did so thinke: that those men hated their liues, who feared not death, for the desire they had to doo good, and goodwill they had to doo their ducie. Which was contrarie in the LACEDÆMONIANS. For they were of opinion, that to liue and die willingly, was a vertue: as these funeral verses doo witness.

*The dead which here doe rest, did not in life esteeme, that life or death were (of them selues) or good or bad to deme.
But euen as life did end, or death was brought to passe, so life or death, was good or bad, this their opinion was.*

And

A And in deede to flye death, is no shame, so it proceede not of a cowardly hart: neither to desire death is commendable, if it be with contempt and hate of life. This is the reason why Homer saith, the valliantest men are euer best armed, when they come to battaile. The lawe makers among the GREECIANS, doo euer punish him that castes away his target, but neuer him that casteth away his sword or lawnce. For euery man must first thinke to defende him selfe, before he seeke to hurt his enimie, and specially such as haue the whole state of a realme in their handes, and be generalles of the feeld. For if the comparison be true, that Iphicrates the ATHENIAN captaine made, that in an armie of men, the light horsemen resemble the handes, the men of armes the feete, the battaill of footemen the stomacke & brest, the captaine, the head of a mans body: it seemeth then, that the venturous captaine putting him selfe in daunger with our cause, is not onely careless of his owne life, but also of all theirs whose liues depend vpon his fatie. As contrarily, he being careful of his owne person, cannot but be careful of his souldiers that serue vnder him. Therefore Callicratidas a LACEDÆMONIAN captaine, and a woorthie man otherwise, did vnwisely aunswere a foolishhaire that bad him take hede to him selfe: for the signes and tokens of the sacrifices did threaten his death. Sparta, said he, standeth not vpon one man alone. It is true, that to fight by sea or by land man for man, Callicratidas was but one man of him selfe: but as captaine or lieutenant generall, he had the whole power and force of the armie in his person. For he was not a man alone, when so manie mens liues were lost with his. Now olde Antigonus was of a contrary minde. For he being redie to geue battell by sea, about the Ile of ANDROS, made a better aunswer to one that said vnto him: his enemies had more shippes then him selfe. For how many shippes doest thou reckon then my selfe, said he? Therein he did wisely to make great accompt of the worthines of a generall, specially when it is ioynd with hardines, and experience. For the chiefeest poynte of seruice, is to saue him, that saueth all other. For when Chares on a time shewed the ATHENIANS openly, the sundrie woundes and cuttes he had receiued apō his body, & his target also thrust through with many pikes: Timotheus straight said vnto him, Chares, I am not of thy minde. For when I did besedge the citie of SAMOS, I was ashamed to see a darte throwne from the walles, light hard by me, for that I shewed my selfe a rashe young man, and more venturous then became a generall of so great an armie. For when I standeth much apō the whole armie, and that it is necessarie the generall thereof doo put him selfe in daunger: then he should put him selfe forward, and occupie both handes and body without respect, not regarding their wordes that say, a good wise captaine shoulde die for age, or at the least old. But where there is smal honor to be woone by very good successe, and contrariwise much losse and distruction by great misfortune: no man of wisdome or iudgement would with a generall, to fight as a priuate souldier, to hazard the losse of a generall. I thought good therefore to make this preface before the liues of Pelopidas, and of Marcellus, both which were woorthie men, and died otherwise then they shoulde. For they both were valliant souldiers in the felde, and did both of them honor their contrie with famous victories, and specially against great and dreadful enemies. For the one was the first (as they saie) that ouerthrew Hannibal, who was neuer overcome by any before. And the other was also ouercame the LACEDÆMONIANS in battell, that ruled at GREECE at that time both by sea and by land. Yet they both carelessly lost their liues, by venturing to boldly: when their contrie stood in greatest neede of suche men and captaines, as they were. This is the cause, why we folowing the resemblance that was betweene them, haue compared their liues together. Pelopidas, the sonne of Hippocles, came of one of the noblest houes of the citie of THEBES, as Epaminondas did. He being brought vp in great wealth, his father left him heire of all his landes and goodes, being but a young man. So he straight shewed him selfe willing to doo good with his monie, to those that needed helpe, and were worthe: to let the world see, that his monie was not his maister. For as Aristotle saith, of these rich men, the most part of them do not vse their goods, for extreame couetousnes: other againe doo abuse them, as being geuen to ouermuch pleasures. So riche men became laues all their life time, some to pleasure, other to profit. Now, al Pelopidas other frendes would be beholding to him, and take very thanckfully his curtesie and liberalitie towards them. But Epaminondas could neuer be brought to any thing at his handes. Howbeit Pelopidas selfe folowed Epaminondas maner: for he tooke a pride and pleasure to goe simply appareled, to fare meanelly, to labor willingly, and to make warres openly as he did. He was euen such another, as Euripides the Poet described Capaneus to be: when he said of him:

He rich and vvelthie was, yet was he there vwithall, no vright that purchast vworldly hate, nor insolent at all.

For he would haue beene ashamed, that the poorest man of the citie of THEBES, should haue worne meaner apparell upon his backe, then himselfe. As for Epaminondas, his pouertie was not daintie to him, bicause his parentes were euer poore: and yet for all that he passed it ouer more easely, by studie of Philofophie, which he gaue him selfe vnto, and for that from his youth he liked to leade a spare life without exceffe. Where Pelopidas matched in a noble house, and married highly, and had two children by his wife: neuertheless he had no minde to keepe or increafe his goodes the more for that, but gaue him selfe altogether to serue the common weale as long as he liued. By reason whereof his wealth decayed, and his best frendes grewe angrie with him, telling him how he did not well to make no more reckoning of a thing that was so necessarie, as to haue goodes. And he answered them: In dede they are necessarie, I doo confesse it, but yet for such a one, as this poore, lame, and blind man that standeth by. They both were a like borne to all vertue, sauing that Pelopidas tooke most pleasure in exercise of his body and strength, and Epaminondas in the exercise of his wit and learning. So as the palyment ech of them tooke when they were at leasure, was, that the one delighted to wrastle, and to hunt, and liked any kinde of exercise of his body: and the other to heare, to studie, and alwaies to learne some thing of Philofophie. But among all the excellent giftes and good partes in either of them, and that most wanne them honor and estimation in the world, they were onely commended, and singularly noted of wise men, for the perfect loue and frendshippe that was euer inuolably kept betwene them, vntill their deaths: hauing been ioynd together in so many battels, warres, charges of armies, and otherwise in matters of state and government. For if a man will consider, and looke into the doings of Aristides, Themistocles, and Cimon, of Pericles, Nicias, and Alcibiades, how full of dissensions, enuies, & suspitions they were one against another in gouerning the common weale: and againe will consider the loue, honour, and kindnesse, that continued alwaies betwixt Pelopidas and Epaminondas: no doubt they will saie these two are more worthe to be called brethren in warre, (as they saie) and companions in government, then any of them we haue named before, whose care and studie was alwaies rather to ouercome one another, then to ouercome their enemies, and the onely cause thereof was their vertue. For their aches shewed they did not seeke glorie, nor riches for them selues (the couetousnes whereof doth allwaies breede quarrelles and enuy) but both of them from the beginning fell one in loue with an other, with a great kindenes and estimation of them selues, to see their contrie flourish, and growe to great honor through their seruice, and in their time: and so they reckoned all the good employes both of the one and the other, that tended to that ende, as their owne. The most part of writers thinke, this great and earnest loue thone did beare to another, did growe first betwene them, in a iorney they made together vnto MANTINIA, to aide the LACEDÆMONIANS, that were at that time confederates of the THEBANS. For they being both set in battell raye, one hard by another among the footmen, against the ARCADIANS that stoode before them: it fortune that the point of the battell of the LACEDÆMONIANS in the which they were, gaue backe, and many of them ranne away. But they determining to die rather then to flye, stoode close together, and fought with the enemies that came upon them: vntill such time as Pelopidas being hurt in seuen places before, fell downe at the last vpon a heape of dead bodies, afwell of their owne souldiers, as of their enemies, euen one vpon another. Then Epaminondas thinking he had ben slaine, stepped notwithstanding before him to defend his body & armor, & he alone fought against many, being willing to die, rather then to forsake Pelopidas lying amongst the dead bodies: vntill him selfe being thrust into the breast with a pyke, and fore cut on his arme with a sword, was euen ready to geue ouer, when Agessipolis (king of the LACEDÆMONIANS) came with the other

A point of the battell in happie howre, who saued both their liues past all hope. Now after this battell, the LACEDÆMONIANS both in wordes and deedes did courteously intreate the THEBANS, as their frendes, and confederates. Notwithstanding, in troth they beganne to feare the power and great corage of that citie, and specially the faction and associates of Imenias & Androclidas had set vp, whereof Pelopidas also was a copanon: bicause they thought it was populer, and inclined muche to desire libertie. VVhereupon Archias, Leontidas, and Philip, all three great welthie men of the citie of THEBES, and milking to be equal with other citi-zens: did perswade Phabidas, a captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that going and coming through the contrie of BOEOTIA with an armie, he would one day assaile to take the castell of THEBES called CADMEA, and driuing those out of the citie that would resist him, he would put the government of the state into the hands of a fewe of the noblest persones, who would be at the deuotion of the LACEDÆMONIANS, & obey them in all thinges. Phabidas brought it to passe, and did worcke his feate before the THEBANS mistrusted any thing, upon a holy day called THESMOPHORIA. After he had wonne the castell, he apprehended Imenias, and sent him to LACEDÆMON, where shortly after they put him to death. Pelopidas, Pherenicus, and Androclidas, with many other, saued them selues by flying, and were banished THEBES by sounde of Trompet. Epaminondas taried stil in THEBES, and no man tutched him, for they made small account of him, bicause he was altogether geuen to his booke: and though his goodwill had serued him to haue done some feate, his pouertie made him vnable to doo any thing. The LACEDÆMONIANS vnderstanding of the raking of the castell, did straight put Phabidas out of his charge, and set a fine of a hundred thowland DRACHMES upon his head: but yet they kept still the castell of CADMEA in their handes with a great garrison. All the other citie and people of GREECE did wonder much at it, that they should allowe the fact, and punish the notwithstanding the doer. So the THEBANS hauing lost their auncient libertie, and being made subiect by both these, Archias, and Leontidas, so as all hope was taken from them euer to winde out of this tyrannie, or at any time to ouerthrowe it, seeing it was maintained and defended by the LACEDÆMONIANS, and that they could not possibly take from them all the seigniorie and dominion they had throughout GREECE, aswell by sea as by lande: Leontidas and his followers notwithstanding, when they vnderstoode that they who were banished fro THEBES, were very wel received & entertained of the people at ATHENS, and much made of also of the nobilitie, they sought secretly by treason to haue them killed. To do this feate, they sent certaine men vnknown vnto ATHENS, who by reason slue Androclidas, howbeit they missed the kylling of the other. Furthermore, the LACEDÆMONIANS wrote to the ATHENIANS, that they should not receiue such as were banished from THEBES, nor that they should fauor them, but driue them out of their citie, as those which by their allies were lustily proclaimed common enemies. The ATHENIANS notwithstanding, being men alwaies ciuilly geuen, and inclined in nature to humanitie, as being borne and bred vp withall, and very desirous besides to requite the THEBANS curtely, who had bene the chiefeft meanes and doers in restoring againe the populer state and government at ATHENS: they would by no meanes offer the THEBANS any such iniurie, seeing they had established a lawe and decree, that if any ATHENIAN passing to and fro through the contrie of BOEOTIA, did beare armor against the thirtiety tyrannes, that were gouernors and oppressors of the libertie of ATHENS, there should no BOEOTIAN seeme to see, or knowe any thing thereof. In the meane time Pelopidas, though he were of the younger sort, did procure still euery one that was banished, to seeke the libertie of his contrie, and openly made an oration: to them all, declaring, that it were not onely a cowardly part, but also a wicked offence to the goddes, if they would suffer their contrie to remaine so in continual bondage, & strangers to inhabite it with a garrison, to make them subiect to the yoke: and they in the meane time to be contented to saue the selues, to liue delicately and idly at ATHENS, to studie to doe what shal please the ATHENIANS to commaund the, & to be affraide of the orators, & those which through eloquence can perswade the common people to doo what they lust. Therefore he perswaded them that they should hazard all, being a matter of so great weight, and take example of Thersibulus noble corage and hardynes: who departing from THEBES, did driue out the tyrannes that did oppresse A T H E N S : and euen so, we departing from A T H E N S , should seekem A deliuer Thebes also from bondage. When he had by these persuasions drawn them to his opinion, they secretly sent vnto their frendes that remayned still in T H E B E S , to let them vnderstand their minde and determination : who all lyked very well of their purpose . Insomuch, C H A R O N that was the chiefeſt man among them, promised to lende them his house to assemble in . Philidas also founde means to be ſecretarie to Philip and Archias, who were gouerners & captaynes of the city at that time for the L A C E D E M O N I A N S . Epaminondas on the other ſide making no ſhewe of any thing, had of long time practiſed to ſtyre vp the courage of the younge men of T H E B E S . For when they were at any games or exerciſes of bodye, he woulde euer procure them to wraſtle with the L A C E D E M O N I A N S . And after he ſawe them reioyce when they had caſt them, and that they were the ſtronger, he woulde chide them, & tell them they might be aſhamed, for lacke of courage, to ſuffer the L A C E D E M O N I A N S to hold their noſes to the gryndſtone, that were nothing like to them in ſtrength . Now, the confederates appointed a day certain, to breake the iſe of their pretended enterpriſe, & agreed that Pherenicus, with other that were baniſhed, ſhoulde tariſe at the village of T H R A S I Y M , and that they ſhoulde ſende the valiaunteſt and luſteſt younge men before, to geue the venter to enter the citie: adding this therewithall, that if the enemies fortune to iurpriſe them, all the other of the conſpiracie ioyntly together, ſhoulde be ready to geue order, that their fathers, mothers, and children, ſhoulde lacke nothing neceſſarie for them. Pelopidas was the firſt man offered him ſelfe to vndertake the enterpriſe: & after him Melon, Damoclidus, & Theopompus, all three, men of the greateſt houſes of T H E B E S , who loued maruelouſly together, and for no reſpect woulde euer offend one another, although from the beginning there was euer emulation among them for honor & glory, by ſtriuing who ſhoulde exceede other in vertue & valiantnes . Now they were twelue of them, who taking leaue of the reſt, ſent a ſoote poſt before to Charon, to aduertise him of their coming: and they them ſelues went on their iorney caſting liſle ſhort clokes apone them, and taking houndes with them, and hunters ſtaues in their handes, becauſe their enterpriſe ſhoulde not be miſtruſted by thoſe that met them on the way, and that they ſhoulde thinke them hunters vp and downe the ſeildes for their pleaſure. So, whē their meſſenger they ſent came to the citie, and had tolde Charon that they were coming, he neuer ſhooke from his worde, though the daunger towards was great, but like a ſtove and honeſt man did abide by his promiſe he made, and tolde him they ſhoulde be moſt hartely welcom to his houſe. But another man called Hippothemidas, very honeſt otherwiſe, & one that loved his contry and the preferuation thereof, and a good friend of thoſe alſo that were baniſhed, fainting ſtraight apone the ſodaine report of theſe newes, and his minde was troubled, and his hart ſayled him ſo, as his noſe fell a bleeding, to thinke apone the greatnes of the inſtant daunger he was like to fall into, hauing neuer caſt before with him ſelfe, how by this enterpriſe they ſhoulde put all the empire of the L A C E D E M O N I A N S in hazard of vtter deſtruction, and laye a plat beſides to ouerthrowe all their owne common weale and ſtare, by laying al their hope apone a fewe baniſhed men, hardly able to wade through with their enterpriſe. Whereupon, ſo ſone as he was come home, he ſecretly diſpatched a meſſenger, one of his familiar friends, vnto Melon & Pelopidas, to will them they ſhoulde deſerre their enterpriſe for better oportunitie, & ſo to returne backe again to A T H E N S . Chlidon was the man he ſent of this meſſage, who preſently went home to his houſe: and taking his horſe out of the ſtable, had his wife ſette him the brydell quickly. The brydell not being readily to be founde, ſhe tolde him he had lent it out to one of their neighbours . Then they ſell a chiding together about it, and at length brake out to ſowle wordes, and laſtly his wife fell a curſing of him, and prayed the goddeſſe he might haue ill lucke in his iorney, and thoſe that ſent him . Chlidon hauing ſpent the good part of the day, chiding and brawling with his wife about the brydell, and furthermore miſliking the tokens of his wiues curſing and banning of him: he determined not to geue a ſoote oute to the dores of that arrant, and ſo went about ſome other buſines . Thus had this noble enterpriſe in manner bene altogether daſhed, before it was fully begonne . Now thoſe that were in Pelopidas companie, chaunged apparell with the contrie men, becauſe they woulde not be knowne, and did deuide them ſelues, for that they would not come into the citie till together Conſpiracie againſt the Lacedæmonians, for the liberie of Thebes.

Charon kept promiſe, with daunger of liſe.

Pelopidas cometh into Thebes diſgiſed in cloyne apparel.

A together, but at diuers gates, beinge day light. At that time it was a meruelous winde and great ſnowe, and the weather was ſo boyſterous, that euery man got him within dores: which fell out happily for the conſpirators, that they were not known when they came into the citie. So their frendes and confederates within the citie receaued them as they came, and brought them to Charon houſe: where were aſſembled together, with thoſe that were baniſhed, eight and forty perſones only. Now for the tyrans, thus ſtoode the matter with them. Philidas their ſecretary was of the conſpiracy, as we haue told you before, and he knewe all the praſtice. Wherefore he had longe before ſolemly bidden Archias and his companie, to ſupper to his houſe that verie night, to be merry together, & had promiſed to entertaine them with women to welcome them with all: of purpoſe, that when they had in their full cuppes, and were in the middeſt of all their pleaſure, the conſpirators might then vſe them as they woulde. So they beinge ſette at table, before they were ſped of their cuppes, one came to them, and told them truly of the treaſon (not the particularities, neither as a thinge certaine, but of a rumor onely that ranne abroad in the towne) howe the baniſhed men were hidden in Charon houſe. Philidas woulde haue paſſed the matter ouer. Howbeit Archias would nedes ſende one of his garde ſtraight for Charon, to commaunde him to come to him preſently. It was within night, and Pelopidas and his companie prepared themſelues to worke their feare, being armed euery man, and their ſwords in their handes, when apone a ſodaine they heard one knocke at the gate. And one of the houſe runninge ſtraight to the gate, came backe againe aſearde to tell them that it was one of Archias garde that came for Charon, to come immediatly to the gouernours. Then were they in doubt that their praſtice C was diſcouered, & that they were all caſt away, before they coulde make any prooſe of their valiantnes: notwithstanding, they were all of opinion, that Charon ſhoulde obey the meſſage, & that he ſhoulde preſent himſelfe before the gouernours, to take away all ſuſpition from them. Charon of him ſelfe was a ſtout man, very conſtant, & reſolute in daunger for his owne perſone: yet it grieved him much at that time, for feare the confederates ſhoulde ſuſpect him he hadde bewrayed the ſe, if ſo many honeſt citizeins whom he had lent his houſe vnto, ſhoulde vnfortunatly miſcarie. Therefore before he went out of his houſe, he went into his wiues chamber to fetch his ſonne, that was a goodly boy, but ſtrong as any boy of his age could beſo he brought him to Pelopidas, and prayed him, if he vnderſtoode that he had betrayed them any way, or otherwiſe had ſought their hurt, they ſhoulde then vſe his ſonne as an enemy, without any compaſſion towards him. D When the confederates ſaw the good zeale & true noble mind of Charon, they all fell a weeping, and were angrie with him, that he ſhoulde thinke any of them ſo faint harted, or timorous, for any daunger coulde come to them, that they ſhoulde ſuſpect or accuſe him for any thinge: and therewith all they prayed him, not to leaue the boye with them, but rather to conuey him into ſome place out of the tyrans daunger, where he might be brought vp, that one day he might be reuenged of the wrong & iniurie they had done to them, and to their contrie. Charon answered them, he woulde not take him away, & that he ſaw no life nor health more happy for him, then to dye with his father without infamy, and with ſo many honeſt men his friends. So after he had beſought the goddeſſe to proſper them, and hadde encouraged and embraced euerie one of the confederators one after another: He went to the gouernours, and ſtudied by the way ſo to frame E his wordes and countenance, as though he ſhoulde ſeeme to thinke of any thinge elſe, then of that he purpoſed to do. When he came to Philidas dore that made the feaſt, Archias and Philidas him ſelfe came vnto him, and asked him: Charon, what are they (ſayd they) that are come into the city, and hidden in ſome houſe, with certaine citizeins that do accompany them? Charon was ſomewhat aſhamed at the firſt, and asked them againe: what men be they? who are they that hides them in the citie? But when he perceiued that Archias coulde tell nothinge of certainie, then he thought ſtraight that ſome man hadde informed them that was not priue to the praſtice, but hadde hearde ſome thinge of it. Thereupon he willed them to take heede: it was ſo falle alarme, to make them aſtrayed: neuertheleſſe (ſayd he) I will enquire further of it: for at all aduenture it is good to be circumſpect in ſuch a caſe to be ſure. Philidas answered him, F he ſaid truly and ſo he brought Archias backe againe into the hall, where he made him drinke deeper then before, till entertaining the companie with hope of the womens coming. Charon returninge home againe, found all the confederates ready to attempt their enterpriſe, not as men that reckened of their liues, nor that had any hope to preuaile: but as those that were determined to dye valiantly, and to sell their liues dearly. Now he truly tolde vnto Pelopidas onely, what was said vnto him & the rest: he told that Archias had sent for him to speake with him, of other mat- ters. The storme of the former danger was scant blowne ouer, but fortune sent them an other. For immediately vpon talke had with Charon at the first, came a messenger from Athenes, that brought a letter to the same Archias, written by the Bishop of Athenes at that time, called Ar- chias also as him selfe, & was his old hoste & frend: wherein he wrote not of simple coniecture, nor furnished suspicion, but the plaine conspiracy in euery degree, as afterwards it fell out. So the messenger was brought to Archias that was dronke, and deliuering him the letter, he said vnto him. Sir, he that sendeth you this letter, straightly charged me to tell you, that you should presently read the contents thereof, because it is a matter of great importance. Archias laughing sayd vnto him: weighty matters to morrow. So heooke the letter and put it vp, & then fell asleepe to his tale he had begonne with Philidas. But euer after, the Grecians made this a common prouerbe among them: weighty matters to morrow. Now when the cōspirators spied their time to go about their businesse, they deuided them selues in two companies. Pelopidas and Damoch- das went with one company, to sette vpon Leontidas and Hypates, because they dwelt nere toge- ther: Charon and Melon with the rest, went against Archias and Philip, beinge disguised in wo- mens apparell they had put vpon their priuy cotes, & wearing garlands of pyne apple and syme trees on their heads, that couered all their faces. So when they came to shew them selues at the hall dore where the banquet was made, they that were in the hall at the first sight, thinking they had beene the women they looked for, beganne to shewre, and made great noyse for ioye. But when the conspirators cast their eyes rounde about the hall to knowe those which were at the table, they drew out their swordes, and set vpon Archias and Philip ouerthwart the table: then they shewed them selues what they were. Then Philidas had his gussetes he hadde bidden to the banquet with them, that they shoulde not stirre, for they shoulde haue no hurt: so some of them fate still. But the greatest number of them would needes from the borde, to defende their go- uernours. Howebeit bicause they were so dronke that they knewe not what they did, they were soone slaine with them. Now Pelopidas enterprise was not so easie. For they went against Leontidas, that was a sober discrete man, and withall, hardy of his handes; and they found he was gone to bed, his dores were shut vp, and they knocked long before any man came to the dore. At the length, one of his men that hearde them rappe so hard, with much a doo came to open the dore: but he had no sooner thrust backe the bolt of the dore, and beganne to open it, but they pushed it from them with such a force asson him altogether, that they layed him on the grounde, and went straight to his maisters chamber. Leontidas hearinge the noyse of them that ranne vpe to him in such hast, presently mistrusted the matter: and leaping out of his bed, tooke his sword in his hande, but did forget to put out the lampes that burned in his chamber all night, for if they hadde beene out, they might easily haue hurt one an other in the darke. But the lampes giuinge cleare light in the chamber, he went to the chamber dore, and gaue Cephisodorus, the first man that pressed to enter asson him, such a blowe with his sword, that he dropped downe dead at his feete. Hauing slaine the first man, he dealt with the seconde that came after him, and that was Pelopidas. The fight went hard betwene them two, bothe for that the chamber dore was verie straight, as also for that Cephisodorus body lying on the ground, did choke the comming in at the chamber. Notwithstanding, Pelopidas ouercame him in the ende, and slue him: and went from thence with his companie, straight to Hypates house, where they got in, as they did into Leontidas house before. But Hypates knewe presently what it was, and thought to slue him selfe in his neighbours houses. Howebeit the conspirators followed him so harde, that they cutte him off before he could recover their houses. Then they gathered together, and ioyned with Melon company, and sent immediately with all possible speede to Athenes, to the banished Thebans there, & cried through the city, liberty, liberty, arming those citizens that came to them, with the armor & spoyle of their enemies, that were hanged vp in common wawtes, & armorers shops about Charons house, which they brake open, or caused to be opened by force. On the other side, Epaminondas, and Gorgidas, came to ioine with them, with a company of young men & honest olde men well appointed, whom they had gathered together. Hereupon, the whole cite

A was straight in an vpröre & tumult, & euery house full of lights, one running to an other to know what the matter was. Neuertheles the people did not yet assemble together, but euery one being amazed, musing at this stir, not vnderstanding the trocke, staid vntill day came on, that they might call a counsell. But truly herein, me thinks the Capitaines of the garrison of the Lacedæmonians were greatly in fault, that they did not stirre betimes, & set vpon the incontinently: considering they were xv. hundred souldiers, besides a great number of citizens that would haue come, one after an other to take their partes. But the great noyse they heard, made them a- feard, & to see lights in euery mans house, & the people running vp & down the streets in great multitudes to & fro: wherupon they stirred not, but only kept the within the castel of Cadmea. The next morninge by breake of day, came the other banished Thebans from Athenes very wel armed, & al the people of Thebes drew together in counsaill. Thither did Epaminondas and Gorgidas bring Pelopidas, & his cōsorts, & presented the before the people, cōspassed about with prielts & the professed of the city, offering them crownes to put vpon their heads, & they praised the assembly of the citizens, that they would help their gods, & their contrie. Al the people that were present, whē they saw them, rose vp, & stood on their feete, & with great shoutes & clapping of hands receiued the, as their sauours, that had deliuered their contrie frō bondage, & re- stored them again to liberty: & therupon, before them al, euen in the market place, by the whole voice & consent of the people, they chose Pelopidas, Melon, & Charon, gouernors & capitaines of all Bœotia. Pelopidas then immediately made them besiege the castel of Cadmea about, with trenches, & force of wod, doing al he coulde possible to winne it, & to expulse the Lacedæmo- nians, before any supply & aide came to them frō Sparta. So he did, & preuented it so sodainly, that the garrison being departed out of the castel by cōposition, as they returned towards Lacedæmonia, they found Cleombrotus king of Sparta in the contrie of Megara, comming to- wards the with a great army to help the. Afterward, of the three capitaines which had charge of their garrison that lay at Thebes, the Spartans condēned two of them to death: Hermipidas, & Arctissus, were presently executed: & the third capaine, Dyscoridas, they set so greuous a fyne on his head, that he wet out of Peloponesys. This enterprise being attēpted, & executed with the like valiantnes, & the same daiger & trouble, that Thrasibulus practisē was, whē he deliuered Athenes from the slavery of the thirty gouernors & tyrans, & hauing the like fortune, & happy ende: the Grecians termed it cōsyn german to Thrasibulus act. And in deede it were a harde matter to find two other such, besides the two, that with so fewe me ouercame their enemies, being many more in nōber then the selues, or that with so small help did ouercome those that were of so great force, or that performed their enterprise with their only valiantnes & wisdō, & were cause besides of so great blessing & benefit to their contrie, as Pelopidas & Thrasibulus attēpt was. But the great change & alteration of the state afterwards, did make their actes farre more noble & famous. For the warre that ouerthrew the maiestie of Sparta, & that tooke away al the seigni- orie & rule of the Lacedæmonians bothe by sea & by land, beganne the very same night, when Pelopidas him self making the twelue person, & entering into a priuate house, (taking neither cite, nor castel, nor stronge hold) to tel truly by figuratiue speach, did breake & cut in fonder the links & chaynes that linked straight together, & strēghened the Lacedæmonians whole empire & monarchie ouer al Greece: who vntill that presēt time were thought so strong, as no possibillitie coulde breake or fonder them. Now the Lacedæmonians fortuning afterwards to inuade the cōtry of Bœotia with a mighty army: the Athenians trembling for feare of their great power, did vterly leaue to protect the, & renouened the league & alliance they had made before with them. And moreover, they did faithfully prosecute law against those, that were ac- cused to take part with the Bœotians: so wher some of the were put to death, other were banished from Athenes, & the rest condēned in great summes of money. To be short, euery man sayd the Thebans were but vndone, considering they had no help, & were beloued besides of none. At that presēt time it fel out Pelopidas & Gorgidas were generals ouer al Bœotia for that yere, who deuiling to throw a bone betwixt the Athenians & the Lacedæmonians again, to make the square, they vfed this policie. There was a capitaine of the Lacedæmonians called Sphodrias, a valliant mā, but elle of smal capacity, & vainly giuē, hauing a certē fond ambitio & humor, perswading him selfe he had done some notable good seruice in his time. This Sphodrias was left in the city of Thebes, with a great band of souldiers, to receaue & fauor al the Bœo-

TIANS, that had a minde to reuolte fro the THEBANS. Pelopidas of him selfe sent a marching (a very frende of his) vnto Sphodrias, with a great some of money from him, and certaine perswasions withall, which perswaded more then the money, withinge him to attempt some greater matter, & to seke to winne the haue of PIRÆA: a thing soone wonne, if he came to assault it on the sodaine, & the rather, for that the ATHENIANS mistruste nothinge, neither keepe watch nor ward there. Moreouer, that he might assure himselfe, nothinge could be better welcome to the lords of LACEDÆMONIA, the to make them lords of the city of ATHENS also. And againe, that the THEBANS, being at deadly foode with the ATHENIANS, for that they had betrayed & forsake them in their neede, would not aide nor succor the in any respect. Sphodrias giuing to light care to this vaine perswasion, tooke the souldiers he had with him, and marching away by night, entred the realme of ATTICA, & wet on to the city of ELYSIUM: but whē he came thither, his souldiers were afeard, & would go no further. So his purpose beinge discovered, he was forced to returne backe to THESPIES, hauing raised such a warre to the LACEDÆMONIANS, as fel out to be of no small importance to them, nor easie to be pacified. For after that time, the ATHENIANS fought league & amity againe with the THEBANS, & did aide them very louingly: & moreover, putting them selues to sea, they sailed vp & downe, procuring & drawing to their league all such, as were willing to rebell against the LACEDÆMONIANS: & the THEBANS besides, had bin prety skirmishes with the LACEDÆMONIANS in the meane time, in their own cōtry of BOEOTIA. It is true they came to no great battels, but yet it was such a great learning & cōtinual training of them in marshall discipline, as the THEBANS stil increased in corage & valliantnes, & waxed stronger & better souldiers: for by those skirmishes they grew not onely expert souldiers, but waxed more skillfull in vsing their weapons, then before. As we read, that Antalcidas a SPARTAN said one day to king Agesslaus, cōminge home sore hurt fro BOEOTIA: surely the THEBANS haue giuen you a worthy reward, for teaching the to be souldiours against their wils. But to say truly, Agesslaus was not their maister to teache the to make wars, but they were the good & wise leaders of the THEBANS, who like good wod mē in choosing their game, could skilfully choose both time & place to giue their enemies battell, & make the retire again with safety, after they had bin fleshed, giuing the a litle tast of the frutes & cōmodity of victory: but among the, Pelopidas was he that deserued most honor and glory. For, since the first time they gaue him charge of men of warre, they neuer failed, but chose him continually euery yeare, either Captaine of the holy bande, or gouernor of BOEOTIA so long as he liued: so that Pelopidas only did the most things in this warre. The LACEDÆMONIANS were ouerthrowē in sundry iorneyes, that they were distressed by the cities of PLATEES, & of THESPIES, where Phæbidas himselfe (that had before taken the castell of CADMEA) was slaine amongst other. An other great power of theirs also was ouerthrowen nere to the city of TANAGRA, where Panthoidas gouernor of the same, was also slaine. Now all these victories, though they much encouraged the hearts of the conquerors, & made the hardy: yet did they not therby altogether cōquer the mindes of the vanquished. For the LACEDÆMONIANS were not overcome in any pitched field, nor set battell, where they had their whole army together: but they were light rode, & skirmishes properly laid of purpose, where somtime flying, somtime driuing the againe, they bickered very oft, & put the to the worst. But the battell of TEGIRA, which was but a florish & profeto the iourney of LEVCTRES, swan Pelopidas greathonor. For he had no cōpanio to chāleage any part of his glory & victory, neither did he leaue his enemies any lawfull excuse, to shadow or couer their ouerthrow. For he spied al occasio he might possible, how to take the city of ORCHOMENE, that tooke part with the LACEDÆMONIANS, and had receiued two ensignes of footemen of theirs to kepe it. Pelopidas being aduertised one day, that the garrison of ORCHOMENE was gone abroad to make a rode into the cōntry of the LOCRIDES, & certaine shuld finde ORCHOMENE without garrison: he marched thither with his holy band, & certaine nūber of horse mē. But whē he drew nere the city, he had intelligence there was another garrison cōming fro SPARTA, to supply the place of the garrison that was abroad: wherupō he returned backe againe by the city of TEGIRA, for he could haue passed no other way, but to haue turned down by the foote of the moūtaine. For al the valley that lay between both, was drowned with the overflowing of the riuer of MELAS, which euē fro his very hed carieth euē such bredth with it, as it maketh the marishes nauigable, so as it is vnpassable for any shallow it hath. Not far fro these marishes, standeth the tēple of Apollo TEGIRIAN, where was an oracle in old time, but left at this

At this day, & had neuer long continuance, but only vncill the time of the warres of the MEDES, when Echecrates was maister and chiefe priest there. And some holde opinion, that Apollo was borne there: for they cal the next mountaine to it, DEIOS, as the foote whierof the marishes of the riuer of MELAS doo end, and behinde the temple are two goodly springes, from whence cometh great abundance of good sweete water: wherof the one of them is called to this day the Palme, and the other the Oliue: And some say also, that the goddesse Latura was not brought to bed betwene two trees, but betwene these two springes: For mount TEGIRA is hard by it also, from whence the wilde bore came on a sodaine that flighed her. And the tale that istolde of the serpent Pytho, and of the gyant Tityus, doo both conspire, that Apollo was borne in the same place. I passe ouer manie other coniectures confirming the same, for that we doo not beleue in oure contrie that Apollo is among the number of those, who from mortall menne haue bene translated to immortall goddes: as are Hercules and Bacchus, that through the excellencie of their vertue, did put of mortalitie, and tooke immortality upon them: but we rather take him for one of those that neuer had beginninge nor generation, at the least if those things be to be credited, which so many graue and ancient writers haue left in writing to vs, touching so great and holy things. The THEBANS returning backe from ORCHOMENE, and the LACEDÆMONIANS on the other side returning also from LOCRIDE, both at one time, they fortunē both armies to mete about the city of TEGIRA. Now, so lone as the THEBANS had discovered the LACEDÆMONIANS, passing the fraire, one of them ranne sodainly to Pelopidas, and tolde him: Sir, we are fallen into the hands of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Nay, are not they rather fallen into ours, answered Pelopidas againe? with these wordes, he commaunded his horsemen that were in the reerward, to come before, and sett upon them: and him selfe in the meane time put his footemen immediately into a pretie quadron close together, being in all, nor aboue three hundred men, hoping when he should come to geue charge with his battell, he should make a lane through the enemies, though they were the greater number. For the LACEDÆMONIANS deuicid them selues in two companies, and euery company as Ephorus writeth, had five hundred men: and as Callistenes sayd, seven hundred: Polybius, and diuers other authors saye, they were nyne hundred men. So, Theopompus and Gorgolaon, the Captaynes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, lustely marched agaynst the THEBANS: and it fell out so, that the first charge was giuen, where the chieftaynes or generalls were of either side, with great furie on eyther parte, so as both the generalls of the LACEDÆMONIANS which sett vpon Pelopidas together, were slayne: They being slayne, and all that were about them, being either hurt or killed in the fild: the rest of the armie were so amased, that they deuicid in two, and made a lane on either side, for the THEBANS to passe through them if they would. But when they saw Pelopidas went not to take the passage they offered him, and that he came on still with his men to set upon those that were yet in battell raye, and slue all them that stood before him: then they turned tayle, and tooke them to their legges. Howbeit the THEBANS did not chafe them farre, fearing the ORCHOMENIANS who were not farre from them; and the new garrison besides, that were come from LACEDÆMON not long before. And this was the cause they were contented that they had ouercomē them by force, and had passed through their armie in despite of them, and broken and ouerthrowen them. So when he had set vp markes of triumphe, and spoyled their slayne enemies, they returned home againe, glad men for their obteyned victory. For in all the warres the LACEDÆMONIANS euē made, as well with the GRECIANS, as with the barbarous people also, there was neuer chronicle mencioned at any tyme; that their enemies being so fewe, did overcome them that were so many, nor that they were overcome also by any number equall in battell: Whereupon they grew to coragious and terrible, that no man durst once abyde them: for their only fame did so terrifie their enemies that came to fight agaynst them, that they thought with no equall force to be able to performe as much as they had done. But this battell of TEGIRA was the first that made both them and the other GRECIANS knowe, that it was not the ryer of EVROTA alone, nor the valley that lyeth betwene the ryers of CNACION, and of BABYCH, that breedeth the valiant and hardy fighting men: but that it is in all places else, where they learne young men to be ashamed of dishonest and vile things, and to venter their liues for honest causes, fearing more dishonorable reproche, then honorable danger. These are the people most to be feared, & are most terrible also to their enemies. And for the holy bad we mentioned before, it is said, Gorgidas was the first erecter of the same. They were three hundred chosen men entertained by the state, and they alwaies kept within the castell of CADMEA, and the bande was called the townes bande: for at that time, and specially in that part of GREECE, they called the castles and great houses in cities, the townes. Other say it was a band of footemen that were in loue one with another. And therefore Parmenes pleasant words are noted, saying, that Nestor could no skyll to set an armie in battell raze, seeing he gaue the GREECIANS counsell, in the ILIADS of HOMER, that they should set them in battell raze, euery countrie and tribe by them selues:

*That by affections force, and lynkes of kindly loue,

*The Goddeſſe

For, saide he, one frende should rather be set by another that loues together: because in danger, men commonly do little regarde their contrie men, or suche as are of their tribe. But men that doo loue one another, can neuer be broken nor overcome: for the passion of loue that entertaineth eche others affection, for affection sake, dothe kepe them from forsaking one another. And those that are beloued, being ashamed to doo any vile or dishonest thing before those that loue them, for very loue will stick one by another to the death. And sure the reason is good, if it be true that louers doo in deede more regard them they loue, though they be absent: then other that be present. As appeareth by the example of him, that being stricken downe to the ground, his enemy lifting vp his swoorde to kyll him, he praised him he would geue him his deatnes wounde before, left his frende that loued him, seeing a wounde on his backe, should be ashamed of him. It is reported also, that Iolauus being beloued of Hercules, did helpe and accompanie him in all his labors and quarrels. Whereupon Aristotle writeth, that vnto his time, such as loued hartly together, became sworne brethren one to another, upon Iolauus tombe. And therefore me thinkes it is likely, that this bande was first called the holy bande, by the selfe same reason that Plato calleth a loue, a diuine frendly goddes appointment. It is written also, that this bande was neuer broken, nor ouerthrowen, before the battell of CHARONIA: After that battell, Philip taking vewe of the slaine bodies, he stayed in that place where the foure hundred men of that bande laye all dead on the ground, one harde by another, and all of them slayne and thrust through with pikes on their brestes, whereto he wondered muche: and being tolde him that it was the louers bande, he fel a weeping for pittie, saying, Wo be to them that thinke these men did, or suffered any euill or dishonest thing. And to be short, the misfortune of Laius, that was slaine by his owne brother Oedipus, was not the first originall cause of this custome, that the THERBANS beganne to be in loue one with another as the POETS write: but they were their first lawmakers, who perceiving them to be a stout & fierce nation of nature, they sought euen for their youthe to make them gentell and ciuill, and therefore in all their actions both of sport and earnest, they continually acquainted them with playing of the flute, being highly esteemed of them in those dayes. They brought in the vse also to make loue, in the midst of all their youthfull sportes & exercises of their bodies, to frame the young mens manners, and to bring them to a ciuill life. And therefore they had reaso that gaue the goddeſſe HARMONIA to the THERBANS, for defender and patronesse of their citie, who was begotten (as they say) betwene Mars and Venus. For that geueth vs to vnderstande, that where force and warlike courage is ioyned with grace, to winne and perfwade: all things by this vnion and accord are brought, to a goodly, profitable, and most perfect government. Now, to returne againe to the matter of this holy bande of the THERBANS. Gorgidas deuinding it in the former rankes, and placing it all alongest the fronte of the battell of the footemen, it did not appeare what they were able to doo of them selues, for that he brought them not all into one body: so as thereby they might see what seruice the whole companie coulde doo, being together, considering that it was deuinded and mingled amongst manie other, that were a great deale of lesse value then them selues. But Pelopidas that had made good proofe of their valiauntes before, when they fought about about him of them selues, without others by them, at TEGIRA would neuer after deuinde nor separt them one from the other, but keeping them together as one entier body that had all his members, he would alwaies beginne with them to geue a charge, in his most dangerous battels. For, as we see in running of coches at games, that horses being tyed all together in afronte, doo runne faster and stronger, then they doo when they are loſe, and put to it alone: and not for that they being many together doo breake through the ayer better, but for that the contention and enuy betwene them to outtronne one another doth in dede set their hartes and stomakes a fyre. Euen so he thought, that valiaunt men geuing one another a desire and enuy to doo well, should haue the more corage, and woulde be of greater force, when they fought one in anothers fight. But the LACEDÆMONIANS afterwards being at peace and league with all the other GREECIANS, proclaymed open warres against the THERBANS onely: and kyng Cleombrotus went to inuade them with an armie of tenne thousande footemen, and a thousande horsemen. Whereupon, the THERBANS were not only in the like danger they stood in before to lose their libertie, but the LACEDÆMONIANS did openly threaten they would vtterly destroy them for euer: so that all the contrie of BOEOTIA stood in greater feare, then euer they did before. And one day as Pelopidas went out of his house to goe to the warres, his wife bringing him out of the doores to take her leaue of him, weeping, she praised him hartely to looke well to him selfe. But he answered her againe: my good wife, it is for priuate souldiers to be careful of them selues, but not for captaynes, for they must haue an eye to saue others liues. And when he came to the campe, he founde the captaynes and the Lieutenantes of the armie, in sundrie opinions: and he was the first that agreed with Epaminondas opinion, who thought it best they should geue battell to the enemies. Pelopidas at that time was neither governor of BOEOTIA, nor general of the armie, but onely captaine of the holy bande: notwithstanding they had great affaile in him, & gaue him great authoritie in counsaile concerning their affaies: such as became a man that had made so good testimonie of his naturall loue & affection to his contrie, as he had done. Now, being determined in counsaile that they should geue the enemy battell, they all mustred together in the valley of LEVCTRES, where he had a vision in his dreame, that troubled him verie muche. In that valley there are the tombes of the daughters of one Scedafus, whiche by reason of the place, they call the LEVCTRIDES, for that they were buried there, after they had bene defyled and rauished, by certaine guesstes of the SPARTANS that laye in their house, trauayling that way. This act being so horrible and wicked, the poore father of these defiled virgines, coulde neither haue iustice, nor reuenge of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and therefore after he had bande and cursed the LACEDÆMONIANS with most horrible and execrable raylings and curses as might be possible, he kyllid him selfe vpon the graues of his daughters. The LACEDÆMONIANS had many fundrie oracles, prophecies & signes of the goddes to warne them, to take heede of the wraethe of the LEVCTRIDES: howbeit euerie man vnderstoode not the signification of this prophecie, but were deceiued by the equiuocation of the name. For there was a litle towne in the contrie of LACONIA, standing upon the sea, called LEVCTRYM: and in ARCADIA also by the citie of MEGALIPOLIS, there was another towne called by the same name. This misfortune chaunced longe before the battell of LEVCTRES: but then Pelopidas dreaming in his tente, thought he sawe in a vision the daughters of Scedafus weeping about their graues, and cursing the LACEDÆMONIANS: and that he sawe their father also, commanding him to sacrifice a red mayden to his daughters, if they woulde obtaine the victorie. This commaundement at the first, seemed verie cruel and wicked: whereupon when he rose, he went to the Prognosticators and generalls of the armie, and tolde them his dreame. So, some of them saide, this was no matter to be lightly passed ouer, but to be considered of, alledging manie examples in the like cases. As of Menecius the sonne of Creon in olde time, and of Macaria the daughter of Hercules. And yet of later memorie, the wife Pherecydes, whome the LACEDÆMONIANS slue, and whose skynne they kynges doo keepe at this daye, by commaundement of an oracle. And Leonidas, who following a prophecie of the goddes, did as it were sacrifice him selfe, for the safetie of GREECE. And furthermore, the younge boyes which Themistocles did sacrifice to Bacchus Omestes (to say, eating rawe fleshe) before the battell of Salamina. And all these sacrifices were acceptable to the goddesses, as the victories following did plainly shewe it. In contrarie manner also king Agessilaus, coming from those very places, from whence king Agamemnon came in the time of the warres of Troia, and goinge againe against the same enemies: dreamed one night in the citie of Avidis, he sawe the goddess Diana, asking him his daughter for sacrifice. But he tenderly loving her, would by no means performe it: and thereupon was compelled to breake of his iorney, before he had executed his enterprise, and departed with small honor. Other to the contrarie stood to it slowly, and saide it was not to be done. For, so cruell, abhominable, and brutish a sacrifice, could not be acceptable to any of the goddesses, nor to any god, better or mightier then ours: considering that they be no impressions in the ayre, nor gyants that rule the world, but the one onely mightie & eternal, God, father of gods, & men. And, to beleue that either goddess or demy goddess doo delite in murder, or theading of mans blood, it is a meere mockery and folly. But, admit it were so, they were no more to be regarded therein, then those that have no power at all: for it is a manifest token of a wicked spirit, when they haue suche damnable and horrible desires in them, and specially if they abide styll with them. Now, the generall and heads of the armie of the Thebans being of fondry opinions, & Pelopidas being more afraid then before, by reason of their disagreement: a young mare colt, or sylle, breaking by chaunce from other mares running and flying through the campe, came to staye right against them. Then euery man beganne to looke upon her, and to marke what a faire sylle it was, and red colored euery where, and what a pride the tooke with her selfe to heare her owne neyting. Theocritus then the soothesayer being amongst them, did beholde her, and knew straight what the sylle ment, and so cried out forthwith: O happie Pelopidas, loe here is the sacrifice thou lookest for, seeke no other virgin for thy sacrifice, but take this that God him selfe doth send thee. When Theocritus had saide so, they tooke the sylle, and laide her upon the tombe of Seedsus daughters, and put garlandes of flowers about her, as they handled other sacrifices: and then after their prayers made to the gods, they did sacrifice her with great ioye, and told Pelopidas vision in his dreame the night before through all the campe, and the sacrifice they had made also according to the signification thereof. Moreouer, when they came to ioyne battell, Epaminondas being generall, drew all his army on the left hande, because he would bring the right winge of the enemies army (where they had placed the naturall Spartans) further from the other Grecians their frendes and allies, that were set in the other wing of their battell: that he comming with his whole power together to geue a charge vpon Cleombrotus their king (being in a corner by him selfe) might be distressed or ouerthrowen. The enemies synding Pelopidas intent, beganne to chaunge their order, and hauing mentow, ment to thruste out their right winge at length to compasse in Epaminondas. But Pelopidas in the meane time sodainly preuented them, and running with great furie with his squadron of three hundred men, he set upon Cleombrotus before he could disorder his men to put furth the right winge, and ioyne them together againe. And so he founde the Lacedaemonians not yet settled in their ranks, and brake them in this disorder, thrusting one in anothers place to put them felues againe in order: notwithstanding the Lacedaemonians of all other men were the only capitaines and most expert souldiers in marshall discipline, as men so trained and practised, that no sodaine altering, of forme or order in their ranks, coulde either trouble or disorder them. For they were men so trained, that they could turne head or side vpon any sodaine occasion offered, and coulde fight and order them felues in battell euery way alike. So Epaminondas going to geue thonsel upon them alone, with the whole force of his battaile together, not tarrying for others: and Pelopidas also with an incredible courage and readines, presenting him selfe in battell before them, did put them into such a terrible feare, that they cleane forgotte their skill in fightinge, and their wonted courage fayled them. For they cowardly turned their backs, and their were moe Lacedaemonians slain that day then euer were before in any former battell. Pelopidas therefore, being netter governor of Borotia, nor general of all the army, but onely captain of the holy band did notwithstanding winne as muche honor and glorie of this victorie, as Epaminondas, that was governor of Borotia, and generall of all the armie. In dede afterwards they were both governors of Borotia together, when they inuaded the contrey of PELOPONNESVS: where they made most parte of the cities & people rebell against the Lacedaemonians, and take their parte. As the ELIANS, the ARGIVES, and all ARCADIA, and the best parte of LACONIA selfe, notwithstandinge it was in the hart of winter, and in the shortest dayes of the yeare, and towards the latter ende also of the last moneth of their yeares authority and rule, hauing not many dayes to cōtinue in office, being forced to leaue their authority, upon paine of death if they did refuse, vnto other officers new chofen, the beginning of the next moneth following. Whereupon their other companions, & governors also of the contrey of Borotia, what for feare to incurre the daunger of the lawe, as also to auoyde the trouble to lye in campe in the sharpest of winter: they did vrge and perswade them to bring the armie backe againe into their contrey. But Pelopidas was the first that yielded to Epaminondas opinion, and wanne the other Thebans also to consent vnto it, to be contented to be led by them, to geue assaile to the city selfe of SPARTA. So, through their perswasion they passed ouer the riuer of Evyrotas, and tooke many litle towne of the Lacedaemonians, & wasted & destroyed all the contrey to the sea side, leading vnder their enignes an armie of threescore and ten thousand fightinge men, and all Grecians, the Thebans not making vp the twelut parte of them. Now, the honor and great reputation of these two perones, Epaminondas and Pelopidas, brought their frendes and confederates, that they followed them, without any resolution of counsell or publike order, and neuer opened their mouthes against them, but willingly marched vnder their conduction. And in my opinion, truly me thinks it is the first and chiefeest point in the lawe of nature, that he that is weake, not able to defend himselfe, should leane to one that is strong, and able to defende bothe. Euen much like to freshe water souldiers, and rawe sea men, that lying at sea in calme weather, & in safe harbor, are as lusty & bragge with the masters & botswaines as may be: and let a litle storme of weather come upon them sodainly, and that they be in any danger, then they looke on the masters, hoping for no life but at their handes. And euen in like manner the ELIANS and ARGIVES, who though in all assemblies of counsell they would euer iarre and strue with the Thebans, for honor and superiortie in the armie: yet when any battell came to be fought, wherein they saw there was daunger, then their peockes brauerie was gone, and they were glad to obey their generalles commaundement. In this iourney they brought all the cities of the prouince of ARCADIA to be in league with them, and tooke all the contrey of MESSENIA from the Lacedaemonians, which they peaceably enioyed: and called home againe all the ancient inhabitants of the same, and restored them to their contrey, and replenished the citie of ITHOM: Then returninge afterwards into their contrey by the citie of CENCHREES, they ouerthrew the ATHENIANS that came to trouble them, in entringe into the straight of PELOPONNESVS, supposinge to haue stopped their passage. Thus was the valliantnes of these two worthy men greatly commended and honored of euery body, for so many notable exploits & victories as they had wonne, and their maruelous good successe greatly wondered at. But as their glory and renowne increased abroad, so did their contrey mens malice and enuie encrease against them at home: who had prepared such a welcome home for them, as was to bad and vile for so honorable seruce as they had done. For Epaminondas and Pelopidas bothe, at their returne, were accused of treason. For there was a special law at THEBES, that commatided all such as should happen to be gouernors of Borotia, to resigne their office immediately to the new officers elect, at the beginning of the first moneth of the yeare, which in Borotia they call BOVCATION: and they had kept it foure whole moneths about their teatime appointed, in which time they had done all that we haue spok of before, as well in the prouince of MESSENIA & of ARCADIA, as also in the contrey of LACONIA. Pelopidas was the first of the two that was called in by proccesse, therefore he stood in the greater dainger: howbeit in the end, they were both discharged again. As for Epaminondas, he tooke his accusatiō & the attempt of his enemies (wherby they sought to haue caft them both away) quietly enough: ludging that pacience to those that deale in state and government, is a great heue of force & magnanimite. But Pelopidas being of a hotter nature, and more chollericke, and set on besides by some of his frendes, did take this occasion to be reuenged. Meneclidas the orator was one of those that came into Charon's house with Pelopidas, and Melon, but notwithstanding the THEBANS did nothing honor him, as they did the rest. He taking this ill at their hands, being maruelous eloquent of speeche, but vitiously geuen otherwayes, and a man of a vile and mischieuous nature: did fondly abuse his eloquence, falsely accusing those that were his betters, in honesty and credit. And not being contented with this first accusation, he practised so commonly, that he put Epaminondas one yeare from being gouernor of BOETIA, which he sued for; and moreover he was euer against him in all matters of state he tooke in hand. But he coule neuer bring Pelopidas out of fauour with the people: and therefore he fought to make bate betwixt him and Charon. For it is the common trick of all spitefull perones, when they can not be thought to honest men as those whome they eniue: to go about to proue that they are not so honest and meete men, as those whome they preferre and commend. So, in all his orations he made to the people, he continually extolled and commended Charon's noble actes and victories, and specially that victory about other, which the THEBANS wanne before the iorney of LEVCTRES, in a skirmish of horsemen, that was before the city of PLATEES, he hauinge charge of the same: of the which he woulde leaue this memory. Androcydes a CYZICENTIAN and painter, was at a price with the THEBANS to painte them some other battell in a table, and he did draw this worke in the citie selfe of THEBES: but as he was in hand with all the rebellion of the THEBANS fell out against the LACEDAIMONIANS, and warre followed on the necke of that, whereupon the painter forsooke THEBES, leauinge his worke in manner done and perfite. The THEBANS kept this table by them, and this Meneclidas moued the people they woulde hang it vp in some temple or publicke place with an inscription apont it, saying thus. This was Charon's victorie, of purpose to deface and obscure the glorie of Pelopidas, and of Epaminondas. To vaine and fond was his ambition, to set before so many noble battells and victories, one simple ouerthrowe of Charon, in the which Gerandas, one of the meaneft gentlemen of all SPARTA was slayne, and forty other with him: & this was all he did. Pelopidas miliked Meneclidas motion, maintaining that it was directly against the lawes of THEBES, which did expely forbid that no priuate person should be honored with the title of common victorie, but willed the glory thereof should be attributed to all the people generally. In dede Pelopidas in all his orations did greatly praise and commend Charon, notwithstanding, he made open prooffe, howe Meneclidas was an enuius and spitefull detractor, and a naughty wicked man, oftentimes askinge the THEBANS if they them selues were worthy of no honor? so as in the end he caused Meneclidas to be condemned in a great summe of money. But he finding him selfe vnable to pay it, beinge so great a summe: practised afterwarde to alter the whole state and gouernment. I thought good to dilate this at large, because me thinkes it doth somewhat declare Pelopidas nature, and maners, what they were. Now about that time, Alexander, the tyrant of PERES, was at open warres with many people of THESSALIE, and did vse all policie he coule, to bringe them all to his obedience. Whereupon the free cities sent their Ambassadors vnto THEBES, to pray them to fend them a captain, with an armie to aide them. Then Pelopidas seeinge Epaminondas occupied about the warres of PELOPONNESVS, did offer himselfe to the THESSALIAN Ambassadors, beinge lothe to drowne his experience and sufficiency in warres, with vnprofitable and tedious idleness, knowing that in those partes where Epaminondas lay, there neded no other captain. Now when he came with his armie into the THESSALIE the citie of LARISSA yielded presently vnto him: where the tyrant Alexander came to meete with him, and to pray him to treat a peace betwixt him and the THESSALIANS. Pelopidas attempted to bring it to passe, seeking in steade of a tyrant, to make him a gentle, iust, and lawefull gouernor of THESSALIE. But when he saw no perwasions could take place with the tyrant, and that he grew more stubborne and vnratable, and woulde not heare reason: and moreover that he heard many greuous cruelties of his great cruelties, and how they accused him to be a maruelous dissolute and vnriple person in all his doings, and extremely couetous besides: then he beganne to speake roundly to him, and to handle him roughly. But the tyrant thereupon tooke away secretly from him, and fled with his gard and souldiers about him. So Pelopidas leaunge the THESSALIANS out of all feare and danger of the tyrant, and furthermore in good peace and amity one with the other,

At her, he went into MACEDON: where Ptolomy made warre at that time with Alexander, beinge kinge of MACEDON, they bothe hauing sent for him to heare and determine the quarrell betwixt them, and also to helpe him that had the right, against him that did the wrong. So when he came thither, he pacified them bothe, and restored the banished men of either side, to their landes and goodes againe. For assurance of the peace, he tooke the kinges brother in ostage, whose name was Philip, and thirte other children of the noblest mens sonnes of MACEDON, whom he brought away with him to THEBES, to let the GREECIANS see, that the reputation of the THEBANS power stretched farre, & the renoune also of their manner of gouernment and iustice. It is the same Philip, that made warre afterwarde with the GREECIANS, to take their libertie fro them: howbeit being but a boy at that time, he was brought vp at THEBES in Pammenes house. And this is the cause, why some thought Philip did followe Epaminondas manner: and it might be peraduenture, he did learne of him to be quicke and ready in the warres, which in dede was but a peece of Epaminondas vertue. But as to the continency, iustice, magnanimie, and clemencie, which were the speciall pointes that made Epaminondas of great fame: Philip coule neither by nature, education, nor studie euer attaine vnto. The THESSALIANS hauinge sent afterwarde to THEBES, to complaine of Alexander the tyrant of PERES, that did againe molest and trouble the free cities of THESSALIE: Pelopidas was sent thither Ambassador with Ismenias, carying no power with him fro THEBES, little thinking he shoulde haue needed to haue made warres: whereupon he was compelled to take men of the contrie fild, vpon the instant necessitie offered. At the very same time also, all MACEDON was vp in armes. For Ptolomy had slaine the king, and vsurped the kingdom, and the seruants and frendes of the dead king called vpon Pelopidas for aide: who desiring to come euen vpon the fact, and hauing brought no men of warre out of his owne contrie with him, did presently leaue certaine men where he was, and so marched forward with them against Ptolomy. Nowe Ptolomy when bothe their powers met, did corrupt the souldiers Pelopidas had brought with money, to take his parte. But notwithstanding this policy he had practised, yet he was afeard of the name only, and greatnes of Pelopidas reputation: wherefore he went vnto Pelopidas, as to a better man than him selfe, and making maruelous much of him, and intreating of him, he made promise, and bounde it by othe, that he would keepe the realme for the brethren of the dead king, and that he woulde take all those for his frendes or enemies, whom the THEBANS did either loue or hate. And for assurance of his promise, he gaue him his sonne Phioxenus in ostage, and fifty other of his frendes, all the which Pelopidas sent vnto THEBES. But in the meane time, beinge maruelously offended with the treason of the souldiers against him, vnderstanding that the most parte of their goodes, their wiues and children, were in the citie of PHARSALIE, he thought if he coule winne that, it were a maruelous good way for him to be reuenged of the trechery of the souldiers against him: whereupon he leauid certaine THASALIANS, & went to that citie. Pelopidas was no sooner come thither, but Alexander the tyrant arriued also with his armie. Pelopidas supposing he had come to iustifie him selfe, clearing the complaints of the THESSALIANS made against him: went to him, though he knew him to be a very wicked man, and one that delited in murder and sheading of blood. Neuertheles, he hoped he durst not haue attempted any thing against him, for the authority and feignories sake of THEBES, by whom he was sent thither, as also for his owne reputacion. But the tyrant seeing him slenderly accompanied, and without traine of souldiers: tooke him prisoner, and wanne the city of PHARSALIE at that present time. But this act of his put his subiects in a great feare, who seeing him commit so shamefull a deede against all equity, did thinke straight he ment to spare no man, but would vse men, and all things else that came in his handes, like a desperate man, & one that reckned him selfe callt away. But when the THEBANS vnderstood this newes, they were maruelous forie, and straight sent an armie thither appointing other Captaines then Epaminondas, because then they had some mistaking of him. Alexander the tyrant hauing brought Pelopidas in the meane time to PERES, did suffer any man that woulde, at the first to come and see him, and speake with him: supposing his imprisonment had killed his hart, and had made him very humble. But when he was tolde the contrary, how Pelopidas did comforte the citizens of PERES, and willed them to be of good cheare, telling them the howe it was now come that the tyran should smirke for al the mischiefs he had done: and that he sent him A word to his face, he had no reason to hang and put his poore citizens daily to death as he did, with sundry kindes of cruell tormentes, who had in nothing offended him, & did let him alone, knowinge that if euer he got out of his hands, he would be reuenged of him. The tyran wondering at this great stomake of his, & at his maruelous constancy fearing nothing: asked what he ment to long for halty death? Pelopidas beinge tolde what he sayd, aunswered him againe: Mary, sayd he, bicause thou shouldest dye the sooner, beinge more odious to the goddes and men, then yet thou art. After this answere, the tyran would neuer suffer any man to come and speake with him againe. But Thebe, that was the daughter of the tyran Iason deceased, and wife at that time of Alexander the tyran, hearinge report of Pelopidas noble minde and corage by his keepers: she hadde a meruelous desire to see him, and to speake with him. But when she came to see him, like a woman she could not at the first discern the greatnesse of his noble heart, and excellent hidden vertue, findinge him in such misery: yet comiecturinge by exterior shew, notinge his simple apparell, his heares and beard growen very long, & how poorely he was serued, and worse entertained: she thought with her selfe his case was to be pittied, and that he was in no state mete for the glory of his name, wherewith the fell a weepinge for compassion. Pelopidas that knewe not what the was, beganne to mule at the first: but when it was tolde him she was Iasons daughter, then he curteously saluted her for her father Iasons sake, who while he liued was his very good frend. So Thebe said vnto him: my Lord Pelopidas, pittie thy poore Lady & wife. Truly so do I pittie thee, quod Pelopidas againe to her: that thou beinge no prisoner, canst abide such a wicked Alexander. This aunswere tickled Thebe at the heart, who with great impacience did beare the cruelty, violence, and villany of the tyran her husband: that besides all other infamous actes of his detestable life, committed Sodomy with her youngest brother. So she oft visitinge Pelopidas, and boldly makinge her moone to him, tellinge him closely all the iniuries her husbande offered her: through Pelopidas talke with her, by litle and litle the grew to abhorre him, and to conceiue a hate in heart against him, desiringe reuenge of him. But now the Captaines of the Thebans that were sent to deliuer Pelopidas, beinge entred into Thessalie with their armie: (whether it was through default of ignorance, or their mishap) they returned home with shame, and did nothing. Whereupon the Thebans at their returne home, condemned them euerie man in the summe of tenne thousande Drachmes, & sent Epaminondas thither againe with an other armie: at whose comming, all Thessalie rose incontinently, for the reputation of so great a captaine. And his fortune was so good, that he had in a manner vterly ouerthrowen all the whole state of the tyran: his frends and captaines were so much afraid, and his subiectes on the other side so well disposed to rebell, and maruelous glad for the hope they had, quickly to see the tyran haue his deservied hyer, for all his former wicked deedes he had committed. Notwithstanding, Epaminondas preferringe the deliuerie and safety of Pelopidas, before the consideration of his owne honor & glorie, and fearinge least Alexander seeinge him selfe in daunger to be turned out of all he had, fallinge in despayre like a bedlem beast, would bende all his desperation and fury against Pelopidas: he drew these warres out in length, compassinge him rounde about, but not fiercely settinge upon him, with culler to prepare his way the better by delayinge still, thereby to soften the cruell minde of this tyran, goinge on in this gentle sorte, and partly to cutte his combe and extreme pride, but specially to preferue Pelopidas, from the daunger and crueltie of his beastly rage. For he knewe right well he was a cruel man, and one that neither regarded reason, nor iustice in any sorte, consideringe howe he made some man to be buried alive, and others to be put in the skinnes of beares and wilde bores, and then to set houndes upon them to teare them in peeces, or else him selfe for his pastime would kill them, with shootinge or throwinge of dartes at them. And in the cities of Melliea and of Scotyva, bothe of them beinge in league and frendshipp with him, he spyinge a time one day when the citizens were assembled in counsaill together, sodainely compassed them in with his gard and souldiers, and put them euery one to the sword, euen to the little children. And he consecrated the darte also wherewith he had slaine his owne vnkle Polypbron, and hauing put garlandes upon it, he did sacrifice to it, as to a god, and called it Tychon, as one would say, happy killer. And an other time being

A in a Theater, where the tragedy of Troades of Euripides was played, he went out of the Theater, and sent word to the players notwithstandinge, that they shoulde go on with their playe, as if he had bene still amonge them: sayinge, that he came not away for any misliking he had of them or of the play, but bicause he was alhamed his people shoulde see him weepe, to see the miseries of Hecuba and Andromacha played, and that they neuer saw him pity the death of any one man, of so many of his citizens as he had caused to be slaine. The gilty conscience therefore of this cruell and heathen tyran, did make him tremble at the only name and reputation of Epaminondas: and as the common prouerbe sayth:

He lett his winges downe fall, not much unlike the cocke, which doth refuse the pit prepare, and lyst not bide the shooke.

B So he sent straight vnto Epaminondas to excuse him selfe. But Epaminondas would in no wise suffer the Thebans, through his meanes, to make league with such an hell hounde: no he yelded to abstynce of armes for thirty daies, upon deliuerie of Pelopidas & Ismenias into his hands, with whom he straight returned vnto Thebes. Now the Thebans beinge aduertised that the Lacedaemonians & the Athenians did sende Ambassadors to Artaxerxes the mighty king of Persia, to make league with him: they sent to him Pelopidas for them also, beinge wisely considered of them to sende a man of such fame and reputation. For Pelopidas passinge first through contries subiect to the king of Persia, his fame was such where he came, that the peoples talke was onely of him. For the report of the famous battells he had wonne of the Lacedaemonians, was not onely caried into the next regions and contries of Asia: but since the first newes of the journey of Leuctres was brought thither, Pelopidas hauinge after that wonne victorie apon victorie, his estimation grewe so great, as it was blowne abroad through the worlde, euen to the highest and furthest partes of the East contries. And when he came to the king of Persias court, the princes, great Lordes, and captaines of Persia that sawe him, had him in great admiration, sayinge: loe this is he that conquered the Lacedaemonians, and tooke all their feignorie, and authority from them, bothe by sea and by land, and draue the Spartans beyond the riuer of Evrota, and from mount Tavgetum, who not long before made warres with the great kinge of Persia, beinge ledde under their kinge Ageflaus, euen to the middest of Asia, for the realmes of Suse, and of Ecbatane. So king Artaxerxes selfe was very glad of his comming, and praised him aboute them all, and made his estimation greater then it was before, by his great and honorable entertaininge of him, meaninge thereby to returne the honor to him selfe againe: bicause menne shoulde thinke that the most famous men of the worlde came to honor him, and to see his court, as esteeminge bothe him, and his greatnesse, the onely happines of the worlde. But when he had seene his face, and heard him speake, and perceiued that his wordes were much grauer then the Athenians, and plainer then the Lacedaemonians: he then was further in loue with him then before, and without disguisinge he did honor and fauor him aboute all the other Ambassadors, who found that he made more estimation of him, then of the all. Notwithstanding, he seemed to beare greater good will vnto Antalcidas Lacedaemonian, then to any other of the Grecians: for that one day beinge at the table, he tooke a garlande of flowers from his owne head, and washed it in perfuming water, and sent it vnto him. In dede he did not vfe Pelopidas with that open familiaritie, yet did he send him the goodliest and richest presentes he could deuise, & granted him besides al his requestes he made vnto him: which were, that all the people of Greece should be free: that the city & contrie of Messina, should be inhabited againe: & that the citizens of Thebes by their successors should be take, as ancient frends & allies of the kings of Persia. So when he had receaued these aunswers, he returned home againe, & would by no meanes accept any of the great presents the king had offred him: which caused the other Ambassadors of the Grecians to be so ill welcome home to their cities. For amonge other, Timagoras was accused to the Athenians, & condemned to dye, and was executed: which if they did in respect of the great presents he had taken of the kinge, truly they had reason, & it was worthily done of the. For he tooke not only gold & siluer enough, as much as they would giue him: but receaued a very rich bed also, & Persian chamberlains to make and dresse it vp, as if no Grecian seruantes of his could haue serued that turne.

Moreouer he receaued foure score milche kine to the paille, & neateheards to keepe them, hauing neede of cowes milke belike, to heale a difeafe that fell vpon him: and woulde needes be caried in a litter apon mens armes from the kings court, vnto the MEDITERRANEAN sea, the king rewarding them for their paines that caried him, with foure Talents. Yet it seemeth the gifts he tooke did not offend the ATHENIANS so much, considering that Epirates (a drudge or tancquer bearer) did not onely confesse before the people, howe he had taken giftes of the king of PERSIA: but sayd furthermore, that he would haue a law made, that as they did verely choofe nine officers to rule the whole city: so that they would choofe nine of the poorest and meanest citizens, and sende them Ambassadors vnto the king of PERSIA, that they might returne home rich men with his giftes. The people laughed to heare him, but yet were they very angry the THEBANS had obtained all that they demanded: not considering that Pelopidas estimation and worthinesse did more preuaile, and take better effect, then all the orations the other could make, and specially to a Prince that sought alwaies to enterteine those GRECIANS, which were of greatest force and power in the warres. This Ambassade did greatly increase euery mans loue and good will vnto Pelopidas, because of the replenishinge againe of MESSINA with inhabitants, & the infranchising & setting at liberty of all the other GRECIANS. But the tyrant Alexander of PHERES, returninge againe to his old accustomed cruelty, and hauing destroyed many cities of THESSALIE, & placed his garrisons through al the contry of the PHTHIOTES, ACHATIANS, and MAGNESIANS: the cities beinge aduertised of Pelopidas returne againe to THEBES, they sent Ambassadors immediatly to THEBES, to pray the to sende the an army, & namely Pelopidas for Captaine, to deliuer the fro the miserable bondage of the tyrant. The THEBANS willingly graunted them, & put all things in readines very sodainly. But Pelopidas beinge ready to set forward in his iorney, there fel a sodain eclipse of the sunne, so as at none daies it was very darke in THEBES. Pelopidas seeinge euery man afraid of this eclipse above, he would not compell the people to depart with this feare, nor with so ill hope to hazard the losse of seuen thousande. THEBANS, beinge all billed to go this iorney: but notwithstandinge, he put him selfe alone into the THESSALIANS hands, with three hundred horsemen of strangers, that were glad to serue with him, with whom he tooke his iorney against the soothsayers mindes, and against the good will of all his citizens, who thought this eclipse did threaten the death of some great persone like him selfe. But Pelopidas though he needed no spurre to be reuenged apon the tyrant Alexander, beinge by nature hotte, and desirous of him selfe to reuenge the spite and villany he had offered him: yet he had a further hope to finde the tyrans house deuied against himselfe, by the former talke he had with his wife Thebe, in time of his imprisonment there. Neuertheles, the fame and reputation of the iorney vnderaken, did wonderfully increase his noble courage, and the rather, because he was desirous (all he coulede) the GRECIANS should see, that at the very same time when the LACEDÆMONIANS did sende gouernors & captaines to Dionysius, the tyrant of SICILE, to serue & aide him, & that the ATHENIANS as hyerlings tooke pay of the tyrant Alexander of PHERES, in whose honor they had set vp a statue of brasse in their city, as vnto their sauour: the THEBANS only at the selfe same time tooke armes against the, to deliuer those whom the tyrans oppressed, & sought to roote out al tyrannical gouernment ouer the GRECIANS. So, when he came to the city of PHARSALIE, & had gathered his army together, he went presently into the field to mete with the tyrant. Alexander, perceauing Pelopidas had very fewe THEBANS about him, and that he had twise as many moe THESSALIANS with him, then the other had: he went to the temple of THETIS, to mete with Pelopidas. There one telling Pelopidas, that Alexander was comming against him with a great power: Pelopidas answered him straight, al the better, we shal kil the more. Now, in the middelt of the valley, there are certaine round hills of a good pretty height, which they commonly call the dogges heads: they both strued which of their footemen should first get those hills. Pelopidas hauing a great number of horsemen, & good men at armes in the fildes, sent them before to giue charge apon the enemies, that pressed to winne the vantage of the place: & hauing ouerthrowen them, they followed the chafe all the valley ouer. But in the meane time, Alexander hauing his footemē hard by, marched forwards, & got the hills, because the THESSALIANS that were further of came to late: notwithstandinge, when they came to the hills, they fought forcibly Pelopidas second iorney against the tyrant Alexander of PHERES. The eclipse of the sunne made the THEBANS afraid.

Dionysius went by the temple of Thebes, vnto the tyrant Alexander.

A forcible to clime them vp, beinge very high and steepe. But Alexander comming downe the hill, gaue charge apon them to their disadvantage, & slue the first that gaue the attempt to get vp against the hill: and the residue beinge fore hurt, rettyred againe without their purpose. Pelopidas seeinge that, founded the retreat for the horsemen that followed the chafe, to repayre to the standard, and commaunded them they should set apon the footemen of the enemies that were in battell raye: and him selfe ranne to helpe those that fought to winne the hills. So he tooke his target on his arme, and passing through the rereward, got to the foremost rankes: to whome, the sight of his persone did so redouble their force and corage, that the enemies them selues thought it hadde beene a freshe supply of newe mens hartes and other bodies, then theirs with whom they hadde fought before, that came thus lustily to sette againe apon them. And yet they did abide two or three onfettes. Howebeit in the ende, perceiuing those men did still more fiercelly force to gette vp the hill, and moreouer how their horsemen were come in from the chafe: they gaue way, and left them the place, rettyringe backe by litle and litle. Then Pelopidas hauinge wonne the hills, stayed on the top of them, viewinge the army of his enemies, which were not yet returned from their flying, but waued vp and downe in great disorder. And there he looked all about, to see if he coulede spye out Alexander: and at the length he founde him out amongst others, in the right winge of his battell, settinge his men againe in order, and incoringe of them. After he had fere eye on him, it was no holding of him backe, his hart so rose against him apon sight of him, that geuinge place to wrath, he neither regarded his persone, nor the intent of his iorney, but runninge farre before his men, he cried with a lowde voyce to the tyrant, and chalenged the combat of him. The tyrant woulde not abide him, nor come out to fight with him, but fled, and hid him selfe amongst his souldiers. But for his souldiers, the first that thought to set apon Pelopidas, were slaine by him, and many left dead in the fildes. The residue standinge slowly to it, and close together, did passe his curaces through with their long pykes, and thrust him into the brest. The THESSALIANS seeinge him thus fore handled and distressed, for pities sake came runninge from the toppe of those hills, to the place where Pelopidas was, to helpe him. But euen as they came, he fell downe deade before them. Then did they together with their horsemen so fiercelly sette apon them, that they made the whole battell of the enemies to flye: and followinge them in chafe a great waye from that place, they couered the valley with deade bodies, for they slue aboute three thousande men. It is no maruell, if the THEBANS that were at Pelopidas death, tooke it very heauilie, and lamented bitterly: callinge him their father, their sauour, and maister, as one that hadde taught them the worthiest thinges that might be learned of any. But the THESSALIANS, and other frendes and confederates also of the cite of THEBES, besides their exceddinge in settinge out their common proclamations and edictes in prayse of his memorie, and doinge him all the honor that could be due to the most rare and excellent persone that euer was: they did yet more shewe their loue and affection towards him, by their passinge great sorowe and mourninge they made for him. For it is sayed, that they that were at the battell, did not put of their armor, nor vnbride their horses, nor woulde dresse their woundes, hearinge tell of his death: before they went first and sawe his body not yet colde with fightinge, layinge great heapes of the enemies spoyle about it, as if he coulede haue tolde what they had done, nor before they hadde clipped of their owne heares, and the heare of their horses, in token of sorowe. And many of them also, when they were come into their tentes and pavilions, woulde neither haue fier, eate, nor drinke: and all the campe was full of sorowe and mourninge, as if they hadde not wonne a notable victorie, but hadde beene ouerthrowen and made subiect by the tyranne. Afterwards when the newes of his death was spread through all the contrie, the Magistrates of euerie citie through which Pelopidas bodie was conueyed, went to receaue it verie honorable, accompanied with all the younge menne, Priestes, and children, carying tokens and crownes of triumphe, and other ornaments of golde. And when his funerall daye came, that his bodie shoulde be caried to be buried, the oldest and noblest persones of the THESSALIANS went to the THEBANS, and prayed them that they might haue the burying of him: and one amongst them beinge the mouth of the reste, spake in this manner to the THEBANS. My Lordes of THEBES, Pelopidas slaine.

Thebans.

our good beloued frendes, and confederates, we onely craue this good tume at your handes, wherein you shal much honor vs, & in our great calamity somewhat also cōfort vs. For we shall neuer more accompany Pelopidas aloue, nor requite his honorable desertes to vs, that he shal enue know them. But if it please you to let vs handle his body with our handes, and that we may bury him, and set forth his obsequies: we will imagine then at the least that you doe thinke that, which we our selues do certainly beleue that we THESSALIANS, not you THEBANS, haue receiued the greatest losse of both. For you haue lost in deede a worthy Captaine, and we haue not only receaued that like losse with you, but the hope also of recouering of our liberty. For how dare we againe fende to you for an other Captaine, when we can not redeliuer you Pelopidas: The THEBANS hearing their petition, graunted their desire: and in mine opinion, no funeralles could be done with greater pompe and honor, then the THESSALIANS performed his: being men that reckon not dignity, magnificence, & pompe, to consist in ornaments of tūory, nor of purple. As Philistus doth set it out, who praiseth to the moone the buryinge of Dionysius the tyrant of SYRACUSA, which was the ende of his tyranny, as a sumptuous conclusion of a statelie tragedy. And Alexander the great, at the death of Ephestion, did not only clippe his horse heares & mules, but plucked downe also the battellments of the wals of the city: because it should appeare, that the very walles them selues did mourne for his death, shewing that deformitie, in steede of their former beawtie. But all such thinges are done only by force and compulsion, upon the Lordes commandementes, which doe but raise vp enuy against their memorie for whom they are done, and hatred of them that are against their willes constrained to do the thing they misliked: & are no iust proofes of honor nor good will, but rather vaine shewes of barbarous pompe, and pride in him, that disposeth his authority and plenty of goodes, in trifling toyes not to be desired. Where contrariwise it plainly appeareth, that a priuate man dying in a foreine contry, by reason should be accomped most happy of all other creatures, that hauing neither his wife, kinne, nor his children by him, he should be conueyed to his funeralles, accompanied with such multitudes of crowned people and number of cities, enuying one an other who should most honor the funeralles, as being vnrequested, & least of all compelled. For faith Esope, the death of a happy man is not greuous, but most blessed, seeing it bringeth all good mens doinges to happines, and leaueth fortune to her fickle change, and sportinge pleasure. But in my iudgement, a LACEDÆMONIAN spake better, when he sayd Diagoras an old man, that had him selfe in old time gotten victory in the games Olympicall, & had sene besides, his own childrē, & his childrens childrē (both sonnes & daughters) crowned with victories also in the self same games: O Diagoras, die presently, els thou shalt neuer come to heauen. But these victories of the Olympicall & Pythian games, whosoever should put the al together, are not to be cōpared with one of the battels only, that Pelopidas hath foughten & wonne: hauing spent the most parte of his time in great calling and dignity, & lastly ended the same, beinge gouernor of BOBOTIA the third time (which was the highestt office of state in all his contry) when he had distroied the tyrans that kept the THEBANS in bondage, and was also slaine him selfe, valiantly fighting for the recovery of the THESSALIANS liberty. But as Pelopidas death was greuous to the THEBANS friends & confederats: so fell it out very profitable for them. For the THEBANS hearinge of Pelopidas death, did not delay reuenge, but sent an army forthwith of seuen thousande footemen, and seuen hundred horsemen, vnder the conduct of Malchus, and of Diogiton. They findinge Alexanders army ouerthrowen, & that he had lost the most parte of his strength, did compel him to geue vp the THESSALIANS townes he kept by force against the, & to set the MAGNESIANS, the PHTHIOTES, & the ACHAIANS at liberty, withdrawing his garrisons he had placed in their strong holdes: and therewithall to sweare, that from thence forth he would marche vnder the THEBANS, against any enemy they should leade him, or commaunde him to go against. So, the THEBANS were pacified upon these conditions. Now will I tell you how the gods plagued him soone after for Pelopidas death, who (as we haue tolde you before) had pretily instructed Thebe his wife, that she should not feare the outward appearance nor power of his tyranny, although he were enuironed with fouldiers of banished mē, whom the tyrant entertained to gard his person. Her self on the other side, fearing his fallhode, as also hating his cruelty, conspired her husbands death with her three brethren,

Tisiphomus,

Tisiphomus, Pytholaus, & Lycophron, & executed her cōspiracy after this sorte. The tyrans palice where he lay, was straightly garded euery where with fouldiers, who nightly watched his person: but their bed chamber which they cōmonly vsed to lie in, was in the top of al his palice, where they kept a dog tyed at the chamber dore, to giue warning, which was a terrible dog, and knewe none but the tyrant and his wife, and his keeper that gaue him meate. Nowe when Thebe purposed to worke her feare, she locked vp her three brethren a whole day neere vnto their bed chamber. So when night was come, and being bed time, she went her selfe alone according to her māner, into Alexanders chamber: and finding him a sleepe, she staid out straight againe, and bad the keeper of the dogge to cary the dogge away, for her husbande was disposed to take rest, and would haue no noyse. There was no way to get vp to this chamber but by a ladder, which she let downe: and fearing least her brethren should make a noyse, she had couered the ladder staues with wolles before she let it fall downe. When she had gotten them vp with their swordes, and had set them before the dore, she went first her selfe into the chamber, & tooke away the tyrans sword that hong at his beds head, and shewed it them, as a token geuen them that he was a sleepe. Vhen it came to the pinche to do the deede, these young men were afrayed, and their heartes beganne to faile them. But she tooke on with them, and called them cowardly boyes, that would not stande to it, when it came to the point, & with all swaie in her rage, that she would goe wake the tyrant, and open all the treason to him. So partly for shame, and partly for feare, she compelled them to come in, and to step to the bed, her selfe holding a lampe to light them. Then one of them tooke him by the feet, and bounde them hard: an other caught him by the heare of his head, and pulled him backward: & the third thrust him through with his sword. So by chance he dyed sooner then he should haue done, and otherwise then his wicked life deserued, for the maner of his death. So Alexander was the first tyrant that was euer slaine by the treason of his wife, whose body was most villanously & dispitefully vsed after his death. For when the townes men of PHERES had drawn him through the city in myer and dirt, they cast him out at length to the dogs to deuoure.

THE LIFE OF Marcellus.

Marcellus
knew.

condemned.

Marcus Claudius that was five times Consull at ROME, was the sonne A (as they say) of another Marcus; and as Posidonius wryteth, he was the first of his house furnished Marcellus, as who would say, a marshall & warlike man by nature. For he was cunninge at weapons, skillfull in warres, stronge and lusty of body, hardy, and naturally geuen to fight. Yet was he no quarreller, nor shewed his great corage, but in warres against the enemy: otherwise he was euer gentle, and fayer conditioned. He loued learning, and delired in the Greeke tongue, and much esteemed them that could speake it. For, he him selfe was so troubled in matters of state, that he could not study and follow it, as he desired to haue done. For if God (as Homer sayth) did euer make men

To use their youth in warres, and battells fierce and fell, till crooked age came creeping on, such fates for to expell:

They were the noblest and chiefeest men of ROME at that time. For in their youth, they fought with the CARTHAGINIANS in SICILE: in their middle age, against the GAVLES to kepe them from the winning of all ITALIE: & againe in their old age, against Hannibal & the CARTHAGINIANS. For their age was no priuiledge for them to be dispenced with, in the seruice of their warres, as it was else for common citizens: but they were bothe for their nobilitie, as also for their valliantnes and experience in warres, driuen to take charge of the armies deliuered them, by the Senate & people. Now for Marcellus, there was no battell could make him giue ground, beinge practised in all fights: but yet he was more valliant in priuate combat C man for man, then in any other fight. Therefore he neuer refused enemy that did chalenge him, but slue all those in the fildes that called him to the combat. In SICILE he saued his brother Offacilius life, beinge ouerthrowen in a skirmish: for with his shielde he couered his brothers body, & slue them that came to kill him. These valliant partes of him, beinge but a young man, were rewarded by the generall vnder whom he serued, with many crownes, and warlike honors, vsually bestowed upon valliant fouldiers. Marcellus increasinge still his valliantnes and good seruice, was by the people chosen Edilis, as of the number of those that were the

worthiest

A worthiest men, and most honorable: and the Priestes did create him Augure, which is a kinde of Priesthoode at ROME, hauinge authority by law, to confider and obserue the flying of birds, to diuine and prognosticate thinges thereupon. But in the yere of his office of Edile, he was forced against his wil to accuse Capitolinus, his brother in office with him. For he beinge a rash, and dissolute man of life, fell in dishonest loue with his colleagues sonne Marcellus, that bare his owne name: who beinge a goodly young gentleman, and newly come to mans state, was as well thought of, and taken of euery man for his manhoode and good qualities, as any way for his beaury and perfonage. The first time Capitolinus moued this dishonesty to him, he did of him selfe repulle his shameles offer, without any others priuite: but when he saw he came againe to tempe him the seconde time, he straight reuealed it to his father. Marcellus his father beinge maruelously offended withall, (as he had good cause) went and accused Capitolinus before the Senate. Capitolinus at the first, layed in many exceptions and fained excuses, to kepe him from appearing, and in the end he appealed to the Tribunes of the people: but they declared plainly they would not receiue his appeale, nor take any knowledge of the matter. At the length he was forced to answer the matter before the Senate, and denied flatly that he attempted euer any such thinge, bicause there were no witnesses to proue it against him. Whereupon the Senate thought good to fende for young Marcellus, who comminge before them, bothe blushed, and wept together. The Senate seeinge shamefastnesse in him, mingled with teares, and a malice that coulde not be pacified without seekinge other proofe: they tooke it a cleare case, & so condemned Capitolinus presently in a great summe of money, which Marcellus conuerted into siluer vessell, to serue at sacrifices, and so did consecrate them to the seruice of the goddes. Now when the ROMAINES had ended their first warre against the CARTHAGINIANS, which held them fully the space of two and twenty yeares: Immediately after that, they beganne a newe warre against the GAVLES. For the INSVBRIANS, beinge a people deriued fro the GAVLES, & dwelling at the foote of the moitaines of the ALPES on ITALIE side, beinge able to make a good power of them selues, did notwithstandinge pray aide of the other GAVLES inhabiting on the other side of the mountaines: & they cauled the GASSATES, a mercenary people and hierlings to them that would giue pay, to bringe great numbers with them. Truly me thinkes it was a maruelous matter, and wonderfull good happe for the ROMAINES, that this warre of the GAVLES came not upon the, while they were at wars with the D CARTHAGINIANS: & that the GAVLES also had lien quiet all that while (as if they had purposely sworne to set upon the conquerors) expectinge still an end betwene the, & then to set upon the coquerors, when they had nothing to say to any other. Yet the scituation of their country did trouble the ROMAINES much, bicause they were so nere neighbours vnto them, & had warres as it were at their owne dores. And so did the ancient reputation of the GAVLES somewhat appawle the ROMAINES, who as it shoulde seeme they did feare more, then any other nation whatsoeuer: bicause ROME had bene taken before by the GAVLES. Since which time, a law was made, that Priestes and ecclesiasticall perones should be dispenced with, from going to the warres, onles the GAVLES did rise against them. The preparation they made for this warre at that time, did plainly show the feare they had of the GAVLES. For the world E thinks, that neuer before, nor since, there were so many naturall ROMAINES assembled together in fildes, as were then at that present. Moreouer, the newe come cruelty they vsed in their sacrifices, doth recorde this to be true. For before, they neuer vsed any straunge manner in their sacrifice, or barbarous facion, but were fauorable in their opinions about the ceremonies of religion, & agreeable to the GREECIANS, touching the seruice of the goddes. But then, they were compelled to obey certaine oracles, and auncient prophecies they found wrytten in SIBYLLES bookes: & they buried two GREECIANS aliue in the oxe market, a man & a woman, and likewise two GAVLES, a man and a woman. Vnto them they doe yet continew certaine secret anniuersaries in Noueber, that are not to be sene of euery body. The ROMAINES in their first battels of this warre, were often ouercommen, and did ouercome: but these battels were of little purpose, for ending of the warres. In the yere that C. Quintius Flaminius, and P. Furius Philo were Consuls, and sent with great armies to make warres upon the INSVBRIANS, people subiect to the state of MILAN: newes were brought to ROME, that there was a riuer scene in the cōtry of ROMANIA, red as blood, & three moones also at the very faine time in the city of RIMINI. Furthermore, the Priestes & Soothsayers, that had obserued & considered the tokens, & significations of birdes on that day, when these two were chosen Consuls, they tolde plainly there was error in their election, & that they were directly chosen against all signes & tokens of the birdes. Thereupon the Senate wrote immediately to the campe to them, & willed them to come home to depose themselves of their Consulshippe, before they did attempt any thing as Consuls against the enemies. The Consul Flaminius receaued the letters in time; but because he was ready to giue battell, he woulde not open them, before he had first ouerthrown his enemies, & spoyled their countie, as in dede he did. But when he was come backe to ROME againe, and had brought marvellous great spoyles with him, the people for all that woulde not goe out to meete him, because he did not presently obey the letters they wrote vnto him, nor returned upon it as they commaunded him, but contemptuously, without any regard of their displeasure, followed his owne phantasie: whereupon they had almost flatly denied him the honor of triumphe. For his triumphe was no sooner ended, but they compelled him to giue ouer his Consulship, and made him a priuate man with his companion. The ROMAINES therein were so religiously bent, as they would all things shoulde be referred vnto the gods good grace & pleasure, & would suffer none to contemne the obseruations & prognosticatione of the soothsayers, nor their auncient vses & customes, for any prosperity & felicity that could happen. For they thought it more necessary and profitable for benefit of the common weale, that the Senate and magistrats shoulde reuerence the ceremonies and seruice of the goddesses: then that they shoulde overcome their enemies in battell. As for example Tiberius Sempronius, a man as much honored and esteemed of the ROMAINES for his iustice and valiantnes, as any other of his time: beinge one yeare Consul, did nominate & elect two other for Consuls the yeare following, Scipio Nasica, & Caius Martius. These two beinge entred into their Consulship, and sent from ROME also to their feuerall prouinces appointed them by lot: Sempronius by chaunce tooke certaine little bookes in his hande, where were briefly written the rules appertaining to the ceremonies of publicke sacrifice, and reading in them, he found a certaine ordinance he neuer heard before. And this it was. That if a magistrate were set in any tent or hyred house without the citie, to beholde and obserue the prognostications of birdes, & that vpon any sodaine occasion he were driue to come againe into the citie, before the birdes had giuen any certaine signes: the second time when he returned againe to ende his obseruations, there was no remedy, but he must leaue his tent or first hyred house, and take an other, and beginne new obseruations againe. Tiberius vtterly ignorant of this ordinance before, had kept his obseruations twise in one selfe house, and had chosen there, Nasica and Martius, Consuls to succede him. But when he knew he had offended, he tolde the Senate of it: who would not let slippe so little a fault: but wrote to the newe Consuls, and they straight left their prouinces, and returned againe to ROME, willingly resigning vp their offices. That was a pretty while after. Againe also, about the very present time we write of now, there were two Priestes of noble houses (and noble persones also) the one called Cornelius, and the other Cethegus, both which were disgraced of their Priestthoode, because they had not giuen the intrayles of the sacrificed beast in order, as they shoulde haue done. Quintus Sulpitius in like maner, was disgraced of his Bishopricke, because his miter which the FLAMINES doe weare, fell of his head in his sacrificing. Mimutius beinge Dictator also, and hauinge chosen Caius Flaminius generall of the horsemen: because they heard the noyse of a ratte at the electiō of Flaminius, they were both put out of their authoritie, and other chosen in their place. Now, though they were thus precise euen in trifles, it was not by reason of any supersticion mingled with their religion: but because they woulde not breake any iorte of the auncient institutions and ceremonies of their contrie. But to our storie againe. Flaminius beinge deprived of his Consulshippe, Marcellus was created Consul in his place, by the regents at that time called Interreges. Marcellus beinge inuested in his office, chose Cneus Cornelius for his companion: and they say, that the GAULES beinge inclined to peace, and the Senate of ROME also willinge to harken to peace, Marcellus did stirre vp the people, and made them rather desire warre. Notwithstandinge, they concluded peace at that time: but the GAULES Gessates immediately after renewed the wars againe.

For

For there came ouer the mountaines of the ALPES, a thirty thousand of them, & they ioyned with the INSVARIANS, which were many more in number then the selues. Now, they being in a maruelous idollty, went incontinently to lay siege to the city of ACARRAS, that standeth upon the riuier of Po: and during the siege, king Britomarcus taking ten thousand Gessates with him, went & destroyed all the contrie about the Po. Marcellus hearing that, left with his companion Cneus Cornelius, all the armed footemen, & the third parte of the horsemen, in his campe by ACARRAS: & he him selfe with the residue of the horsemen, & six hundred footemight armed, marched towards the enemy, traouelling night & day, vntill he met with the ten thousand Gessates, nere vnto a village of GAULES on this side the mountaines, called CLASTIDIUM, which was subiect not long before to the ROMAINES. So he had no leasure to take rest, nor to refresh his men a litle: for the barbarous people knew straight he was come, & tooke him for no better then by and by overcome, because he had so fewe footemen. And for his horsemen, the GAULES made no reckening of them: for besides themselves are very good men at armes, and excell all other in that fight, yet were their number of horsemen farre about Marcellus. Therefore they straight marched towards him in a maruelous furie, & with thunderinge shoutes, as if they would haue deuoured them at their comming. Britomarcus their king, aduanced him selfe before all his company. Marcellus fearing to be compassed in behinde, being so small a number: he put out the wings of his horsemen as much as he could, to haue the contrie at large, so that his two wings were very slender, vntill he came nere his enemies. And being ready to gallop towards the enemy, it fortuneth his horse beinge afraid with the noyse of his enemies, turned about, & caried Marcellus backe againe in spite of his teeth. But he fearing the ROMAINES supersticion, in taking this for an euill token, and that they would take a conceite upon the same: plucking the bridle with his left hande, turned his horse head againe vpon the enemy, and then he worshipped the sunne, as though he had not turned his horse by chaunce, but purposely for that cause. For it is the ROMAINES manner to turne about so, when they do honor their goddesses. So when they beganne to ioyne battell, he made a vowe to Iupiter Feretrian, to offer him vnto the goodliest spoyles of his enemies, if he did overcome. The kinge of the GAULES seeinge him at that instant, imagined by the markes and tokens he saw, that he shoulde be the general of his enemies: So he set spurres to his horse, and galloped towards him from all his company geuing him defiance, & chalenged him, shaking his staffe in his hande. He was the goodliest persone and strongest man of all the GAULES, and his armor was all guilt and flured, and so set forth with sundry workes and colours, that it shined as the sunne. Marcellus on the other side hauinge viewed all the army of his enemies thorough out, and perceauinge none so richely armed as the king: thought straight it was against him, that he had made his prayer and vowe to Iupiter. Then he put his horse in full carierr against him, and came with such a force & fury to him, that he pearced his armor with his staffe, and overthrew him, but yet he killed him not dead: whereupon he sodainly redoubled two or three strokes besides apon him, & so slew him right out. Then he lighted from his horse, & taking the dead kinges armor in his hande, he lift vp his eyes to heauen, and said, O Iupiter Feretrian, thou that doest from heauen beholde and direct all marshall feates and Captaines deedes: thy selfe I call to witness, that I am the third ROMAINE Captaine, that beinge generall of the army, haue slaine with my owne handes, the king and generall of the enemies: and I promise here to thee, to offer thee vp the richest spoyles of mine enemies, so thy godhead will vowchsafe to graunt vs the like good fortune in all this warre besides. His prayer ended, the men of armes of the ROMAINES ranne in among the horsemen & footemen of the GAULES, one being vnparted from an other: and fortune did so fauor them, that they wanne a passing victory, in such a straunge and wonderfull maner, as was incredible. For it was neuer seene before nor since, that so fewe horsemen did overthrow, so great a number of men of armes and footemen ranged together. Now when Marcellus hadde slaine the greater number of them, and had gotten their spoyles & all their baggage: he returned againe to his companion Cneus Cornelius, whom he founde makinge warres vnfortunatly with the GAULES, before the greatest and most populous city they had, called MELLEINE, which the GAULES on this side the mountaines take for their chiefe city, and from whence all other had their first originall. Whereupon they did all their possible endeour to defende it, and did as straightly besiege the Confull Corneilius, as he did them. Now, when Marcellus was come to the campe againe, the Gessates vnderstanding that their king Britomarus was slaine in batell, returned backe againe into their contry, & the city of Millaime was taken. After that, all the other cities there about yielded of them selues, without force of siege, and the Gavles wholly submitted them selues & all that they had, to the mercy of the Romaines, who graunted them peace vpon eafie conditions. For these famous victories, the Senate of Rome gaue all the honor of triumphe vnto Marcellus only, and that was as wonderfull and worthy a fight, as any that euer past before him: what for the infinite spoyle, and the numbers of great men taken prisoners, and also for the exceeding sumptuousnes & lately shew thereof. But the goodliest fight of all for the rarenes, was to behold Marcellus selfe, carying on his shoulders the whole spoyle of the barbarous king, to offer vp to Iupiter Feretrian. For he had cut downe a goodly younge oke of the mountaine, straight, and shurt vp very long, which he had trimmed vp in forme of triumphe, hanging all the armed peeces he had wonne of the king, very orderly rounde about it. Then, when all the shew of his triumphe was past, he him selfe tooke the oke on his shoulders, and gotte vp vpon his triumphing charret, and so marched through the city, carying these signes thereupon: which was the noblest fight, and honorablest shew, of the whole triumphe. His army followed after the charret, singing verses and songes of victory, in praise of the goddess and their Capitaine: and when he had passed through the whole city, and was come to the temple of Iupiter called Feretrian, there he set vp this younge oke, and token of triumphe. This Marcellus is the third and last Romaine Capitaine, to whom happened this honor in our age. For the first man that euer offered vp to Iupiter the spoyle of the general of their enemies, was king Romulus, who wanne the like spoyle of Acron, king of the Cæninians. The second was Cornelius Cossus, who slue Tolumnius, general of the Tuscanes. And the third was Marcellus, who slue with his owne handes Britomarus, king of the Gavles: and after him, no man euer since could obtaine the like good fortune. The god to whom these manner of spoyle are consecrated thus, is called Iupiter Feretrian, so termed as some write, because they do cary this token of triumphe to him, following the deuotion of this Greeke word, Feris, which signifieth to cary: for in those former times, many Greeke words were mingled with the Latine. Other affirme it is one of the furnames of Iupiter, signifying as much as lightening: for Ferre in the Latine tonge, signifieth to strike. And some say also, in warres it is properly to hurt or kill with his owne handes: for the Romaines do vse at this day when they geue a charge apon their enemies in battell, or that they haue them in chase flying, to crie, incouraging one another, Feris, Feris: which is as much, as kill, kill. And the spoyle taken from the enemies also, are generally called Spolia: but those which Lieutenantes, generally, or generall, do take from the generall of their enemies, when they haue slaine them, they are called particularly Spolia opima. Yet some hold opinion, that king Numa Pompilius mentioning the rich spoyle, or Spolia opima in his commentaries, speaketh of the first, the second, and the third: and commaundeth that the first spoyle which are wonne, should be consecrated to Iupiter Feretrian: the second vnto Mars: and the third vnto Quirinus. And that they should giue to him that had wonne the first spoyle, three hundred Affes: the second, two hundred: & the third a hundred. But notwithstanding, the best opinion & vsuall taking of Spolia opima, referreth them to be the first spoyle wonne in a foughten field, & those which the Lieutenant of an army, or a general, doth take from the general of the enemies, after he hath slaine him with his owne handes. And thus much for declaracion of this matter. Furthermore, the Romaines were so ioyfull of this victory, & of their good successe in this warre, that they caused a masse cuppe of golde to be made of the spoyle they had gotten, weyinge a hundred pounde weight, which they sent to offer vp in the temple of Apollo Pythias in the city of Delphes, in token of thanks: and they made liberall diuision besides of the spoyle vnto their frendes and confederates, and sent a great parte of it vnto Hieron king of Syracusa, who was their confederate. Not long after, Hanniball being entred into Italye, Marcellus was sent with an army by sea, into Sicilye. And after the great ouerthrow was giuen at the battell of Cannes, wherein they died so many thousande Romaines, & that very few of them saved them selues by flyinge, into the city of Cannys: they looked that Hanniball haunge ouercome the flower of all the

A the Romaines youth, and their greatest force, would not sayle to come straight to Rome. Wherefore Marcellus first sent fifteen hundred of his men by sea, to help to defende Rome: and hauing afterwards receaued commaundement from the Senate, he came to Cannys, where he tooke such as were fled thither for succor after the battell, & so brought them out to the fildes, to defende the contrie. Now the Romaines hauing lost the most parte of all their best Capitaines, in diuerse sundry battells before: of all those that remained, Fabius Maximus was the onely able and reputed man for commendacion of his honesty and wisdom, yet they misliked of him notwithstanding, for a timorous man, and of no corage, as a man to ful of doubts and consideration, and loth to put any thing in hazard: saying, he was a good Capitaine to defende, but not to offende the enemy. Whereupon they thought good to ioine Marcellus with his youth & corage, with Fabius feminine feare and wisdom: and therefore some yeares they chose them both Consuls together, or else they sent one of them as Consul, and the other as Proconsull, eche in his turne, to the contrie where they hadde warres. And for prooffe hereof, Possidonius wryteth, that the Romaines at that time called Fabius Maximus their target, and Marcellus their sword. Therefore Hanniball him selfe layed, he feared Fabius Maximus as his gournor, and Marcellus as his enemy: because the one kept him from hurting of others, and the other did hurt to him selfe. Immediately after this great victory at Cannes, Hanniball souldiers became so bolde, so carelesse, and disordered, that they kept the fildes without feare of any thing, and disperfed them selues farre from their campe: wherefore Marcellus setting apon those stragglers, he slue them euery man, & so by litle and litle did still lessen the power C and strength of his enemy. Afterwards he aided the cities of Bizantium and of Nola, and stablished the true deuotion and loue of the Bizantines towards the Romaines: from thence he went to Nola, & found great sedition there betwixt the Senate & people, because the Senate could not keepe the people in obedience, but they would needes take Hanniball parte. The cause of the peoples stubbornnesse grew, by occasion of a gentleman of the city called Bandius, a noble gentleman to the people, and a valliant man of his hands. This Bandius hauing fought valliantly at the battell of Cannes, after he hadde slaine many a Carthaginian, was him selfe in the ende stricken downe, and founde lyinge amonge deade bodies, sore wounded and mangled: whereupon Hanniball greatly commending his valliantnes, did not onely let him go without ranfome, but furthermore presented him, & made him his hoste and frende. Hereupon Bandius at his coming home, to requite Hanniball honor and curtesie, became one of those that most fauored Hanniball, & most perswaded the people of Nola to take his parte. Notwithstanding this, Marcellus thinking it to great a sinne against the goddess, to put a man to death that had made so great prooffe of his valliantnes, and had serued with the Romaines in their greatest warres and extremest daunger, and who besides the goodnes of his nature, hadde a marvelous gift also, to winne mens good wills by his great curtesie: when this Bandius came one day to do his duty to him, Marcellus of purpose asked him what he was, though he had known him long before, only to take occasion to talke with him. The other answered him, his name was Lucius Bandius. Then Marcellus seeming to be marvelous glad, and to wonder at him, layed: and art thou that Bandius they speake of so much at Rome, E whom they say did so notable seruice in persone at the battell of Cannes, and neuer forooke Paulus Aemilius the Consul, but receaued so many woundes vpon thy body in defence of him? Bandius answered, that he was the man, and therewith shewed him many woundes he had apon his body. Marcellus then replied: alas, thou that cariest such notable markes of thy vnfaigned loue towards vs, what diddest thou meane, that thou camest not straight againe vnto vs? art thou perswaded we are so miserable & vnthankfull, that we will not worthily reward the vertue and valliantnesse of our frendes, whom our enemies selues do honor? After Marcellus had vsed this courteous speech vnto him, and had embraced him, he gaue him a goodly horse for seruice in the warres, & five hundred Drachmes of siluer besides. So after that time, Bandius did euer take Marcellus parte, and alwayes followed him, being very faithfull to him, F and shewed him selfe very feuaere and earnest to accufe them, that tooke Hanniball parte in the city: which were many in number, & had conspired among them selues, that the first time the Romaines should go into the fildes to skirmish with the enemies, they would slue the gates after them, & take the spoyle of al their cariages. Marcellus being informed of this treachery, did set his men in battell raye within the city, hard by the gates, & behind them he placed al the sumpters & carriage in good order: besides that, he made proclamation by trumpet, that no citizen upon paine of death shoulde approach the walles. This occasion drew Hannibal to come hard to the city, seeinge no watche upon the walles, and made him the bolder to come in disorder, imagininge there had bene some mutinie or fedition within, betwene the noble men and the people. But in the meane time, Marcellus set open the gates beinge hard by, and sayling out upon the sodaine with the best men of armes he had, he gaue a charge vpon Hannibal in the vordward. Immediately after came out his foreemen at another gate, running straight vpon Hannibal, with a wonderfull crie and howle: so as Hannibal to withstand them, was driven to deuide his men in two companies. But as he was deuindinge of them, sodainly a third gate opened upon them, from whence al the residue of the ROMAINES issued out, who sette vpon the CARTHAGINIANS on euery side, they beinge maruelously amazed to be so sodainly fet on, which they looked not for: so hauing their handes full with those that came first upon them, beinge scant able to defende them selues against them, and seeinge this newe and last charge also: they were forced to retire. This was the first time, that euer Hannibal souldiers beggan to giue place to the ROMAINES, who draue them backe vnto their campe, and slewe a great number of them, and did hurt diuerse of them besides. For some wryte, there were slaine of the CARTHAGINIANS at that conflikt, aboue fise thousande: and of the ROMAINES there died not past fise hundred men. But Titus Liuius doth not set out the ouerthrow so great, and yet confesseth that Marcellus wanne great honor by it, & that it made the ROMAINES maruelous valliant againe, after so many and sundry battells as they had lost one after another: for then they were perswaded that they fought not with an enemy altogether vnuincible, but that he might sometime also, as well as them selues, receiue both losse and hurt. Therefore, one of the Consulls dyinge about that time, the people caused Marcellus to be sent for, & placed him in his roome: and in spite of the Senate they deferred all deputation vntill his returne from the campe. Marcellus came no sooner to ROME, but he was chosen Consull in the deade mans roome, by all the voyces of the people. Notwithstandinge, when they went to choosé him, it thundered maruelously: which the Priestes & Augures tooke for an ill token, but yet they durst not openly speake against his election, because they feared the people. Howbeit Marcellus of him selfe did willingly giue vp his Consullshippe, and yet was it no exception to him for his seruice in the warres: for they created him Proconsull, and sent him againe to the campe at NOLA, where he did feuerely punish the such as tooke Hannibal parte. Who beinge aduertised thereof, came thither with all possible speede to helpe them: and euen at his first comming, he offered Marcellus battell, which refused it at that time. Neuertheles he tooke his time, when Hannibal hadde sent the best parte of his army to forrage, as meaning to fight no more battells: and then he set upon him, hauing giuen his footemen long pykes, such as they vse in fight upon the sea, and taught them also, howe to hurt the enemy a farre of, keeping them still in their handes. But the CARTHAGINIANS hauing no skill of their pykes, and fighting with shorte iauelings in their handes, did strike downe right blowes: which was the cause, that they beinge fet upon by the ROMAINES, were driven to turne their backs, & flee before them. So there were fise thousande of the CARTHAGINIANS left dead in the field, foure elephants slaine, and two taken alive: and furthermore, three dayes after the battell, there came a three hundred horsemen, some of them SPANIARDS, and other NUMIDIANS, that submitted them selues to the ROMAINES. Neuer came there such a misfortune before to Hannibal: who had of long time kept together in great loue & amity, an army assembled of sundry barbarous nations and people. Howbeit these three hundred continued euer after faithful to the end, both to Marcellus, and to all other Lieutenants & generals of the ROMAINES. Shortly after, Marcellus beinge againe chosen Consull the third time, went into SICILE. For Hannibal prosperous successe and victories had so incouraged the CARTHAGINIANS, as they sought againe to conquer this Ilande: and specially because that after the death of Hieronimus the tyran, there rose some tumult at SYRACUSA. Vpon which occasion, the ROMAINES had sent an army thither before, and a Prator called Appius: at whose handes Marcellus hauing

A hauing receiued the army, a great number of the ROMAINES became humble suiters to him, to pray him to aide them in their calamity, which was this. Of those that scaped from the battell of CANNES, some sauéd them selues by flying, other were taken prisoners, of which there were such a number, as it appeared that ROME had not people enough left onely to keepe the walles. Neuertheles, those few that remained, their hartes were so great, that they would neuer redeeme the prisoners, which Hannibal was contented to deliuer them vpon small ranome, but made a decree they should not be redeemed: and so suffered some of them to be killed, others to be solde for slaues out of ITALIE. And moreover, those that sauéd them selues by flying, they sent straight into SICILE commanding they should not once set foot againe in ITALIE, whilst they had warres with Hannibal. These were the men that came altogether, and fell downe at Marcellus feete, so soone as he arriued in SICILE, & humbly besought him, to appoint them to serue vnder some ensigne, that they might fight to do their contrie honor and seruice: promising him with teares running downe their cheekes, that their faithful seruice then shoulde witnesse for them, that the ouerthrow they had at CANNES, fell upon them rather by misfortune, then through lacke of corage. Whereupon Marcellus hauing compassion on them, wrote to the Senate in their fauor, & prayed them that they would graunt him licence to supply the bands of his army, as they diminished, with those poore ROMAINES his contrymen. Many reasons passed to, and fro, against this sute: neuertheles, it was concluded in the ende by the Senate, that the common wealth made no reckening of the seruice of faint harted men like women: wherefore if Marcellus thought good of their seruice, yet it shoulde not be lawfull for him to giue them any crownes or rewards of honor, for any notable seruice fouer they did, as all generallies are wont to giue to honest men that serue valliantly. This order of the Senate misliked Marcellus very much, who at his returne home out of SICILE, made his complaint in open Senate, and told them they did him manifest wrong: to deny him that fauor, that hauing done his common wealth such faithful seruice diuerse times, as he had done, he might not restore so many poore ROMAINES to their honor againe. Nowe, when Marcellus was in SICILE, he receiued great hurtes and iniuries by Hippocrates, generall of the SYRACUSANS: who, to pleasure the CARTHAGINIANS, and by their meanes to make him selfe chiefe Lord of SYRACUSA, did put many ROMAINE citizens to death. Whereupon Marcellus went and layed siege to the city of the LEONTINES, and when he had taken it by assault, he hurt neuer a townes man, nor naturall citizen of the same: but such traitors as he founde there, and had fled from his campe, & yielded to the enemies, them he caused to be whipped, and then hanged. But notwithstanding, Hippocrates had before caused it to be bruted at SYRACUSA, that Marcellus had put all the LEONTINES to the sword, not sparing liule children: and afterwards Hippocrates comming thither on the sodaine, in the feare and garboyle of this false bruite, he easily tooke the city. Marcellus hearing Hippocrates had taken SYRACUSA, left forth with the LEONTINES, & went with his whole army, & camped hard by SYRACUSA: and sent his Ambassadors to tell the SYRACUSANS truly, what he had done in the city of the LEONTINES, and quite contrarie to that they were informed of. Howbeit that prevailed not, for they beleued not Marcellus, because Hippocrates being the stronger, had wonne the city. Whereupon he beganne then to approach the walles, and to assault in euery quarter, as well by sea as by lande. Appius tooke charge of them that gaue assault by lande. Marcellus him selfe, with three score galleyes of fise owers at euery bancke, well armed, and full of all sortes of artillery and fire works, did assault by sea, and rowed hard to the walle, hauing made a great engine and deuise of battery, vpon eight galleyes chained together, to batter the walle: trusting in the great multitude of his engines of battery, and to all such other necessarie prouision as he had for warres, as also in his owne reputacion. But Archimedes made light accompt of all his deuises, as in deede they were nothinge comparable to the engines him selfe had inuented: and yet were not his owne such, as him selfe did reckon of, to shew singularity of worke and deuise. For those he had made, were but his recreations of Geometry, and thinges done to passe the time with, at the request of king Hieron: who had prayed him to call to minde a liule, his geometricall speculation, and to apply it to thinges corporall and sensible, and to make the reason of it demonstratiue, and plaine, to the vnderstanding of the common people by experiments, and to the benefit and commodity of vs. For this inuentiue arte to frame instruments and engines, (which are called mechanically, or organically, so highly commended and esteemed of all sortes of people) were first set forth by Architas, and by Eudoxus: partly to beautifie a litle the science of Geometry by this finenes, and partly to proue and confirme by material examples and fencible instruments, certaine Geometrical conclusions, wherof a man can not finde out the conceuable demonstrations, by enforced reasons and proofes. As that conclusion which instructeth one to seache out two lines meane proportionally, which can not be proued by reason demonstratiue, and yet notwithstandinge is a principall and an accepted ground, for many things which are contained in the arte of portraiture. Both of them haue facioned it to the workmanship of certaine instruments, called Mesolabes or Mesographes, which serue to finde these meane lines proportionally, by drawing certaine curve lines, and ouerthwart and oblique sextions. But after that, Plato was offended with them, and maintained against them, that they did vtterly corrupt and disgrace, the worthines & excellency of Geometry, making it to discerne from things not comprehensible, and without body, vnto things fencible and material, and to bringe it to a palpable substance, where the vile and base handie worke of man is to be employed: since that time I say, handy craft, or the arte of engines, came to be separated from Geometry, and being long time despised by the Philosophers, it came to be one of the warlike artes. But Archimedes hauinge tolde king Hieron, his kinsman and very frende, that it was possible to remoue as great a weight as he would, with as litle strength as he listed to put to it: and boasting him selfe thus (as they reporte of him) and trusting to the force of his reasons, wherewith he proued this cōclusion, that if there were an other globe of earth, he was able to remoue this of ours, and passe it ouer to the other: kinge Hieron wondering to heare him, required him to put this deuise in execution, and to make him see by experience, some great or heauy weight remoued, by litle force. So Archimedes caught hold with a hooke of one of the greatest carets, or hulkes of the king (that to draw it to the shore out of the water, required a maruelous number of people to go about it, and was hardly to be done so) and put a great number of men more into her, than her ordinary burden: and he himselfe sittinge alone at his ease farre off, without any straining at all, drawing the ende of an engine with many wheelles and pulleys, fayer and softly with his hande, made it come as gently and smoothly to him, as it had floated in the sea. The king wondering to see the sight, and knowing by proofe the greatnes of his arte: he prayed him to make him some engines, both to assault and defend, in all manner of sieges and assaults. So Archimedes made him many engines, but kinge Hieron neuer occupied any of them, because he reigned the most parte of his time in peace, without any warres. But this prouision and munition of engines, serued the SYRACUSANS turne maruelously at that time: and not only the prouision of the engines ready made, but also the engineer & worke maister him selfe, that had inuented them. Now, the SYRACUSANS seeing them selues assaulted by the ROMAINEs, both by sea and by land, were maruelously perplexed, and could not tel what to say they were so afayed: imagining it was impossible for them to withstande so great an army. But when Archimedes fell to handle his engines, and to set them at liberty, there fue in the ayer infinite kindes of shot, and maruelous great stones, with an vncredible noyse and force on the sodaine, upon the footemen that came to assault the city by land, bearing downe, and tearing in peeces all those, which came against them, or in what place soeuer they lighted, no earthly body beinge able to resist the violence of so heauy a weight: so that all their ranckes were maruelously disordered. And as for the gallies that gaue assault by sea, some were soncke with long peeces of timber like vnto the yards of shippes, whereto they fasten their sailes, which were sodainly blown ouer the walles with force of their engines into their gallies, and so soncke them by their ouergreat weight. Other being hoysed vp by the prooes with handes of Iron, and hookes made like cranes billes, plunged their poupees into the sea. Other being taken vp with certaine engines fastened within, one contrary to another, made them turne in the ayer like a whirlegigge, & so cast them upon the rockes by the towne walles, and splitted them all to fitters, to the great spoyle and murder of the persons that were within them. And sometimes the shippes and gallies were lift cleane out of the water, that it was a fearfull thing to see them hang and turne in the ayer as they did: vntill that casting their

A men within them ouer the hatches, some here, some there, by this terrible turning, they came in the end to be empty, and to breake against the walls, or else to fall into the sea againe, when their engines left their hold. Now for Marcellus engine, which he brought against the walles, vpon a bridge made of gallies ioyned together: that was called Sambuca, by reason of the facion it had like to an instrument of mulicke of the same name, which is a harpe. The same being yet a good prety way off fro the walls, there fell a great stone apon it sent fro the walls, weying ten talents. Then, a seconde after that, and a third one after that, the which falling all into this engine with such a thunder and terrible tempest, brake the fundacion of the engine, and tare all the bridge of the gallies ioyned together in peeces, that susteined it. So that Marcellus being amazed with all, not knowing well what it ment: was glad to retyre quickly, and sent to make his trumpet found the retreat to those that gaue assault by land. Hereupon they fate in counsaile to determine what was to be done, and they resolyed, that the next morning before day they shoulde approche the walles if it were possible: because that Archimedes engines, which were very strong and hard wounde vp, shoulde by this meanes fende all the force and furie of their stones and shot ouer their heades, and that neere hande also he coulde do no good with them, for that they had not the scope of their leauell and cartage they shoulde haue. But Archimedes had preuented this deuise by long preparation before, hauing made prouision of engines for farre and neere, the leauell and cartage whereof was proportioned for all distances: their shot thorte, the arrowes not very long, many holes and arches in the walles one harde by another, where there were store of crosbowes to kill neere hande, sette in such places, as the enemies coulde not see them without. Wherefore, when the ROMAINEs thought to approche, thinking they had bene safe and close, that no man saw them: it amazed them all when they were receaued againe with infinite shot, and striken to the ground with stones that fell apon their heades like leade: (for there was no parte of all the walles, from whence they had not the like (shotte).) Whereupon they were forced againe to retyre from the walles. And yet when they were further off from them, the arrowes, stones, and other kinde of shot that fue in euery place amonge them, killed a great number of them, scattered farre from thence: so that many of them were slaine and fore wounded, and diuerse of their shippes splitted, and they not once able to be reuenged, nor to hurt their enemies, because Archimedes had placed his engines very closely behinde the walles, and not apon the walles in sight of the enemy. So that it appeared the goddes fought against the ROMAINEs, they were so slaine and wounded, and yet they coulde not tell how, nor by whom. Notwithstanding, Marcellus escaped with life, safe from hurt, and mocking his workemaisters and engineers he had in his campe, he sayd vnto them. What, shall we not leaue to make warres with this Briarian engineer and Geomettrician here? who sitting still apon the wharfe, in sporting manner hath with shame ouerthrowen our navy, and exceeded all the fabulous hundred handes of the Gyants, discharginge at one instant so many shot among vs? For in deede, all the residue of the SYRACUSANS were, as the body and members of Archimedes preparation: and he him selfe was the only creature that moued and did all, all weapons else being quiet, and his engines only occupied, to assault and defend. At the length, Marcellus seeing his men thus afeard, as if they did but see the ende of a rope, or any peece of timber vpon the wall, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes was letting loose some of his engines apon them: he would no more approche the walles, nor geue assault, determininge to see if he coulde winne it by longe siege. Notwithstanding, Archimedes had such a great minde, and was so profoundly learned, hauing hidden in him the only treasure and secrets of Geomettrically inuentions: as he would neuer let forth any booke how to make all these warlike engynes, which wanne him at that time the fame & glory, nor of mans knowledge, but rather of diuine wisdom. But he esteeminge all kinde of handy craft & inuention to make engines, & generally all maner of sciences bringing common commodity by the vse of them, to be but vyle, beggerly, & mercenary drossie: employed his witte & study only to vntie things, the beavty and subtiltie whereof, were not mingled any thinge at all with necessitie. For all that he hath written, are geomettrical propofitions, which are without comparifon of any other writings whatsoever: because the subiect whereof they treat, doeth appeare by demonstration, the matter giuing them the grace & the greatnes, and the demonstracion prouing it so exquisitely, with wonderfull reason and facilitie, as it is not repugnant. For in all Geometry are not to be founde more profounde and difficulte matters written, in more plaine and simple termes, & by more easie principles, then those which he hath inuented. Now some do impute this, to the sharpnes of his wit & vnderstanding, which was a naturall gift in him: other do referre it to the extreame paines he tooke, which made these things come so easily from him, that they seemed as if they had bene no trouble to him at all. For no man liuinge of him selfe can deuise the demonstration of his propositions, what paine foucer he take to seeke it: & yet straight so soone as he commeth to declare & open it, euery man then imagineth with him selfe he could haue found it out well enough, he can then so plainly make demonstration of the thing he meaneth to shew. And therefore that me thinks is like enough to be true, which they write of him: that he was so rauished & dronke with the swete intylements of this Sirene, which as it were lay continually with him, as he forgate his meate & drinke, and was careless otherwise of him selfe, that oftentimes his seruants got him against his will to the bathes, to washe & annoynt him: & yet being there, he would euer be drawing out the Geometrical figures, euen in the very imbers of the chimney. And while they were annoynting of him with oyles & swete fauours, with his finger he did draw lines upon his naked body: so fast was he take from himselfe, & brought into an extasy or traunse, with the delite he had in the study of Geometry, & truly rauished with the loue of the Muses. But amongst many notable things he deuised, it appeareth, that he most esteemed the demonstration of the proportion betwene the Cylinder (to wit, the round coloume) & the Sphere or globe contained in the same: for he prayed his kinsmen & friends, that after his death they would put a Cylinder upon his tombe, containing a massie Sphere, with an inscription of the proportion, wherof the continent exceedeth the thing contained. So Archimedes being as you haue heard, did as much as lay in him, both saue him selfe & SYRACUSA from taking. But now againe to Marcellus, Marcellus during the siege at SYRACUSA, wanne the city of MEGARES in SICILE, one of the ancientest cities in all the Ilandes: & he tooke besides, the campe of Hippocrates, lying by ACILES, where he lue about eight thousand men, surprising them upon the sodaine, euen as they were preparing to lodge, & to fortifie their campe. Then he ouercame a great parte of the champion contrie of SICILE, & made the cities to rebel that tooke the CARTHAGINIANS parte: & in all the bandes he fought, he euer ouercame them that durst bid him battell. It chaunced afterwards, that he tooke a LACRDEMONTIAN Captaine prisoner, called Danippus: euen as he came out of SYRACUSA by sea. The SYRACUSANS desirous to redeme him, lent to him to pray he might be ransomed. They made many parles about his ransom, and drew out this practise to diuerse meetings: vntill Marcellus had taken good markes of a certeine tower, that had no great watch kept vpon it, & into the which he might secretly couey a certeine number of men, the walle of the city in that place being no very hard thing to scale. Therefore when he had geuen a good gesse by estimation at the height of that tower, by often approaching to it, hauing parled many a time hard by it: he prouided skaling ladders, & tooke the opportunity of a feast which the SYRACUSANS solemnized in the honor of Diana, on which day they gaue the selues to all feasting, sporting & playes. So he tooke not only the tower, but filled all the walls round about with armed men before day, & brake open the maine gate & entry of the citie called Hexapyle. And as the SYRACUSANS began to flirre, perceiving the ROMAINES on the wals: Marcellus made his men found their trumpets on euery side. Whereupon the SYRACUSANS were so afraid & amazed, that they beganne to flie, thinkinge all the city besides had bene taken, where in deede the greatest & strongest quarter of the city called ACRADINA, was not yet touched: because it is walled in rounde about, and separated from the rest of the citie, which is deuided into two other partes, the one called the newe citie, and the other fortune. The two partes whereof beinge wonne, Marcellus by the breake of the daye forced in by the gate or entrie of the Hexapyle. And when his Captaynes tolde him he was happie, to winne so goodly a citie, so easely: they say, that he lookinge about him, and consideringe the greatnesse & statelinelie of the same, he wept for verie pitie, foreseeinge whereto it shoulde come, thinking with him selfe what a sodayne chaunge it shoulde haue, when his armie came to spoyle and sacke the same. For there was not a Captaine that durst denie the fouldiers when they demanded the

A the spoyle, and yet were there many that would nedes haue it burnt and rased to the ground. But Marcellus would not agree to that in any case, and besides, it was fore against his minde to graunt them the spoyle of the goodes and laues: straightly commaunding them notwithstanding, not to lay handes of any free man, and not to kill, hurt, nor to make any SYRACUSAN slaue. Wherein, though he shewed great fauor and mercy yet it greued him to see so famous a citie, brought to that miserable state: and in the middelt of all the ioy he had for his victorie, he could not refrain from weeping for pity to see so rich and wealthie a citie, in the turning of a hand, spoiled, and brought to nought. For it is sayd, that the riches and goodes taken away at the sacke of SYRACUSA, were nothinge inferior to the spoyles of CARTHAGE, which was also sacked not longe after that: for the other parte of the city of SYRACUSA called ACRADINA, was soone after also taken by treason, and spoiled against the Captaines willes, laininge the kinges treasure, which was referred to be caried to the common treasure of ROME. SYRACUSA beinge taken, nothinge greued Marcellus more, then the losse of Archimedes. Who beinge in his studie when the citie was taken, busily seekinge out by him selfe the demonstration of some Geometrical proposition which he hadde drawn in figure, and so earnestly occupied therein, as he neither sawe nor hearde any noyse of enemies that ranne vpp and downe the citie, and much lesse knewe it was taken: He wondered when he sawe a fouldier by him, that bad him go with him to Marcellus. Notwithstandinge, he spake to the fouldier, and bad him tary vntill he had done his conclusion, and brought it to demonstration: but the fouldier beinge angry with his answer, drew out his sword, and killed him. Other say, that the ROMAINES fouldier when he came, offered the swordes poynt to him, to kill him: and that Archimedes when he saw him, prayed him to hold his hand a litle, that he might not leaue the matter he looked for vnperfect, without demonstration. But the fouldier makinge no reckoning of his speculation, killed him presently. It is reported a third way also, sayinge, that certeine fouldiers met him in the streetes going to Marcellus, carying certeine Mathematicall instrumentes in a litle pretie coffer, as dialles for the sunne, Sphaeres and Angles, wherewith they measure the greatnesse of the body of the sunne by viewe: and they supposing he hadde caried some golde or siluer, or other pretious Iuells in that litle coffer, flue him for it. But it is most true, that Marcellus was maruelous sorie for his death, and euer after hated the villen that flue him, as a cursed and execrable persone: and howe he made also maruelous much afterwards of Archimedes kinsmen for his sake. The ROMAINES were esteemed of at that time by all nations, for maruelous expert fouldiers, and taken for verie vallyant and dangerous men to be dealt with: but they neuer shewed any example of their clemencie and curtesie, and least of all of any ciuill manner to any straungers, vntill Marcellus taught the way, whose actes did shewe the GREECIANS then, that the ROMAINES were more gracious and mercifull, then they. For he did so curteoullie intreate those that hadde to do with him, and shewed such fauour to priuate persones, and also to whole cities: that if there were any crueltie shewed in the cities of ENNA, or at MEGARES, or against the SYRACUSANS, it was rather through their owne fault and follie that were hurt, then theirs that didde them the hurte. And for proofe hereof, I will recite you one example onely amongst many. There is a citie in SICILE called ENGYIVM, it is no great thinge, but a verie auncient citie of name, by reason of the trafficke thither, for that there are certeine goddesses to be seene, whome they worship, called the mothers. Some say the CRETANS were the first builders and founders of the temple there, where you shall see speares and helmets of copper, and upon them are grauen the name of Meriones: and upon others, Vlysses name also, which are consecrated to these goddesses. This citie floode altogether at the deuotion of the CARTHAGINIANS: and Nicias beinge the chiefeft man of the same, was all he might against it, and perswaded them openlie in all their counsailes to take parte with the ROMAINES, prouinge it by many reasons, that his enemies counsayinge the contrarie, were vnprofitable members of the common wealth. Whereupon Nicias enemies fearinge his greatnesse and authority, they did conspyre amonge them selues to apprehend him, and to deliuer him to the CARTHAGINIANS. But Nicias hearinge of suche a matter, and findinge that they laye in waye to take him: vsed this pollicie to preuent their treason. He gaue out openlie very ill speeches against the goddesses, and did many things in derogation of their honor: and sayd the fight of them (which was a matter of great credit) was but deuse, and that there was no credit to be geuen to them. These words tickled his enemies, imagining that the common people would lay the mischiefe they pretended against him, to him selfe, as the only cause of his owne hurt. So they hauing appointed a day to apprehende him, by chaunce a common counsaill was kept that day they hadde determined of: where Nicias speaking to the people about matter of counsaill, in the midst of his oration fell to the grounde, to the great wonder of the whole assembly, as euery man may coniecture. Howbeit neuer a man stirred, & a prety while after he beganne to lift vpp his head a litle, and to looke gassly about him, with a faint trembling voyce, which he still gathered higher and lower by litle and litle, vntill he sawe all the people wonderously afayed and amazed, that not one of them durst speake. Then throwing his gowne from him, and renting his coate, he got vpon his feete halfe naked, and ranne towards the gate of the Theater, crying out that the goddesses mothers did torment him: and not a man durst once come neere him, nor offer to stoppe him, they were so superstitious and foolishly afayed of the goddesses, imagining it was some diuine punishment. But by this meanes he easily got to the gates of the city, and fled from them all: and he neuer seene after that time, to do, or speake, like a madde man in any thing. His wife that was made priuy to his deuse, and furthered his intent, went first and fell downe on her knees before the goddesses mothers in their temple, as she had hartly prayed vnto them: & faining afterwards she would go seeke her husband, that ranne vp and downe the fieldes like a madde man, she went out of the city with her litle children, and no body troubled her. Thus did they escape without daunger, and went vnto Marcellus to SYRACVSA. The ENGIENIANS afterwards played such insolent partes, that Marcellus in the ende went thither, and caused them all to be taken and bounde, as though he would haue put them to execution. But Nicias came to him with the teares in his eyes, and embracing his knees, and kissing his handes, besought him to take pite of his poore citizens, beginning first with those that were his greatest enemies. This good nature of Nicias so pacified Marcellus wrath, that he pardoned them all, & did no hurt to the city, and gaue Nicias certaine land, besides many other rich giftes he bestowed vpon him. Thus it is reported in the history of Posidonius the Philosopher. Now Marcellus being sent for home by the ROMANES, bicause they had warres in their owne contrie, and euen at ROME gates departed out of SICILE, returning towards ROME, and caried the goodliest tables, pictures, and statues, and other such ornamentes as were in SYRACVSA, meaning first to beaunifie his triumphe with them, and to leaue them afterwards for an ornament to ROME, which before that time neuer knewe what such curious workes ment. For, this finenes, and curious tables and imagery, neuer came into ROME before, but was thoroughly set out with armor and weapons of barbarous people, and with bloody spoiles, and was also crowned with monumentes of victories and triumphes of diuerse enemies, which were no pleasaunt, but rather fearefull sightes to looke vpon, farre vnfitte for feminine eyes. But euen as Epaminondas did call the plaine of BORTIA, Mars scaffold, where he kept his games: and Xenophon also called the city of EPHESVS, the armorers shopp: euen so me thinke (as Pindarus said) they might rightly haue termed ROME, the temple of Mars fighting. And this wanne the peoples good wille much more to Marcellus, bicause he did so passingly set forth ROME, with such excellent fine toys of GREECE. But Fabius Maximus on the other side, was better beloued of the old men: bicause he brought no such toys with him from the city of TARENTVM, when he wanne it. In dede he brought away golde and ready coyne, and much other goodes that were profitable: but for images and tables, he left them standing in their places, speaking a thing of great note. Let vs leaue the TARENTINES their goddes offended with them. And furthermore the noble men were angry with Marcellus, saying, that by this act he had purchased ROME great malice and hate. First, bicause he did not onely leade men prisoners in his triumphe, but the gods also: and secondly, bicause he had filled the people full of pride prattle, & idle curiosity, spending all the whole day in gasinge, and wondering at the excellency of the workemen, and of their workes, where before they would fall to their labor, or else they went to the warres, not being acquainted with curiosity, nor idle life as Euripides sayd, speaking of Hercules:

In wretched practises, he simple was as to see, but he excell'd in vertuous dedes, and feates that worthy be.

1 Notwithstandinge, Marcellus did glory amongst the GREECIANS them selues, sayinge: that he had taught the ROMANES to esteeme the wonderfull workes of GREECE, which they knewe not before. But at his returne out of SICILE, his enemies procured, that his honor of triumphe was denied him. So Marcellus knowing that he had yet left somewhat to do in SICILE, and that the warre was not altogether ended, and fearing besides least a third triumphe would make him to much enuied: he was contented with good will to haue the honor of the great triumphe, in the mountaine of ALBA only: & of the litle triumphe, in the city of ROME. This manner of litle triumphe is called in Greeke, Euon, and the ROMANES call it Ouatia. And this difference there is betwene them: that in the Ouatia triumphe, the party to whom it is graunted, doth not enter into the city vpon triumphing charret drawn with foure horses, nor doth cary any lawrell vpon his head in token of triumphe, nor hath any trompettes or hornes blown before him, but doth marche a foote with a payer of slippers on his feete, hauing flutes and howboyes playing before him, and wearing a garlande of fyre tree vpon his heade: so as this manner of entry is nothing warlike, and is rather a pleasaunt then fearefull sight. And that reason doth flatly drawe me to beleue, that these two Kindes of entries they graunted to the Capitaines, returning from the warres with victorie: were deuised in the olde time, rather for the maner, then for the greatnes of the doings. For such as had ouercomen their enemies by great slaughter and bloody battells, they did make their entry with pompe of triumphe, that was altogether marshall and terrible, followed with their souldiers armed, and crowned with lawrell garlandes, as their custome was in mustering their campe in the warres. But they on the contrary side, that without any employe of armes returned home with victorie, either by peaceable meanes, or by force of their eloquence: the law graunted them the honor of Ouatia triumphe, which was quiet, and full of all ioy and mirth. For the flute is an instrument of pleasure belonging to peace, and the fyre tree is a tree consecrated to Venus, which goddesse, about all goddes and goddeses doth most delect warres. This second kinde of entry was called Ouatia, not as many GREECIANS haue taken it, comming of this word Euon, which is a voyce and song of ioy, although they did vse also to accompanie the Capitaines making their entry in this sorte, crying and singing Euon: but there were certeine GREECIANS that would haue fetched the deriuation of this word, from an old common custome they had: & were of opinion besides, that parte of this honor did appertene to god Bacchus, whose surname we call Enius, and sometimes Thriambus. Howbeit this is not the true deriuation of the name, but after this sorte. At the great triumphe and entry made, the Capitaine or generall that triumpheth as a conqueror, did offer and sacrifice (by the old orders and ancient customes of ROME) one, or diuers oxen: where at the seconde triumphe called the Ouatia, he onely sacrificed a mutton, which the ROMANES call in their tongue Ouem, and thereof was it called Ouatia. And here by the way is to be noted, the difference betwixt the lawe maker of the ROMANES lawes and customes, and the law maker of the LACEDÆMONIANS: how both of them were contrary to the other, in appointing their sacrifices for victorie. For at SPARTA, the Capitaine or generall that had done his feate by policy or friendship, the sacrifice he did offer vpp to the goddes, was an ox: and he that by force, and bloody battell had obtained victory, only offered vp a cocke for sacrifice. For though they were very good souldiers, yet they thought better of his seruice, that by his wisdom & wise perswasions obtained victory: then of his, that wanne it by valiantnes, and force of armes. Thus may you see which of these two lawemakers hadde best reason in his ordinaunces. But nowe to Marcellus againe. He beinge chosen Consul the fourth time, his enemies and euill willers did stirre vpp the SYRACVANS against him, and perswaded them to complayne to the Senate of him, that he had cruelly, and vncurteously viled them, contrary to the ancient league & allyances made long time before with the ROMANES. Marcellus beinge sacrificing one day in the Capitoll, while the Senate were sette in counsaill: the SYRACVANS deputies came before them, & kneeling downe, besought the to giue them audience, & that they would do them iustice. The other Consul that was present rebuked them, being angry they had so maliciously spied the occasion of Marcellus absence.

But when Marcellus hearde of it, he straight left of all, and came to the Senate, and first farrt him downe in his Consulls chayer, where he gaue audience as Consull, and dispatched diuerse causes: when he had done so, he rose out of his chayer, and came downe among them, standing as a priuate person to aunswere at the barre, as other offenders and men accused, suffering the SYRACVSANS to alleadge and say against him what they would. Then were the SYRACVSANS blanke, when they saw the maiesty of Marcellus, and his stayed countenance in all things: so that hauing founde him before a very valliant man in warres and vnconquerable, they found him then a man no lesse dreadful in his Consulls robe: that they hong downe their eyes, and durst not looke him in the face. Notwithstanding, they beinge suborned by his enemies, beganne at the length boldly to accuse him, and yet with sorow and lamentacion, the effect whereof was this. That they beinge the ROMAINES frendes and confederates, had abidden such iniuries at Marcellus handes, as all other generallnes neuer offred their very enemies. Whereeto Marcellus straight answered againe to the contrary. That for many iniuries the ROMAINES had receiued of the, they suffred nothing but that, which was vnpossible they should not suffer, that resisted vntill they were taken by force: and yet they might thankethem selues for any thing they suffred, because they would not obey nor consent, to reasonable capitulations and articles of peace, which he had oftentimes offered them. And againe, they could not alleage for their excuse, that the tyrans had compelled them to make warres: when they to the contrary, because they would enter into warres, were contented to be subiect to a tyrant. So, when both parties hadde spoken their mindes, the SYRACVSANS (as the manner is) went out of the Senate house, and Marcellus also, leauinge his fellowe Consull in his place in the Senate, and taried without the dore, attending the sentence of the Senate, neuer altering his countenance nor wonted looke, neither for feare of sentence, nor for malice or anger against the SYRACVSANS, quietly looking for his iudgement. Afterwards when the Senators voyces were gathered together, and that Marcellus was cleared by the most voyces: then the SYRACVSANS fell downe at his feete weeping, and besought him not to wreake his anger upon them that were present, and moreover that he would haue compassion of the residue of the citizens, who did acknowledge his great grace and fauor extended to them, and confessed them selues bound to him for euer. Marcellus moued with pity by their intreaty, he pardoned them, and euer after did all the SYRACVSANS what pleasure he coulde possible. For through his intreaty and request, the Senate did confirme and ratifie his graunt vnto them, which was: that they might vse the liberty and benefite of their owne lawes, and quietly enioy their goodes also which were left them. To requite this special grace procured them by Marcellus, the SYRACVSANS gaue him many honors, & among others they made a law, that euer after, as oft as any of Marcellus name or house came into SICILE, the SYRACVSANS should keepe a solemne feast, with garlands on their heades, and should also sacrifice vnto the goddes. After this, Marcellus went against Hannibal. And where all the other Consulls almost, & generallnes, after the ouerthrow at CANNES, had vsed this only policie with him, not to come to battell: he tooke a contrarie course to them all, thinkinge that tract of time, (whereby they thought to eate out Hannibals force) was rather a direct consuming and destroying of all ITALIE: and that Fabius Maximus standinge to much vpon safety, tooke not the way to cure the disease and weakenes of the common weale of ROME, looking to ende this warre, consuming by litle and litle the strength and power of ROME, committing a fearefull phisitions fault and error, beinge afraid to heale their patient sodainly, imagining that to bring them low, doth lessen the disease. So, first of all he went to besiege certeine great cities of the SAMNITES, which were reuolted from obedience of the ROMAINES: and those he wanne againe with a great prouision of corne and money he founde in them, besides three thousande souldiers Hannibal left in garrison there, whom he tooke prisoners. Hannibal after that, hauinge slain the viceconsull Cneus Fuluius in APVLIA, with eleuen Tribunes militum (to wit, Colonels, euery one hauinge charge of a thousande footemen) and ouerthrowen the greatest parte of his armie Marcellus wrote letters to ROME, hoping to comforte the Senate & people, telling he would go thither, and did warrant them he would driue Hannibal out of APVLIA. When the ROMAINES had red his letters, they were nothing the more cōforted, but rather (as Liuie writeth)

A more afraid and discouraged: because they doubted the danger to come would be greater, then the losse past, takinge Marcellus to be a farre greater and better generall, then euer was Fuluius. Neuerthelesse, Marcellus performinge the contentes of his letters writen to ROME, draue Hannibal out of APVLIA, and made him retyre into LVCANIA. And Marcellus finding him in that contry, by a city called NYMISTRON, lodged upon hilles, and in places of strength and aduantage: he camped hard by him in the valley, and the next morninge he was the first that presented his enemy battell. Hannibal on the other side, came downe into the valley, and they ioyned battell: which was so cruelly fought, and so long time, as it coulde not be discerned who had the better. For the battell beinge begonne at nine of the clocke in the morning, it was darke night ere they gaue ouer. The next morning by pece of day, Marcellus let his men againe in battell raye, in the midst of all the dead bodies that lay slaine in the field, and challenged Hannibal, to proue who should haue the field. But Hannibal refused, and marched his way thence: so as Marcellus thereby had good leasure left him to strippe his slaine enemies, and also to bury his owne souldiers. When he had finished that, he presently followed his enemy by the foote, who layed many ambushes for him, but he coulde neuer trappe him in any: and in euery encounter or skirmishe they had together, Marcellus hadde euer the better, which wanne him great fame and credit. Nowe time beinge comen about to chooseth newe Consulls, the Senate thought good to sencer rather for the other Consull that was in SICILE, then to remoue Marcellus thence, who had fought with Hannibal. So when the other Consull was come to ROME, the Senate commaunded him to name Quintus Fuluius Dictator, because the Dictator was neither chosen by the people, nor by the Senate: but one of the Consuls or Prators, in open assembly of the people, nameth such a one Dictator, as he liketh of. Wherefore it seemeth, that this word Dictator, came upon that word naming: for, Dicere in the ROMAINES tongue, signifieth to name. Howbeit other holde opinion, that he was called Dictator, because he commaundeth of him selfe what he will, without the counsell of the Senate, & the voyces of the people: and this seemeth to be true, because the commaundements of the Senate of ROME are called Edicta, which we GRECIANS call Diatagma. Now the other Consull and companion of Marcellus beinge come out of SICILE, he would nedes name another Dictator, then him whom the Senate offred him: and because he would not be compelled to do that he was vnwilling to do, he staid away one night, and returned againe into SICILE. Hereupon the people did name and appoint Quintus Fuluius Dictator, and the Senate wrote their letters to Marcellus, to confirme him: which Marcellus did, and authorised the peoples election. So he him selfe was chosen againe Proconsull, for the next yeare following: in the which he hauing conferred with Fabius Maximus about the warres, they were agreed, that Fabius should proue if he coulde winne the city of TARENTVM againe: and that Marcellus in the meane time should keepe Hannibal occupied, that he might not come to aide it. This resolution beinge taken betwene them, Marcellus went to meete Hannibal by the city of CANNISVM: who as he still chaunged and shifted lodginge, because he would not come to the battell against his will, found Marcellus euer in his eye before him. Inso much as Hannibal remouinge thus his campe, Marcellus plyed him so one day with continual alarms and skirmishes, that he brought him to a battell that held all day long till night, and compelled them both to leaue off till the next morning: where Marcellus shewed againe in field by breake of the day, in battell ray. Whereat Hannibal beinge in a maruelous rage, he called his souldiers together, and made an oration to them, earnestly mouinge them once againe to fight with Marcellus, if euer they had heretofore fought for his sake. You see, sayd he, that hauing fought so many battells, & gotten such victories as we haue done, we can not yet take breath as we would, nor bein quiet, how much soeuer we winne, if we driue not away yonder fellow Marcellus. When Hannibal had ended his oration to the CARTHAGINIANS, he led them on to the battell: where Marcellus, to no purpose, and out of time, would nedes shew Hannibal a stragame of warre, that turned him selfe to the worst. For Marcellus perceivinge the right wing of his army distressed, made one of his legions that was set in ray in the reuerend of his hoste, to marche to the fronte of his battell, to helpe those that needed ayde. But this remouing of the legyon, troubled them that fought, and gaue the enemies the victorie: who slue that day two thousand seven hundred of the ROMAINES. So, when Marcellus was come againe into his campe, he straight called his souldiers before him, to whome he spake in this maner: that he lay a great deale of armor, and bodies of men, but he coulde see no ROMAINES. The ROMAINES hearing him say so, besought him to pardon the fault they had committed. Marcellus answered, he woulde neuer pardon them, so long as they were ouercome: but when they ouercome againe, he was content to remit all. So the next morning he agreed to bringe them againe to fight with the enemy, that such as were at ROME should rather heare newes of their victorie, then of their running away. When he had sayed, he appointed they shoulde geue those bandes that first turned their backs to Hanniball, barley for wheate. So, as there were many of them in great danger of their liues, for the fore woundes they hadde geuen them in the battell: yet was there not a man of them, but Marcellus words did more greue them, then the greuous woundes they had. The next morning betimes was set out of the generall tent, the coate armor died in skarlet, which is the ordinary signe of battell: and the bandes that had receiued dishonor the day before, were placed at their owne request in the fronte of the battell. The other Captaines besides, that were not ouerthrowen: did leade their bandes also to the felde, and did set them in battell raye. Hanniball hearing of that, cried out: O gods, what a man is this, that can not be quiet, neither with good nor ill fortune? for he is the only odde man, that neuer giueth rest to his enemy, when he hath ouercommitted him: nor taketh any for him selfe, when he is ouercome. We shal neuer haue done with him, for any thing that I see: fith shame, whether he winne or loose, doth still prouoke him to be bolder and valliantier. After orations made of bothe sides, bothe armies marched forwardes to ioyne battell. ROMAINES being as strong as the CARTHAGINIANS, Hanniball put his Elephants in the vaward and fronte of his battell, and commaunded his men to driue them upon the ROMAINES: and so they did. Which in deede did somewhat trouble and disorder the first ranckes of the ROMAINES: vntill such time as Flauius, Tribune of the souldiers, tooke an ensigne in his hande, and marched before the beastes, and gaue the first of them such a thrust with the poynt of his ensigne, that he made her turne backe. The first beast being turned backe thus, ranne upon the seconde that followed her, and the second made the third go backe also, and so from one to another, vntill they all turned. Marcellus perceiving that, commaunded his horsemen to set upon the enemies with all the fury they coulde, in that place where he sawe them, somewhat troubled with these beastes, that turned backe againe vpon them: and that they should driue them further in amongst them. Which they did, and gaue so hotte a charge upon the CARTHAGINIANS, that they made them turne their backs, & ranne away, and they pursued them still, killing them downe right, euen to their campe side: where was the greatest slaughter of all, by reason their Elephants that were wounded, fell downe starke deade within the gate of their campe. And they saye of the CARTHAGINIANS there were slaine at this battell, aboue eight thousande, and of the ROMAINES, onely three thousande: howbeit all the rest of them for the most parte were very sore hurt. Which fell out very well for Hanniball, that he might march away at his pleasure, as he did that night, and got him away farre off from Marcellus knowing he was not in state to follow him ouerlodainely, because of his great number of hurt men in his campe: and so by small iorneyes he went into CAMPANIA, where he lay in garrison all the sommer, in the city of SINUSSE, to heale the woundes of his sore mangled souldiers. Hanniball hauing now gotten him selfe at the length out of Marcellus hands, & hauing his army free to serue him as he thought good: he burned & destroyed all ITALIA where he went & stoodde no more in feare of any thing. This made Marcellus ill spoken of at ROME, and caused his enemies to take holde of such a matter against him: for they straight raised Publius Bibulus Tribune, to accuse him, who was a hotte haredained man, but very eloquent, and coulde deliuer his minde very well. So this Bibulus called the people oft to counsaill, and tolde them there, that they must nedes call home Marcellus, and appoint some other to take charge of the army: for as for him, sayd he, because he hath fought a litle with Hanniball (and as a man might say, wrestled a litle with him) he is now gotten to the bathes to solace him selfe. But Marcellus hearing this, left his Lieutenantes in the campe, and went him selfe to ROME, to answer to the vntrue accusations layd against him, and there he perceiued at his comming, how they intended

A intended to prosecute the matter against him upon these informations. So a day of hearinge was appointed for his matter, & the parties came before the people assembled in counsaill, in the great lites or show place, called Circus Flaminius, to giue iudgement. There Publius Bibulus the Tribune, sitting in his chayer, layd open his accusation with great circumstance: and Marcellus, when Bibulus had tolde his tale, answered him in few wordes, and very discretely, only touching his purgation. But the noble and chiefeest men of the cite, rose vpp, and spake on Marcellus behalfe, telling the people plainly, that they did Marcellus wrong, to reckon worke of his valliantnes, then their enemy did: and to iudge of him as a coward, considering Hanniball only fled from him, of all other Captaines, and would by no means fight with him, neuer refusing to fight with any other whatloever. These perswasions tooke such effect, as where Marcellus accuser looked for his condénation: Marcellus to the contrary, was not only cleared of his accusation, but furthermore they chose him Consul againe the fift time. So beinge entered into his office, he went first into THVS CAN: where visiting the good cities one after another, and quieting them, he pacified a great sedition in the contry, when they were all ready to rise and rebell. Afterwards at his returne, he thought to consecrate the temple of honor & vertue, which he had built with the spoyle he gotte in the warres of SICILE. But the Priestes were against it, saying, two goddes might not be in one church. Thereupon he built an other temple, and ioyned it to the first, being very angry the Priestes denied for his consecration: and he did take it for an euill token, besides diuerse other signes in the element that afterwards appeared, and troubled him much. For there were many temples set a fire with lightning at one time: and the rattes and mife did knawe the golde, that was in the chappell of Iupiter Capitoline. And it is reported also, that an oxe did speake: and a childe came out of the heade of an Elephant, and that the child was aliue. Furthermore, the Priestes and Soothsayers sacrificing to the goddes, to withdraw this euill from them these sinifter tokens did threaten: they could neuer finde any fauorable signes in their sacrifices. Whereupon they fought to keepe Marcellus still at ROME, who had a maruelous earnest desire to be gone with speede to the warres: for neuer man longed for any thing so much, as Marcellus did, to fight with Hanniball. Inso-much he neuer dreamed other thing in the night, nor spake of any matters in the day to his frendes and companions, nor prayed to the goddes for any other thing, but that he might fight with Hanniball in the felde: and I thincke he woulde willinglyst haue fought a priuate combat with him, in some walled city or inclosed lytes for the combat. And had it not bene that he had already wonne him selfe great fame, and shewed him selfe to the worlde, (by sundry great proofes & experience of his doings) a graue, skilfull, and a valliant Captaine as any man of his time: I would haue said it had bene a pange of youth, and a more ambitious desire, then became a man of his age, who was three score yere old at that time, whē they made him Consul againe the fift time. Neuertheles, after he had ended all his propitiatory sacrifices and purifications, such as the Soothsayers had appointed: he departed from ROME with his fellow Consul Quintus Crispinus to the warres. He found Hanniball lying between the cities of BANCIA, and VENOSA, and fought all the meanes he could to procure him to fight, but he could neuer get him to it. Howbeit Hanniball being aduertised by spyalles, that the Consuls sent an army to besiege the city of the LOCRIANS, Iurnamed EPIZEPHYRIANS: (as ye would say, the occidentals, because the GRECIANS, in respect of the ITALIANS, are called the orientals:) he layd an ambush for them that went, vnder the hill of PATELIUM, which was directly in their way, where he slew about two thousand five hundred ROMAINES. That ouerthrow did sette Marcellus on fire, and made him more desirous of battell: whereupon he remoued his campe from the place he lay in, and marched nearer to his enemy. Betwene their two campes, there was a prety litle hill, strong of situation, a wilde thing ouergrown with wod, and there were high hillocks. Fro whence they might discern a great way, both the one & the others campe, & at the foote of the same ranne prety springs: Inso-much as the ROMAINES wondered, that Hanniball comming thither first, did not take that place, but had left it to his enemies. Howbeit Hanniball was crafty enough, leauing it of purpose: for as it was commodious to lodge his campe in, so it serued him turne better for an ambush. So he filled the wodde, the hollow places, and the valleys there about, with store of shot and spearmen, assuring him selfe that the place woulde intyse the ROMAINES thither : and in deede he gessed rightly, for so fell it out. Straight, there flew a rumor abroade in the ROMAINES campe, that there was a passing place to lodge in, and euery man tooke upon him like a skillfull souldier, to tell what vantage they should haue upon their enemies, by taking that place, and specially if they did lodge there, or otherwise built a fort vpon it. Whereupon Marcellus determined to goe see the place him selfe, taking a few horsemen with him. Notwithstanding, before he would take horse, he called for his Soothsayer to sacrifice to the goddes. The first beast that was sacrificed, the Soothsayer shewed Marcellus the liuer of it without a head. The second beast sacrificed, had a fayer great head of a liuer, and all the other partes were also sounde, and very newe : that by them it appeared all the feare of the first ill signes and tokens were taken away. Yet the Soothsayers on the other side sayd, it did make them worle afraid then before: for these fo favorable and lucky tokens of the sacrifice, followinge immediatly after the first fowle and nawghty signes, made them doubt them much by reason of so straunge and fodaine an alteration. But as the Poet Pindarus sayth,

Nor force of burning fire, nor vval of stele nor stone, nor whatsoeuer other thing, is here this earth vpon:

Can kepe abacke the counse of fatal destiny, nor yet resist the due decrees, which come from heauen on high.

So Marcellus tooke his horse, with Quintus Crispinus his fellow Confull, and his sonne one of the Tribunes of the souldiers, hauing onely two hundred and twenty horsemen with him, of the which there was not one ROMAINE among them, but all were THVSCANS, sauing for *C*ty FREGELLANIAN, who from the beginning of these warres had alwayes shewed them selues very faithfull and louing to Marcellus. The hill we spake of before, being thicke covered with wodde and bushes, the enemies hadde set a skowte to watche on the topp of it, to geue warning if they saw any comming towards it. The ROMAINES could not see him, and he on the other side might see euen into their campe, and perceiue what was done, as he did aduertise those at that time that lay in ambush for Marcellus comming: and they suffered him to passe on, vntill he came directly against them. Then they shewed vpon the fodaine, and compassing in Marcellus, they both shot and strake at him, some following them that fled, and other fighting with the forty FREGELLANIAN which only stucke to it: who came roundly in together (notwithstanding the THVSCANS were fled) upon the first crie they heard, to defend the two Confulls, vntill such time as the Confull Crispinus hauinge two woundes on his body with a dart, did turne his horse to flee. And with that, one of the enemies gaue Marcellus such a fore blowe with a speare hauinge a broad iron head, that he ranne him quite through. The FREGELLANIAN that were left aliue, beinge but a few in number, seeinge Marcellus flaine, left him lyinge on the ground, and tooke his sonne away with them that was very fore hurt, and by the swiftnes of their horses recovered their campe, and saued them selues. At this ouerthrowe, there were not slayne aboue fortie men, and fise and twentie taken prisoners, of which, fise of them were the Confulls sergeantes, and their officers that caried axes before them, and the other were all horsemen. Within few dayes after, the other Confull Crispinus died also of his hurt, which was such a misfortune, as neuer came before to the ROMAINES. E that both their Confulls were flaine at one battell. Now Hannibal made no great reckeninge of all that were flaine, or taken at this fiele: but when he heard that Marcellus selfe was flaine at this ouerthrow, he went him selfe straight to the place to see him. So when he had viewed his body a great while, standing hard by it, and considering his strength, his stature, and countenance, hauing taken full view of all the partes of him, he spake no proude word against him, nor shewed any glad countenance, as some other would haue done, that had slaine so valliant and daungerous an enemy : but wondering how he came to be flaine so straungely there, he tooke of his ring from one of his fingers that sealed his letters, and geuing his body buriall according to his estate, made it to be honorably burnt, and then put all his bones and ashes into a siluer pottle, on which he him selfe put a crowne of golde, and sent it vnto Marcellus sonne. It fortun'd so, that certaine light horsemen of the NYMIDIANS mette with them that caried this siluer pot, and would haue taken it from them by force: but they stood to it, and would

A not parte withall, and so fightinge and struing together for it, the bones and ashes were scattered all about. Hannibal hearinge this, sayd to them that were about him : see, howe nothinge can be, which the goddes will not. So he punished the NYMIDIANS, and cared no more to gette Marcellus bones together, but perswaded him selfe it was the will of the goddes he should dye so straungely, and that his body should haue no buriall. Cornelius Nepos, and Valerius Maximus wryte it thus : but Linie, and Augustus Caesar say, that the pot was caried vnto his sonne, and honorably buried. Marcellus did consecrate many monumentes in diuerse places, besides those at Rome. As at CATANA in SICILE : a place for young men to exercise them selues in. In the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, in the temples of the gods called Cabires many images and tables he brought from SYRACUSA. And in the Ile of LINDOS, in the temple of B Minerva, where among other, there is a statue of his, and this epigramme grauen vnder it, as Polidonius the Philosopher wryteth,

O thou my friend! I say vvhich passest forth by me, of Claudius Marcellus here, the image mayest thou see: vvhose family at Rome, vvas of the noblest name.

Seven times he Confull chosen vvas, in vvhich he ouercame, great numbers infinite, (in open fiele and fight) of such as sought his contries spoyle, and put them all to flight.

The author of this epigramme reckoneth, the two times of his being viceconfull, for two whole Confullships : but his posteritie continued alwayes in great honor, vnto Marcellus, Marcellus the sonne of Octavia, (Augustus Caesars sister) and of Caius Marcellus. He dyed a young man, beinge Adilis of Rome, & married vnto Julia, Augustus daughter, with whom he liued no long time. But to honor the memory of him, Octavia his mother built the library, and Augustus Caesar the Theater, which are called to this day, Marcellus Theater and library.

THE COMPARISON OF Marcellus with Pelopidas.

These are the greatest things and best worthy of memory (in my opinion) of all Pelopidas and Marcellus doings : and for their maners and naturall condicions otherwise, they were all one, because they were both valliant, painefull, and noble minded : sauing that this difference onely was betwene them. That Marcellus in many cities he tooke by assault, did cruelly murder them, and spilt much blood : where Epaminondas and Pelopidas contrarily did neuer put any to the sword they ouercame, neither did they take away the libertie from any citie they tooke : and it is thought the THEBANES would not haue handled the ORCHOMENIANS so cruelly as they did, if one, or both of them had bene present. Nowe for their actes, it was a noble and wonderfull peece of seruice that Marcellus did, with so small a company of horsemen as he tooke with him, to ouerthrow so great a number of horsemen & footemen both, of the GAULES: a thinge that neuer Generall but him selfe did, and specially that slewe with his owne handes in the fildes, the Generall of his enemies. Which Pelopidas could neuer attaine vnto: for he seeking to kill Alexander the tyrant of PERES, was slaine first him selfe, and suffered that, which he desired to haue done to another. And yet for that seruice may be objected, the battells of LEVCTRES, and of TEGYRA, which were both famous and notable. But to encounter with those, there was no notable ambush or secreete practise done by Marcellus, that was any thing like comparable to that Pelopidas did at his returne from exile, when he slewe the tyrants that kept THEBES in bondage. For that was as notable a policy and sodaine enterprise stolen apon, as none was cuer greater, or more famous. It is true Marcellus was yoked with Hanniball, who was a dreadfull and a violent enemy: so were the THEBANS also at that very time with the LACEDÆMONIANS, who notwithstanding were overcome of Pelopidas, at the battells of TEGYRA, and of LEVCTRES. Whereas Marcellus did neuer so much as once overcome Hanniball, as Polybius wryteth, but remained vnconquered alwayes, vntill that Scipio ouercame him in battell. Notwithstandinge, we do geue best credit to the reportes of Cæsar, Liuius, Cornelius Nepos, and of king Iuba among the GREECIANS: who wryte, that Marcellus otherwhile did ouerthrow certaine of Hanniballs companies, howbeit they were neuer no great ouerthrowes to speake of, & it seemeth rather, it was through some mockerie or deceite of that AFRICAN, then otherwise. Yet sure it was a great matter, and worthy much cōmendacion, that the ROMAINES were brought to that corage, as they durst abide in fight with the CARTHAGINIANS, hauing lost so many great ouerthrowes, & hauing so many generalls of their armies slaine in battell, and hauing the whole Empire of ROME in so great daunger of vtter destruction. For it was Marcellus only of all other generalls, that put the ROMAINES in hart againe, after so great and longe a feare thorowly rooted in them: and incouraged the souldiers also to longe to fight with their enemy, and not onely to hope, but to assure them selues of victorie. For, where by reason of their continuall losses and fearefull ouerthrowes they hadde, they thought them selues happy men to escape Hanniballs handes by runninge away: he taught them to be ashamed to flie like cowardes, to confesse they were in distresse, to retire, & leaue the fildes, before they had overcome their enemies. And where Pelopidas was neuer overcome in battell beinge generall, and Marcellus did overcome more then any generall in his time: it might seeme therefore that the great number of the victories of the one, should compare with the good happe of the other that was neuer overcome. It is true that Marcellus tooke the city of SYRACUSA, & Pelopidas failed of taking the city of SPARTA: but yet do I thinke, that it was more valliantly done of Pelopidas, to come so neere SPARTA as he did, and that he was the first that passed the riuer of EVROTAS with an army, which neuer enemy did before him, than it was of Marcellus to winne all SICILE. Vnles some peraduenture will say againe, this was Epaminondas, not Pelopidas acte, as also in the victorie of LEVCTRES: where no man liuing can pretend any parte of glory to the doinges of Marcellus. For he tooke SYRACUSA, beinge onely generall alone, and did ouerthrow the GAULES without his fellow Confull, and fought with Hanniball, without any mans helpe or incouragement (for all other were against it, and perswaded the contrary) and he was the first that altered the manner of warres the ROMAINES vsed then, and that trained his souldiers, that they durst fight with the enemy. For their death, I neither commend the one nor the other, and the strangeness of either of their deaths doth geue me maruelously: as I do greatly wonder also, how Hanniball in so many battells as he fought (which are innumerable) could alwayes scape unhurt. I can not but greatly commende also the valliantnes of one Chryfantas, whom Xenophon speaketh of in his booke of the institution of Cyrus, saying: that he hauing lift vp his sword in his hand ready to kill one of his enemies, and hearing the trompet found the retreat, he softly retired, & would not strike him. Howbeit it seemeth Pelopidas is more to be excused: for beside that he was very hot and desirous of battell, yet his anger was honorable and iust, and moued him to seeke reuenge. For as the Poet Euripides sayth:

*The best that may betyde, is when a captaine likes, and doth suruine the victories, which he with force achieues.
But if he needes must fall, then let him valliantly euen thrust amid the thickest throng, and there with honor dye.*

For so becometh his death famous, & not dishonorable. But now, besides Pelopidas iust cause of anger, yet was there another respect that most pricked him forward, to do that he did: for he saw his victorie ended, in the death of the tyrant. Otherwise he shoulde hardly haue founde so noble an occasion to haue shewed his valliantnesse, as in that. And Marcellus contrarily, without any instant necessity, and hauinge no cause of heate or choller, (which putteth all men valliant in fight besides them selues, that they know not what they do) did rashly, and vnaduidedly thrust him selfe into the middelt of the daunger, where he dyed not as a generall, but as a light horseman and skowt, (forsaking his three triumphes, his sue Confullshippes, and his spoyles and tokens of triumphe, which he had gotten of kings with his owne hands) among venturous SPANIARDS and NUMIDIANS, that solde their blood and liues for pay vnto the CARTHAGINIANS: so that I imagine they were angry with the selues (as a man would say) for so great and happy a victorie, to haue slaine amongst FREGELLIAN skowtes, and light horsemen, the noblest and worthiest person of the ROMAINES. I would no man should thinke I speake this in reproch of the memory of these two famous men, but as a grieue onely of them and their valliantnes: which they employed so, as they bleamished all their other vertues, by the vndiscrete hazarding of their persones and liues without cause, as if they would (and shoulde haue dyed for them selues, and not rather for their contry and frendes. And also when they were dead, Pelopidas was buried by the allies & confederats of the city of THEBES, for whose cause he was slaine: and Marcellus in like manner, by the enemies selues that hadde slaine him. And sure the one is a happy thing, and to be wished for in such a case: but the other is farre aboue it, and more to be wondered at. That the enemy him selfe shoulde honor his valliantnesse and worthinesse that hurt him, more then the office of frendshippes performed by a thankfull frende. For nothing moueth the enemy more to honor his deade enemy, then the admiration of his worthines: and the frende sheweth frendship many times, rather for respect of the benefite he hath receiued, then for the loue he beareth to his vertue,

THE LIFE OF Aristides.

Aristides
wealth.

Aristides the sonne of Lyfimachus, was certainly of the tribe of Antiochi- des, and of the towne of ALOPECIA. But for his goodes and wealth, they diuerfely write of him. For some fay, he liued poorly all the daies of his life, and that he left two daughters, which by reason of their po-uerty, liued vnmarried many yeres after their fathers death. And many of the oldest writers do cōfirme that for troth. Yet Demetrius Phaleri- us, in his booke intituled Socrates, wryteth the contrary: that he knew certeine landes Aristides had in the village of Phaleria, which did yet beare the name of Aristides lands, in the which his body is buried.

And furthermore, to shew that he was well to liue, and that his house was rich and wealthy, he bringeth forth these proofes. First, that he was one yeaer mayer or prouost of ATHENS, whom they called, Archon Eponymos, because the yeaer tooke the name of him that hadde it yearely. And they say he came to it, by drawing of the beane, according to the auncient vse of the ATHENIANS, and their wonted manner of makinge their election of the said office: In which election none were admitted to drawe the beane, but such as were highest set in their subsidie bookes, according to the value & rate of their goodes, whom they called at ATHENS, Pentacosiomedimnes, as you would say, those that might dispēd fife hundred bushels of wheate by the yere, and vpward. Secondly, he alleageth he was banished by the Ostracifmon, which banisheth the nobilitie and great rich men onely, whom the common people enuie, because of their greatnesse, and neuer dealeth with poore men. The third and last reason he makes it, that he left of his gift, three footed stooles in the temple of Bacchus, which those do commonly offer vp, as haue won the victorie in comedies, tragedies, or other such like pastimes, wher-of they them selues had borne the charge. And those three footed stooles remaine there yet, which they say were geuen by Aristides, and haue this inscription vpon them: The tribe of Antiochides wanne the victorie, Aristides defrayed the charges of the games, and Archefttram the Poet taught them to playe his comedies. This last reason, though it seeme likeliest of them all, yet is it the weakest of the rest. For Epaminondas (whome euery man knoweth was poore euen from his birth, and alwayes liued in great pouertie) and Plato the Philosopher, tooke apon him to defraye the charges of games that were of no small expence, the one hauing borne the charges of flute players at THEBES, and the other the dawnc of the children which

A which dawncd in a rounde at ATHENS: towards the furnishing of which charges, Dion the SYRACUSAN gaue Plato money, and Pelopidas also gaue Epaminondas money. Now, this is not spoken that vertuous men should alwayes refuse the gifts of their friends, and that they might not in some sort accept their friendes curtesie offered them: but because they should thinke it vncomely and dishonorable for them, to take any thing to enrich them selues, or to spare and houde vp. Howebeit where there is any honorable act to be done, or any publike shew to be made, not tending to their priuate benefit: in such a case they should not refuse their friendes louing offer, and goodwill towards them. And where Demetrius saith the three footed stooles was offered vp in the temple of Bacchus, Panetius declareth plainly, that Demetrius was de-ceayed by the semblance of the name. For since the time of the warres of the MEDES, vnto the beginninge of the warre of PELOPONNESVS, in all the registers and recordes kept of the defrayers of the charges of common playes, there were founde but two men bearinge name of Aristides, that obtained victorie: & neither of them both was sonne vnto Lyfimachus, whom we wryte of at this present. For the one is expressly named the sonne of Xenophilus, and the other was long after the same Aristides we now speake of: as appeareth easily by the wrytinge and orthographie, which is according to the grammar rules, we haue vied in GREEKE euer since Euclides time. Moreouer it is ealie to be knowne, by the name of the Poet Archefttram that is adioyned to it. For there is no man that maketh mention of a Poet of this name, in all the warres of the MEDES: but in the time of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, many doe put him in for an author and maker of rymes and songes that were long in common daunces. Yet for all Panetius obiections, the matter is to be better looked into, and considered of. But for the Ostracifmon banishment, it is true, that such as were great men in estimation aboute the common people, either in fame, nobility, or eloquence, they onely were subiect vnto this banishment. For Damon himselfe, beinge Pericles schoolemaister, was banished: onely because the common people thought him to wife. Moreouer, Idomenus wryteth, that Aristides was their prouost for a yeaer, not by lot of beanes, but by voyces of the ATHENIANS that chose him. And if he were prouost since the iorney of PLATES, as Demetrius wryteth: it is likely enough that they didde him this honor, for his great vertue and notable seruice, which other were wont to obtaine for their riches. But this Demetrius doth not only defende Aristides, but also Socrates pouerty, as if it were a fowle vyce and reproche to be poore. For he wryteth, that he had not only a house of his owne, but also three score and ten Minas at vsery, which Criton gaue him interest for. But now to our story againe. Aristides was Clisthenes very frend, he that restored the gouernment at ATHENS after the expulsion of the thirty tyrannes, and did reue-rence Lycurgus the Lawmaker of the LACEDÆMONIANS for his lawes, aboute all the men in his time: and therefore he euer fauored the state of Aristocratie, that is, where the noble men rule, and haue the souerainty. Howebeit he euer had Themistocles (Neocles sonne) his continuall aduersary, as takinge parte with the contrary, and defendinge the popular state of government. Some say, that beinge schollers, and brought vp together, they were euer contrary one to another in all their actions and doinges, were it in sporte, or in matters of earnest: and euer after, men beganne to see the naturall inclination of them both, by their contrary affections.
E For Themistocles was quicke, nimble, aduenturous, and subtil, and would ventur on any thing, apon light occasion. Aristides contrariwise was very quiet, temperate, constant, and maruelous well stayed, who would for no respect be drawn away from equity and iustice, neither would flatter, nor abuse any body, though it were but in sporte. Norwithstanding, Aristus of CILIO wryteth, that their malice beganne first of light loue, and that it grew to greatnesse by proccesse of time betwene them: for (sayeth he) both the one and the other of them fellin loue with Stesileus, borne in the Ile of Ceos. This fond light loue of theirs, fell not easly from them, nor the enuy they conceiued one against another, but continued against eche other in matters of state: such was their malice towards one another. In which calling, Themistocles fought the way to winne friendes, by whose meanes he came to great preferment in shorte time, and had made him selfe very strong by them. Therefore, when a frende of his tolde him one day, he was worthy to gouerne the city of ATHENS, and were very fitte for it, if he were indifferent, and not partiall. The goddess forbid (quod he) I should euer occupie the place of a gouernour, where my frendes shoulde not finde more fauor then straungers, that doe me no pleasure. But Aristides taking an other course by him selfe, would not stande upon his frendes in gouernment. First, because he woulde do no man wrong, with pleasuring his frendes: nor yet woulde anger them, by denying their requestes. Secondly, because he saw many rulers and men of authority bolde to do iniustice, and manifest wrong, bearinge them selues upon their frendes: but he caried this opinion, that no honest man, or good citizen, shoulde trust to any bolsting of frendes, but to his owne iust and vpright doings. Notwithstanding, Aristides perceiuinge that Themistocles did rashly alter many thinges, and euer encountered all his wayes, and hindered his doings: he was enforced sometime to crosse Themistocles againe, & to speake against that he preferred, partly to be euen with him, but most to hinder his credit and authority, which increased still through the peoples fauor and goodwilles towards him: thinking it better by contrariying him a litle to disappoint sometime a thing that might haue fallen out well for the common wealth, rather then by geuing him the head, to suffer him to grow to great. To conclude, it fortun'd on a time that Themistocles hauing preferred a matter very profitable for the common wealth, Aristides was so much against it, as Themistocles purpose tooke no place. Moreouer Aristides was so earnest against him, that when the counsaill brake vp after Themistocles motion was reiect'd, he spake it openly before them all: that the common wealth of ATHENS would neuer prosper, vntill they both were laid in Barathrum, which was a prison or hole, wherein they put all theues and condemned men. An other time, Aristides mou'd a matter to the people, which diuerse were against, but yet it went with him. And when the iudge or president of the counsaill did put it to the people, to knowe their allowance of it: Aristides perceiuing by the argumentes made against it, that the matter he preferred was hurtfull to the common wealth, he gaue it ouer, and would not haue it passe. Many times also Aristides spake by other men, when he would haue a thing go forward, for feare least Themistocles spight towards him, woulde hinder the benefite of the common wealth. They founde him very constant and resolute in matters of state, whatsoever happened: which wanne him great commendation. For he was neuer the prouder for any honor they gaue him, nor thought him selfe disgraced for any ouerthrow he receiued: being alwayes of this minde, that it was the duty of an honest citizen, to be euer ready to offer his body and life to doe his contry seruice, without respect and hope of reward of money, or for honor and glory. Therefore when certaine verses were repeated in the Theater, of one of the tragedies of Aeschylus, made in commendation of the ancient Soothsayer Amphiaraus, to this effect.

*He will not only seeme, a iust man by his face, but iust in dede he will be founde, and vertue still embrace:
With all his thoughts and soule, from whence there may procede, grauel counsells for to beavrtise, his contries crowne in dede.*

All the people straight cast their eyes vpon Aristides, as vpon him, that in troth aboute all other most deserued the praise of so great a vertue. For he was so stout and resolute, nor only to resist fauor and frendshippe: but to reiect hate and anger also. For in case of iustice, neither coulde frendshippe make him go away for his frendes sake: nor enuy coulde moue him to do iniustice, to his very enemy. For prooffe hereof it is writen, that he had an enemy of his in suite of law, & did prosecute it to iudgement: insomuch as after the plaint was red, the iudges were so angrie with the offender, that without any more hearinge of him, they woulde haue geuen sentence against him. But Aristides rising from his place, went & kneeled at the iudges feete with the offender his enemy, and besought them to geue him leaue to speake, to iustifie and defende his cause, according to the course of the law. An other time he being iudge betweene two priuate men that pleaded before him, one of them sayd vnto him: Aristides, this fellow mine aduersary here, hath done you great iniurie. My frende (quod Aristides againe) I pray thee tell me onely the iniurie he hath done thee, for I am iudge here to do thee right, and not my selfe. Moreouer, he beinge cholen high treasurer of all the reuenues of ATHENS, did declare that all the officers before him, and other his late predecessors, hadde greatly robbed and spoyled the common treasure, but specially Themistocles: who was a wise man, & of great iudgement, but yet somewhat light fingered. A accompt, Themistocles, and many other suborned by him, were against him, and accused him for abusing his office, and followed him so hard, that through their practise they condemned him, as Idomeneus wryteth. Yet the noblest citizens seeing what iniury they offered Aristides,ooke his cause in hande, and founde meanes to procure the people not onely to releafe the fine imposed vpon him, but to restore him againe to his office of high treasurer for the yeare before, and so dealt more fauorably with those he hadde to do, and would not examine euery thing so straightly as he did before. Whereupon such as were theues and stealers of the treasure of the common wealth, did maruelously praise and like him, and became suters for him to continew in the office. But when the day of election came, that the ATHENIANS woulde choole him againe, Aristides selfe reproued them, and sayd. VVhen I faithfully discharged the duty of mine office committed to me by you, I then receiued shame and reproche at your hands: and now that I haue dissembled, not seeming to see the thestes and robberies done upon your treasure, ye claw me, and say I am an honest man, and a good citizen. But I would you knew it, and I tell you plainly, I am more ashamed of the honor you do me now, then I was of the fine you did set upon me, when you condemned me the last yeare: and I am sorie to speake it, that you shoulde thinke it more commendation to pleasure the wicked, then to prelerue the common wealth. After he had spoken these words, and had bewrayed the common thestes the offices of the city did commit: he stopped the theues mowthes that so highly praised and commended him for so honest a man, but yet of the noble and honest citizens he was much commended. Furthermore, on a time when Darius Lieutenant to Darius king of PERSEA, was come with all his navy to goe alande about MARATHON, in the contrie of ATTICA, upon pretence (as he sayd) to be reuenged onely of the ATHENIANS that had burnt the city of SARDIS, but in dede of minde to conquer all GREECE, and to destroy the whole contrie before him: the ATHENIANS chose tenne Captaines to go to the warres, amonge whom Miltiades was the chiefeest man of authority. But Aristides drew very neere him in reputation and creditte, because he did very good seruice in obtaining the victorie, specially when he agreed with Miltiades in counsaill, to geue battell upon the barbarous people: and also when he willingly gaue Miltiades the whole rule and order of the army. For euery one of the tenne Captaines did by turnes leade the whole army for one whole day: and when Aristides turne came about, he gaue his preferment thereof vnto Miltiades, teaching his other companions, that it was no shame, but honor for them, to be ruled by the wisest. Thus by his example, he appealed all strife that might haue grown amonge them, and perswaded them all to be contented to follow his direction and counsaill, that had best experience in warre. And so he did much aduance Miltiades honor. For, after that Aristides had once yielded his authority vnto him, euery one of the rest did the like when it came to their turne: and so they all submitted them selues vnto his rule and leading. But on the day of the battell, the place where the ATHENIANS were most combed, was in the midst of the battell, where they had set the tribes of the Leontides, and of Antiochides: for thither the barbarous people did bend all their force, and made their greatest fight in that place. By which occasion, Themistocles and Aristides fighting one hard by another, for that the one was of the tribe Leontides, and the other of Antiochides, they valiantly fought it out with the enemies, enuying one another: so as the barbarous people at the last beinge ouerthrowen, they made them flie, and draue them to their shippes. But when they were imbarcked & gone, the Captaines of the ATHENIANS perceiuing they made not towards the Iles which was their direct course to returne into ASIA, but that they were driuen backe by storme of winde and pyrites of the sea, towards the coast of ATTICA, and the city of ATHENS, fearinge least they might finde ATHENS vnfurnished for defence, and might set upon it: they thereupon sent away presently nine tribes that marched thither with such speede, as they came to ATHENS the very same day, and left Aristides in the campe at MARATHON, with his tribe and contry men, to looke to the prisoners and spoyle they hadde wonne of the barbarous people. Who nothing deceiued the opinion they had of his wisdom. For notwithstanding there was great store of golde and siluer, much apparell, moueables, and other infinite goodes and riches in all their tentes and pavillions, and in the shippes alfo they had taken of theirs: he was not so couetous as once to touch them, nor to suffer any other to medle with them, vnlesse by stealth some prouided for them selues. As amongst other, there was one Callias, one of Ceres Priestes, called Dadonchos, as you would saye the torch bearer: (for in the secret sacrifices of Ceres, his office was to holde the torch) whom when one of the barbarous people saw, and how he ware a bande about his head, and long heare, he took him for some king, and falling on his knees at his feete, kissed his hand, and shewed him great store of golde he hadde hidden and buried in a ditch. But Callias, like a most cruell, and cowardly wretch of all other on the earth, tooke away the gold, and killed the poore soule that had shewed him the place, because he should not tell it to others. Hereof it cometh, that the comical Poets do call those that came of him in mockery, Laccoplates, as made rich by a ditch: because of the golde that Callias founde in it. Immediately after this battell, Aristides was chosen prouost of ATHENS for the yere: albeit Demetrius Phalerius writeth, that it was a litle before his death, after the iorney of PLATEES. For in their Chronicles, where they set in order their prouosts of ATHENS for the yere, since Xanthippides time, there appeareth no one name of Aristides in that yere, that Mardonius the kinge of PERSIAES Lieutenant was ouerthrowen by PLATEES, which was many yeres after. But contrariwise they finde Aristides enrolled amonge the prouostes immediately after Phanippus, in the yere the battell was fought at MARATHON. Now the people did most commend Aristides iustice, as of all other his vertues and qualities: because that vertue is most common and in vse in our life, and deliuereth most benefite to men. Hereof it came, that he beinge a meane man, obtained the worthiest name that one coulde haue, to be called by the whole city, a iust man. This surname was neuer desired of kinges, princes, nor of tyrannes, but they alwayes delighted to be surnamed, some Poliorestes, to say, conquerors of cities: other Cerami, to say, lightening or terrible: other Nicanores, to say, subduers: and some other, Asi and Hieraces, to say Eagles or Fawcons, or such like birdes that praye: desiringe rather (as it should appeare by those surnames) the praise and reputation growinge by force and power, then the commendation that cometh by vertue and goodnes. And notwithstanding, God whom men desire most to be likened to, doth excell all humaine nature in three speciall thinges: in immortality, in power, and in vertue, of which three, vertue is the most honorable and precious thing. For as the naturall Philosophers reason, all the foure elements and Vacuum, are immortal and vncorruptible, and so are force and power, earthquakes, lighteninge, terrible stormes, runninge riuers, and inundacions of waters: but as for iustice and equity, no man is partaker of them, saue onely God, by means of reason and vnderstandinge. Therefore, because men commonly haue three sundry honors to the gods: the first, that they thinke them blessed: the second, that they feare them: the third, that they reuerence them: it appeareth then that they thinke them blessed, for the eternitie and immortality of their godhead: that they feare them, because of their omnipotency & power: and that they loue and worshippe them, for their iustice and equitie. And yet notwithstanding, of those three, men do couet immortality, which no flesh can attaine vnto: and also power, which dependeth most vpon fortune: and in the meane time they leaue vertue alone, whereof the goddes of their goodnes haue made vs capable. But here they shewe them selues fooles. For iustice maketh the life of a noble man, and of one in great authority, keene diuine and celestiall: where without iustice, and dealinge vnjustly, his life is most beastly, and odious to the worlde. But now againe to Aristides. This surname of a iust man at the beginning, made him beloued of all the people: but afterwards it turned him to great ill will, and specially by Themistocles practise. Who gaue it our euery where, that Aristides had ouerthrowen all iustice, because by consent of the parties he was euer chosen Arbitrator to end all controuersies: & how by this meanes he secretly had procured the absolute power of a king, not needing any gard or souldiers about him. The people moreover beinge grown very dissolute and licentious, by reason of the victorie of MARATHON, who sought that all things should passe by them, and their authoritie: beganne nowe to mislike, and to be greatly offended, that any priuate man should go before the rest in good fame and reputation. Whereupon, they came out of all sheres of ATTICA into the city of ATHENS, and so banished Aristides with the Ostracifmon: disguising the enuy they bare to his glory, with the name of feare

A of tyranny. For this maner of banishment called Ostracifmon, or Exostracifmon, was no ordinary punishment for any fault or offence committed: but to geue it an honest cloke, they sayd it was onely a pulling downe and tying shorte, of to much greatnesse and authority, exceeding farre the maner and countenance of a popular state. But to tell you truly, it was none otherwile, the gentle meane to qualify the peoples enuy against some priuate person: which enuy bred no malice to him whole greatnes did offend them, but onely tended to the banishing of him for tenne yeres. But afterwards that by practise, this Ostracifmon banishment was layed upon meane men, and malefactors, as vpon Hyperbolus that was the last man so banished: they neuer after vsed it any more at ATHENS. And by the way, it shall not be amiss to tell you here, why, & wherefore this Hyperbolus was banished. Alcibiades and Nicias were the chiefest men of ATHENS at that time, and they both were euer at square together, a common thing amongst great men. They perceiuing now by the peoples assembling, that they went about to execute the Ostracifmon, were maruelously afraied it was ment to banish one of them: wherefore they spake together, and made both their followers friends with eche other, and ioyned them in one tribe together, insomuch, when the most voyces of the people were gathered to condemne him that should be banished, they founde it was Hyperbolus. The people therewith were much offended, to see the Ostracifmon so embased and scorned, that they neuer after would vse it againe, and so left it of for euer. But briefly to let you vnderstande what the Ostracifmon was, and after what sorte they vsed it, ye are to know: that at a certaine day appointed, euery citizen caried a great shell in his hande, whereupon he wrote the name of him he would haue banished, and brought it into a certeine place railed about with woden barres in the market place. Then, when euery man hadde brought in his shell: the magistrates, and officers of the city, did count and tell the number of them. For if there were lesse then sixe thousand citizens, that had thus brought the shells together: the Ostracifmon was not full and perfect. That done, they layd a parte euery mans name written in these shells: and whose name they founde wrytten by most citizens, they proclaimed him by sounde of trompet, a banished man for tenne yeres, during which time notwithstanding, the party did enioy all his goodnes. Now euery man wryting thus his name in a shell, whom they would haue banished: it is reported there was a plaine man of the contry (very simple) that coulde neither wryte, nor read, who came to Aristides (being the first man he met with) & gaue him his shell, praying him to wryte Aristides name vpon it. He beinge abashed withall, did aske the contrie man, if Aristides had euer done him any displeasure. No, sayed the contrie man, he neuer did me hurt, nor I know him not: but it greeues me to heare euery man call him a iust man. Aristides hearing him say so, gaue him no aunswere, but wrote his owne name vpon the shell, and deliuered it againe to the contrie man. But as he went his way out of the cite, he lift vpp his handes to heauen, and made a prayer contrary to that of Achilles in Homer, beseeching the goddes that the ATHENIANS might neuer haue such troubles in hande, as they should be compelled to call for Aristides againe. Notwithstanding, within three yeres after, when Xerxes king of PERSIA came with his army through the contries of THESSALIE and BOEOTIA, and entred into the heart of the contrie of ATTICA: the ATHENIANS reuoking the lawe of their Ostracifmon, called home againe all those they had banished, and specially, because they were afraied Aristides would take parte with the barbarous people, and that his example should moue many other to do the like, wherein they were greatly deceiued in the nature of the man. For before that he was called home, he continually travelled vp and downe, perswading and incorage the GREECIANS to mainteine and defende their liberty: After that lawe was repealed, and published, and that Themistocles was chosen the only Lieutenant generall of ATHENS, he did alwayes faithfully aide and assist him in all thinges, as well with his trauell, as also with his counsaill: and thereby wanne his enemy great honor, because it stoode upon the safetie and preferuation of his contrie. For when Eurybiades, generall of the armie of the GREECIANS, had determined to forsake the Ile of SALAMINA, & that the gallies of the barbarous people were come into the midst of the seas, and had enuironned the Iles all about, & the mouth of the arme of the straight of SALAMINA, before any man knew they were thus inclosed in: Aristides departing out of the Ile of AEgina with a maruelous boldenes, ventred through the midst of all the barbarous shippes and fleetes, and by good happe gotte in the night into Themistocles tent, and calling him out, spake with him there in this sorte. Themistocles, if we be both wise, it is high time we shoulde now leaue of this vaine enuie and spite we haue long time borne eche other, and that we shoulde enter into an other sorte of enuy more honorable and profitable for vs both. I meane, which of vs two shoulde do his best endeour to saue Greece: you, by ruling and commaunding all like Lieutenant generall: and I, by counselling you for the best, and executing your commaundement: considering you are the man alone that will roundliest come vnto the point that is best: which is in my opinion, that we shoulde hazard battell by sea within the straight of SALAMINA, and that as soone as might be possible. But if our frendes and confederates do let this to be put in execution, I do assure you, your enemies do helpe it forward. For it is sayd, that the sea, both before and behinde vs, and rounde about vs, is covered all ouer with their shippes, so as they that would not before, shall be now compelled of force, and in spite of their heartes, to fight and besturre them like men: bicause they are compassed in all about, and there is no passage left open for them to escape, nor to flee. Whereunto Themistocles answered, I am fory, Aristides, that herein your honesty appeareth greater then mine: but since it is so, that you haue deserued the honor in beginning, and procuring such an honorable and commendable strife betwene vs, I will henceforth indeuor my selfe to exceede you in continuing this your desire. After which answer, he told Aristides, how he purposed to mocke the barbarous kinge, and prayed him to intreate Eurybiades to yelde to his deuise, & to perswade him that there was no other way to saue Greece, but to fight by sea: for Eurybiades gaue more creditt to Aristides perswasions, then he did to Themistocles wordes. For when all the Captaines were called to counsell, to determine whether they shoulde geue battell or not: one Cleocritus CORINTHIAN sayd to Themistocles, that his counsell did not like Aristides at all, as it seemed, bicause he spake neuer a worde to it being present. Aristides answered him straight, that he vtterly mistooke him. For, quod he, I did not thinke his counsell good, I would not hold my peace as I do: but now I am mute, nor for any good will I beare him, but bicause I finde his counsell wise and sounde. While the Captaines of the GREECIANS were reasoning in this sorte, Aristides seeing PSYTTALEA (a little llande before SALAMINA within the straight) full of men of warre of their enemies: imbarcked immediately the valliantest and lustiest souldiers he hadde of all his contry men, into the least foystes or pynnacles he had among all his gallies: and went with them, and landed in that Ile, and ouerthrew all the barbarous people he founde there, and put them to the sword euery man, taking the chieftest of them only prisoners, among which, were three sonnes of Sandanes, the kinges sister, whome he sent vnto Themistocles. These three Lordes were all slaine by the commaundement of Euphrantides the Soothsayer, and sacrificed to Bacchus Omestes, as to say, the cruell Bacchus, and eater of raw flesh, and all vpon an oracle they had receiued. That done, Aristides disperfed his souldiers about the Ile, to receiue all such as were by fortune of warre, or of the sea, cast into the llande: to the end that no enemy of theirs shoulde scape their hands, nor any of his frendes should perish. For the greatest fleet of all their shippes, and the sharpest encounter of the whole battell, was about this little llande: and therefore the tokens of triumphe were set there. After the battell was wonne, Themistocles to seele Aristides opinion, sayd vnto him: we haue done a good peece of seruice, but yet there is an other behinde of greater importance, and that is this. We must bringe all ASIA into EVROPE, which we may easily do, if we saile with all speede to the straight of HELLESPONT, and go breake the bridge the king hath made there. Then Aristides cried out, stay there, neuer speake of that: but I pray you let vs rather seeke all the wayes we can, how to driue this barbarous king out of Greece, least if we kepe him in still with so great an army (and he shall see no way before him to escape out) we driue him then to fight like a desperate man, and perill our selues, we can not tell to what. When Themistocles had hearde his opinion, he secretly sent the euenuke Arnaeus his prisoner, vnto kinge Xerxes, to aduertise him from him, that he had altered the GREECIANS purpose, which was fully bent to haue broken vp the bridge he hadde made at the straight of HELLESPONT, to passe ouer his army: and that he was the willingest to let him vnderstande it, that he might the better prouide for the safety of his person. King Xerxes being nettled with this

Aristides came of Themistocles.

A this aduertisement, tooke straight his iorney, and with all speede went to recover the straight of HELLESPONT, and left Mardonius his Lieutenant generall in Greece, with three hundred thousand of the best souldiers of his army. This Mardonius was maruelously dreaded of all the GREECIANS, for the wonderfull great army he hadde by lande, and he did threaten them also by his letters he wrote vnto them. You haue, (sayd he) with your shippes by sea, ouercomen acquainted to fight by lande, and that neuer handeled ouer: but now, the plaines of THESSALIE, or the fieldes of BOBOTIA, are very fayer and large for horsemen and footemen to make proofe of their valliantnes, if you will come to the battell in the field. He wrote letters to the ATHENIANS, by the kinge his maisters commaundement, of other effect, and offered them from him, to builde vp their city againe, to geue them a great pencion, and furthermore to make them Lordes of all Greece, so they would geue ouer, and leaue of these warres. The LACEDÆMONIANS beinge forthwith aduertised of his letters wrytten to the ATHENIANS, and fearing lest they would haue bene perswaded by them: sent their Ambassadors with all speede to ATHENS, to pray them to send their wiues and children vnto SPARTA, and also to offer them vittalles, to relieue their poore olde people, bicause of the great scarcity that was at ATHENS, for that their city was burnt and rased, and all their contry besides destroyed by the barbarous people. The ATHENIANS hauing heard the offers of the Ambassadors of LACEDÆMON, made them a maruelous answer through Aristides counsell, and this it was. That they bare with the barbarous people, though they thought all thinges were to be sold for gold & silver, bicause they esteemed nothing more precious, nor better in this world, then to be riche and wealthy: but on the other side, they were greatly offended with the LACEDÆMONIANS, that they only regarded the present poeury and necessity of the ATHENIANS, and did forget their vertue and noble corage, thinking to make them fight more valliantly for the preseruacion of Greece, by offering them vittalls to liue withall. The people approuing this answer, Aristides then caused the Ambassadors of SPARTA to come to the assembly, and commaunded them to tell the LACEDÆMONIANS by worde of mouth, that all the golde above, or vnder the ground, could not corrupt the ATHENIANS, to make them take any summe of money or reward, to leaue the defence of the liberty of Greece: & to the herald that came from Mardonius, he shewed him the summe, and sayd vnto him: so long as yonder summe keepeth his course about the worlde, so long will the ATHENIANS be mortall enemies vnto the PERSIANS, bicause they haue spoyled and destroyed all their contry, and haue defiled and burnt the temples of their goddes. Besides, he willed that the Priestes, by commaundement of the people, shoulde excommunicate and curse him that would procure them to sende vnto the PERSIANS to make peace with them, and to breake their league and allyance with the other GREECIANS. Hereupon, when Mardonius came againe the seconde time to ouerrunne the contry of ATTICA: the ATHENIANS got the againe into the Ile of SALAMINA, and then they sent Aristides Ambassador vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. He sharply tooke them vp, and reproued their sloth and negligence, bicause they had againe forsaken ATHENS, and left it to the spoyles of the barbarous people: and prayed them yet they would looke to saue the rest of Greece. The Ephori (which were certein officers that ruled all thinges within the city of SPARTA) when they had hearde Aristides perswasions: straight tooke order for ayde, though it appeared they did nothing all day but play, and make good cheere, keeping that day one of their solemne feastes they called Hyacinthia. Howbeit the next night following, they sent out fise thousande citizens borne in SPARTA, into the fielde, all proper men and valliant souldiers, euery one of them carying with him, seuen Illores (which are the contry men and slaues in the contrie of LACEDÆMONIA) not making the Ambassadors of ATHENS priuy to it at all. Wherefore Aristides came againe an other time into their counsell, to complaine of their negligence. But they fell a laughinge, and sayd he dreamed, or else he mocked them: for their army which they had sent against the straungers (for so they called the PERSIANS) was already at the city of ORESTION in ARCADIA. Aristides hearing their answer, replied, that they were to blame to mocke them in that sorte, to sende away their men so secretly, that they might not knowe of it: and that it was no time for them now to go about to deceite their frendes, but their enemies rather. Idomeneus in his story reporteth the matter

thus in euery point. Notwithstanding, in the decree that was made to sende Ambassadors to SPARTA, Aristides is not named for Ambassador, but there are other appointed: as Cimon, Xanthippus, and Myronides. Afterwardes Aristides was chosen by voyces of the people, Lieutenant general of the army of ATHENS, in this warre against the PERSIANS, and went vnto the campe of the GREECIANS by the cite of PLATÆES, with eight thousand footemen well armed and appointed. There he found king Paufanias the only general of all the whole power and army of the GREECIANS, who brought with him the force of SPARTA: and there came daily into his campe one after another, a marvelous great multitude of other GREECIANS. Now touching the army of the barbarous people, they incaped all alongest the river of ASOPVS: but bicause their campe stretched out a marvelous way in length, they were not intrenched at all, but had only fortified a peece of grounde foure square with a walle about, which was ten furlonges on euery side, to place all their cariage and chiefeest thinges in. And for the GREECIANS againe, the foorthlayer Tisamenus, borne in the city of ELIDE, had told Paufanias, & all the GREECIANS together, that they should haue the victory, so they did not assault at all, but only defend. And Aristides, that had sent to the oracle of Apollō at DELPHES, in the name of the ATHENIANS, had answer: they should overcome their enemies, so they did sacrifice and make speciall prayers, vnto Iupiter and Iuno of mount CITHÆRON, vnto Pan, and vnto the Nymphes Sphragitides, and also vnto the demy gods, Androcrates, Leucon, Pisander, Democrates, Hypsiōn, Atæon, & Polydus: and so that they did hazard battell also within their owne territories, and in the plaine of Ceres Eleufinian, and of Proserpina. This oracle troubled Aristides maruelously, bicause the demy goddes whome they had commaundement to do sacrifice vnto, were the fownders and auncesters of the PLATÆIANS: and the cause of the Nymphes Sphragitides, is one of the toppes of mount CITHÆRON, looking towards the west, where the sunne setteth in sommer. They say there was an oracle there in old time, whose spirit possessed many inhabitants thereabouts, and besought them of their wittes: whereupon, they called those so possessed, Nympholepty, as who would say, taken with the Nymphes. And againe tolde the ATHENIANS they should haue the victory, so they did hazard battell in the plaine of Ceres Eleufinian, and within their owne territorie: it was euen to sende them backe againe into the contry of ATTICA. Aristides being thus perplexed, Arimnestus Captaine of the PLATÆIANS, hadde such a vision in the night in his sleepe. Him thought that Iupiter the sauour did appeare vnto him, and asked him what the GREECIANS intended to do? and that he answered: my Lord, we must to morrowe remove our campe into the territories of ELEYSIN, and there we will fight with the barbarous people, according to the commaundement the oracle of Apollō hath geuen vs. Then that Iupiter replied, that they were greatly deceaued: for all that Apollō had declared by his oracle was ment within the territorie of the PLATÆIANS, and that they should finde it true, if they considered it well. Arimnestus hauinge plainly seene this vision in his sleepe, when he did awake in the morning, he straight sent for the oldest citizens, and considering with them where this place should be, he founde at the length, that at the foote of mount CITHÆRON, by the city of NYSTIA, there was an olde temple they called the temple of Ceres Eleufinian, and of her daughter Proserpina. When he hearde them say so, he went straight and tolde Aristides of it, and founde that it was an excellent place to set an army in battell raye, that hadde but fewe horsemen: for that the foote of mount CITHÆRON did lette the horsemen, they could not goe to the place where the temple floode, and where the playne and valley did ende: besides also, that the chappell of Androcrates was euen in that place, which was all hidden with thicke wodde rounde about it. And bicause they should lacke nothing to hinder the expresse commaundement of the oracle for hope of victory: the PLATÆIANS (through Arimnestus counsell and aduise) made a common decree, that the confines of the city of PLATÆES should be taken away towards ATHENS side, and that the lande thereof should be geuen clearly vnto the ATHENIANS, bicause they should fight with the barbarous people in their owne lande, for the defence and preferuacion of GREECE, according to the commaundement of the oracle. This noble gift and present of the PLATÆIANS was so famous, as many yeares after, king Alexander the great hauing conquered the Empire of ASIA, built vp the walles againe of the city of PLATÆES, and when he had done, made a herald

A heraulde openly proclaime it at the games Olympical: that Alexander hadde done the PLATÆIANS that honor and dignitie, for a memoriall and honor of their magnanimity. Bicause in the warre against the PERSIANS, they had freely and liberally geuen away their lande vnto the ATHENIANS, for the safetie of the GREECIANS: and had shewed them selues of a noble corage also, and very willinge to defende the state of GREECE. Now when the army of the GREECIANS came to be sette in order of battell, there fell a strife betwene the ATHENIANS and the TEGEATES, bicause the ATHENIANS would nedes (according to their old custome) haue the left wing of the battell, if the LACEDÆMONIANS had the right winge: and the TEGEATES on the contrary parte, would haue the preheminance before the ATHENIANS, alleging the famous acts and notable seruice of their auncesters in former warres, whereupon the ATHENIANS did mutine. But Aristides stept betwene them, and told them, that it was no time now to contend with the TEGEATES about their nobility and valliantnesse: and as for you, my Lords of SPARTA, sayed he, and you also my maisters of GREECE: we tell you, that the place neither geueth nor taketh vertue away, and we doe assure you that where soeuer you place vs, we will so defend and kepe it, as we will not impaire nor blemish the honor we haue wonne in former foughten battells, and gotten victories. For we are not come hither to quarrell and fall out with our friends, but to fight with our common enemies: not to bragge of our auncesters doings, but to shew our selues valliant in defence of al GREECE. For this battail will make good prooffe to all the GREECIANS, how much estimation euery city, euery Captaine, & particular person wil deferue for his parte. When Aristides had spoken, the Captaines & all other of the counsil concluded in fauor of the ATHENIANS, that they should haue one of the winges of the battell. But by this meanes, all GREECE stood in maruelous garboyle at that time, and the state of the ATHENIANS specially in great danger. For a number of the noblest citizens of ATHENS. And that brought great substance with them to the warres, being now at low state, & in poerty, their goods being spent & gone, & seeing the selues discourtenaced, not bearing that rule & authority in the common wealth they were wont to do, bicause other were called to authority, and preferred to the offices of the citie: they gathered together, and met at a house in the city of PLATÆES, & there conspyred to ouerthrow the authority of the people at ATHENS: and if they could not obtaine their purpose, then that they would rather loofe all, and betray their contry vnto the barbarous people. While these thinges were practiced in the campe, many beinge of the conspiacy, Aristides came to an Incklinge of it, and was maruelously afayed, bicause of the time: wherefore he beganne to be carefull of the matter, being of such importance as it was, and yet would not be curious to vnderstand the whole conspiacy, litle knowing what a number might be drawn into this treason, if it were narrowly looked into, but rather respected that which was iust, then what was profitable for the time. So he caused eight persones only of the great number to be apprehended, and of these eight, the two first whome they would haue indited as principall, and were most to be burdened for the conspiacy, AEgibines of the towne of LAMPRA, and Egefus of the towne of ACHARNA, they founde meanes to flie out of the campe, and to saue themselves. And for the other, Aristides set them at liberty, and gaue them occasion that were not discouered, to be bold, and to repent them of their follies: saying, that the battell should be their iudge, where they should purge them selues of all accusations layed against them, and shew the world also, that they neuer had any other intencion but honest, and good, towards their contry. Mardonius, to proue the corage of the GREECIANS, had sent all his horsemen, (wherein he was farre stronger then the GREECIANS) to skirmish with the WHO were lodged at the foote of mount CITHÆRON, in strong places and full of stones, sauing the three thousand MEGARIANS, that camped in the plaine: by reason whereof, they were fore troubled and hurt, by the horsemen of the barbarous people that sette vpon them on euery side, for they might charge them where they would. Insomuch, in the ende, perceiving they alone could no longer resist the force of so great a multitude of the barbarous people: they sent with all speede possible to Paufanias, to pray him to send them present aide. Paufanias hearing this newes, and seeing in his owne sight the campe of the MEGARIANS almost all couered with shot and darts which the barbarous people threw at them, & that they were compelled to stand close together in a litle corner: he wit not what to do. For, to go thither in person with the Lacedæmonians that were footmen heavy armed, he thought that was no way to help them. So he proued to put some ambitious desire and enuy of honor, among the priuate Captaines and generalls of the army of the other Grecians, which were then about him: to see if he coule moue any mans courage and desire, to offer him selfe willingly to goe aide the Megarians. Howbeit they had all deafe eares, but Aristides: who promised to go in the name of the Athenians, and brought Olympiodorus into the fildes, (one of the valliantest Captaines that serued vnder him) with his company of three hundred chosen men, and certaine shot mingled amongst them. These fouldiers were ready in a moment, and marched straight in battell ray, a great pace towards the barbarous people. Masissius, that was generall of the horsemen of the Persians, a goodly tall man, perceiuing their comming towards him: turned his horse, and gallopped to them. The Athenians taried him, and kept their ground, and the encounter was very hot, because both the one and the other side did the best they could at this first onser to put the rest of the battell in ieopardy: and they fought so long, that Masissius horse was shot through the body with an arrow, that put him to such paine, as he neuer lin flinging, till he cast his mailer on the ground, armed as he was at all peces. So being on the ground, he could not rise againe, as well for the waight of his armor, as for that the Athenians came so sodainly vpon him. And notwithstanding there were many about him to help him in peces, yet they could find no way how to kill him, he was so thoroughly armed and loden with gold, copper, & iron, not only vpon his body and his heade, but also on his legges and armes: vntill at the length there was one that thrust the head of his dart through his beuer, and so killed him. The Persians perceiving that, fled immediatly, & forsooke the body of their generall. Shortly after it appeared to the Grecians that they had sped well at this skirmish, not because they had slaine many enemies, but for the great lamentacion the barbarous people made for the losse of Masissius. For his death did so grieve them, that they powled themselves, they clipped of their horse and moyle heares, & filled besides all the field therabouts with pitifull cries & threeces, as those that had lost the valliantest and chieftest man of authority of all their campe, next vnto Mardonius the kings Lieutenant. After this first skirmish, both the one and the other side kept their campe, and would not come into the field many dayes after: for the Soothsayers did promise both sides the victory, as much the Persians, as the Grecians, so they did but onely defend: and contrarywise, they did threaten them to be ouerthrowen, that did assault. But Mardonius finding vittells waxed scant, and that they were stored but for few dayes, and moreover how the Grecians daily grewe stronger by continuall repaire to their campe, the longer he delayed in the end he resolu'd to tary no lenger, but to passe the riuer of Asopus the next morning by breake of the day, & sodainly to set apon the Grecians. So he gaue the Captaines warning the night before what they should do, because euery man should be redy: but about midnight there came a horseman without any noyse at all, so neere to the Grecians campe, that he spake to the watche, and told them he would speake with Aristides, generall of the Athenians. Aristides was called for straight, and when he came to him, the horseman said vnto Aristides, I am Alexander king of Macedon, who for the loue and great good will beare you, haue put my self in the greatest danger that may be, to come at this present time to E aduertise you, that to morrow morning Mardonius will giue you battell: because your enemies sodaine comming apon you, should not make you afraide, being sodainly charged, and should not hinder also your valliant fightinge. For it is no new hope that is come to Mardonius, that makes him to fight: but only scarcety of vittells that forceth him to do it, considering that the prognosticators are all against it that he should geue you battell, both by reason of the ill tokens of their sacrifices, as also by the aunswers of their oracles, which hath put all the armie in maruelous feare, and stande in no good hope at all. Thus he is forced to putte all at aduerture, or else if he will needes lye still, to be starued to death for very famine. After king Alexander hadde imparted this secreet to Aristides, he prayed him to keepe it to him selfe, and to remember it in time to come. Aristides answered him then, that it was no reason he should keepe a matter of so great importance as that, from Pausanias, who was their Lieutenant generall of the whole armie: notwithstanding, he promised him he would tell it

A no man else before the battell, and that if the goddess gaue the Grecians the victorie, he did assure him, they should all acknowledge his great fauor and good will thewed vnto them. After they hadde talked thus together, kinge Alexander left him, and returned backe againe: and Aristides also went immediatly to Pausanias tent, and tolde him the talke kinge Alexander and he hadde together. Thereupon the priuate Captaines were sent for straight to counsaill, and there order was geuen, that euery manne shoulde haue his bandes ready, for they shoulde fight in the morninge. So Pausanias at that time (as Herodotus wryteth) layed vnto Aristides, that he would remoue the Athenians from the left to the right winge, because they shoulde haue the Persians them selues right before them, and that they shoulde fight so much the lustier, both for that they were acquainted with their fight, as also because they hadde ouercommmed them before in the first encounter: and that him selfe would take the left winge of the battell, where he shoulde encounter with the Grecians that fought on the Persians side. But when all the other priuate Captaines of the Athenians vnderstoode it, they were maruelous angrie with Pausanias, and layed he did them wronge, and hadde no reason to lette all the other Grecians keepe their place where they were alwayes appointed, and onely to remoue them, as if they were slaues, to be appointed at his pleasure, now of one side, then of the other, and to sette them to fight with the valliantest fouldiers they had of all their enemies. Then layed Aristides to them, that they knewe not what they sayed, and how before they misliked, and did strue with the Tegeates, onely for hauing the left wing of the battell, and when it was graunted, they thought them selues greatly honored that they were preferred before them, by order of the Captaines: and now where the Lacedæmonians were willing of them selues to geue them the place of the right winge, and did in manner offer them the prehemience of the whole armie: they do not thankfully take the honor offered them, nor yet doe reckon of the vantage and benefite geuen them to fight against the Persians selues, their auncient enemies, and not against their natural contry men anciently descended of them. When Aristides had vsed all these perswasions vnto them, they were very well contented to change place with the Lacedæmonians: and then all the talke amonge them was to encourage one an other, and to tell them that the Persians that came against them, had no better hartes nor weapons, then those whom they before hadde ouercome, in the plaine of Marathon. For layed they, they haue the same bowes, the same riche imbrodered gownes, the same golden chaines and carcanettes of womanish persone, hanging on their cowardly bodies and faint hartes: where we haue also the same weapons and bodies we hadde, and our hartes more liuely and coragious then before, through the sundrie victories we haue since gotten of them. Further, we haue this aduantage more. That we doe not fight as our other confederates the Grecians do, for our city and contry onely, but also to continue the fame and renowne of our former noble seruice, which we wanne at the iorneyes of Marathon and of Salamina: to the ende the worlde shoulde not thinke that the glory of these triumphes and victories was due vnto Atilades onely, or vnto fortune, but vnto the corage and worthinesse of the Athenians. Thus were the Grecians thoroughly occupied to change the order of their battell in haft. The Thebans on the other side that tooke parte with Mardonius, receiuing intelligence of the alteringe of their battell, by traytors that ranne betwene both campes: they straight tolde Mardonius of it. He thereupon did sodainly also change the order of his battell, and placed the Persians from the right winge to the left winge of his enemies: either because he was afraied of the Athenians, or else for greater glorie that he hadde a desire to fight with the Lacedæmonians, and commaunded the Grecians that tooke his parte, that they shoulde fight against the Athenians. This alteration was so openly done, that euery manne might see it: whereupon Pausanias remoued the Lacedæmonians againe, and sette them in the right winge. Mardonius seeinge that, remoued the Persians againe from the left winge, and brought them to the right winge (where they were before) against the Lacedæmonians: and thus they continued all that day in changinge their men to and fro. So the Captaines of the Grecians saie in counsaill at night, and there they agreed, that they must needs remoue their campe, and lodge in some other place where they might haue water at commaundement: because their enemies did continually trouble and spoyle that water they had about them, with their horses. Now when night came, the Captaines would haue marched away with their men, to go to the lodginge they had appointed: but the people went very ill willinge to it, and they hadde much a do to keepe them together. For they were no sooner out of the trenches and fortification of their campe, but the most parte of them ranne to the cite of PLATÆES, and were maruelously out of order, dispersing them selues here and there, and set vp their tents where they thought good, before the places were appointed for them: and there were none that taried behinde, but the LACEDÆMONIANS onely, and that was against their willes. For one of their Captaines called Amompharetus, a maruelous hardie man, that feared no daunger, and longed fore for battell: he was in such a rage with these trifling delays, that he cried it out in the campe, that this remouinge was a goodly runninge away, and sware he would not from thence, but would there tary Mardonius comming with his companie. Pausanias went to him, and tolde him he must doe that the other GREECIANS hadde consented to in counsell, by most voyces. But Amompharetus tooke a great stone in his handes, and threw it downe at Pausanias feette, and tolde him there is the signe I geue to conclude battell, and I passe not for all your cowardly conclusions. Amompharetus stubbornesse did so amaze Pausanias, that he was at his wittes ende. So he sent vnto the ATHENIANS that were onwarde on their way, to pray them to tary for him, that they might goe together: and therewithall made the rest of his menne to marche towards the cite of PLATÆES, supposinge thereby to haue drawn Amompharetus to haue followed him, or else he ment to remaine alone behinde. But in trifling thus, the day brake: and Mardonius vnderstandinge that the GREECIANS did forsake their first lodging, he made his army presently marche in battell ray to sette upon the LACEDÆMONIANS. So the barbarous people made great howtes and cries, not thinking to goe fight, but to goe sacke and spoyle the GREECIANS flyinge away, as in deede they did little better. For, Pausanias seeinge the countenance of his enemies, made his ensignes to stay, and commaunded euery man to prepare to fight: but he forgate to geue the GREECIANS the signall of the battell, either for the anger he tooke against Amompharetus, or for the sodayne onser of the enemies, which made them that they came not in ftraight, nor altogether to the battell after it was begonne, but straggling in small companies, some here, and some there. In the meane time, Pausanias was buile in sacrificinge to the goddess, and seeinge that the first sacrifices were not acceptable vnto them, by the Soothsayers obseruations they made: he commaunded the SPARTANS to throwe their targettes at their feette, and not to sturre out of their places, but onely to doe as he bad them, without resistinge their enemies. When he hadde geuen this straight order, he went againe and did sacrifice, when the horsemen of the enemies were at hande, and that their arrowes fiewe amongst the thickest of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and did hurte diuerse of them, and specially poore Callierates amonge the rest, that was one of the goodliest menne in all the GREECIANS hoste and armie. He hauing his deatnes wounde with an arrow, before he gaue vpp the ghost, sayed his death did not grieve him, bicause he came out of his contrie to dye for the defence of GRECE: but it grieved him to dye so cowardly, hauinge geuen the enemye neuer a blowe. His death was maruelous lamentable, and the constancy of the SPARTANS wonderfull: for they neuer stirred out of their places, nor made any countenance to defende them selues against their enemies that came upon them, but suffred them selues to be thrust through with arrowes, and slaine in the field, lookinge for the houre the goddess would appoint them, and that their Captaine would commaunde them to fight. Some wyte also, that as Pausanias was at his prayers, and doing sacrifice vnto the goddess a litle behinde the battell, certeine of the LYDIANS came upon him, and ouerthrew and tooke away all his sacrifice: and how Pausanias, and those that were about him, (hauinge no other weapons in their handes) draue them awaye with force of staues and whippes. In memorie whereof, they saye there is a solemne procession kept at SPARTA on that daye, which they call the LYDIANS procession, where they whippe and beate younge boyes about the aulter. Then was Pausanias in great distresse, to see the Priestes offer sacrifice vpon sacrifice, and that not one of them pleased the goddess: at the last he turned his eyes to the temple of Iuno, and wept, and holdinge vp his handes, besought Iuno Citharon, and

and all the other goddesses, (patrones and protectors of the contry of the PLATÆIANS) that if it were not the will of the goddess the GREECIANS should haue the victorie, yet that the conquerors at the least should buie their deatnes dearly, and that they should finde they fought against valliant men and worthy souldiers. Pausanias had no sooner ended his prayer, but the sacrifices fell out very fauorable, insomuch the Priestes and Soothsayers came to promise him victory. Thereupon, he straight gaue commaundement to march toward the enemy, which flew from man to man incontinently how they should march. So as he that hadde seene the Squadrō of the LACEDÆMONIANS, would haue said it had bene like the body of a fierce beast raising vp his bristles, preparing to fight. Then the barbarous people saw they should haue a hotte battell, and that they should mete with men that would fight it out to the death: wherefore they couered their bodies with great targets after the PERSIAN facion, & bestowed their arrowes lustly upon the LACEDÆMONIANS. But they keeping close together, and coueringe them selues with their shields, marched on stil upon them, vntill they came to ioyne with the enemy so lustly, that they made their targets fle out of their handes, with the terrible thrustes and blowes of their pikes & speares upon their breastes, and ouerthwart their faces, that they flew many of them, and layed them on the grounde. For all that, they dyed not cowardly, but tooke the LACEDÆMONIANS pikes and speares in their bare handes, and brake them in two by strength of their armes: and then they quickly pluckt out their cimeters and axes, and lustly layed about them, and wrong the LACEDÆMONIANS shields out of their handes by force, and fought it out with the great while hand to hand. Now, whilst the LACEDÆMONIANS were busily fighting with the barbarous people, the ATHENIANS stood still imbattell farre off, & kept their ground. But when they saw the LACEDÆMONIANS tary so long, & that they came not, and heard a maruelous noyle of men as though they were fighting, and besides that there came a speedy messenger vnto them sent from Pausanias, to let the vnderstand they were fighting: then they marched with all speede they could to help them. But as they were comming on a great pace ouer the playne, vnto that parte where they heard the noyle: the GREECIANS that were on Mardonius side came against them. Aristides seeing them coming towards them, went a good way before his company, & cried out as loude as he could for life, and coniuired the GREECIANS in the name of the gods, the protectors of GRECE, to leaue of these warrs, and not to trouble the ATHENIANS that were going to helpe the that ventured their liues; to defend the common wealth & safety of all GRECE. But when he saw they would nedes fight for any request and coniuiration he could vse, and that they came still upon him, bending them selues to giue charge: then he stayed his going to relieue the LACEDÆMONIANS, & was compelled to make head against those that set upon him and his company, they beinge about fifty thousand men, of the which, the most parte notwithstanding went their waies, and left the army, specially when they vnderstood the PERSIANS were ouerthrowen and fled. The fury of the battell, and cruellest fight (as they say) was where the THEBANS were: bicause the nobility & chiefeft men of the contry fought very earnestly for the PERSIANS, but the people refused, being led by a smal number of the nobility that commaunded the. So they fought that day in two places, the LACEDÆMONIANS being the first that ouerthrew the PERSIANS, & made the flee: & they slue Mardonius the kings lieutenant, with a blow of a stone one Arminesus a SPARTAN gaue him upon his head, rightly as the oracle of Amphiarauus had prophecied before vnto him. For Mardonius before the battell had sent thither a LYDIAN, & a CARIAN, vnto the oracle of Trophonius, of the which, the prophet made answere vnto the CARIAN, in the CARIAN tonge: & the man of LYDIA lay within the sanctuary of Amphiarauus, where he thought in his dreame that one of the priestes of the tēple willed him to go out of the place he was in, and he denying it, the Priest tooke vp a great stone and threw it at his head, and so thought he was slaine with the blow. And thus it is writte: And furthermore, the LACEDÆMONIANS did chase the PERSIANS flying, into their fortificatio they had in a wodde: & the ATHENIANS also shortly after ouerthrew the THEBANS wherof they slue in the field, a newes hundred of the noblest & chiefeft of them. For euen as the THEBANS began to turne tayle, there came vnto the ATHENIANS, that the PERSIANS had intrenched them selues within their forte and strength in the wodde, where the LACEDÆMONIANS did besiege them. The ATHENIANS suffered the GREECIANS that fled to saue them selues, and they went to help the LACEDÆMONIANS, to take the soma of the barbarous people: who went before but slenderly about it, bicause they had no experience to make an assault, nor force vpon a walle. But so soone as the ATHENIANS came into them, they straight tooke it by assault, and made great slaughter of the PERSIANS and barbarous people. For of three hundred thousand fighting men that Mardonius had in his campe, there were slaued only but forty thousand led vnder Artabazus: and of the GREECIANS side, there were not slaine about thirtene hundred and three score in all, amongst which also there were two and fifty ATHENIANS, all of the tribe of AEantides, the which had done more valiantly that day, then any other tribe, as Clidemus writeth. And this is the cause why the AEantides made a solemne sacrifice vnto the Nymphes Sphragitides, at the common charge, according to the order geuen them by the oracle of Apollo, to geue them thanks for this victorie. Of the LACEDÆMONIANS there dyed four score and eleuen: and of the TEGEATES, sixteene. But I maruell Herodotus sayth, that none but these people onely fought in that iorney against the barbarous nation, and no other GREECIANS besides: for the number of the dead bodies, and their graues also do shewe, that it was a generall victorie and exployte of all the GREECIANS together. And Moreouer, if there had bene but these three people onely that hadde fought against them, and that all the rest had stood and looked on, and done nothinge: sure there had bene no such epigramme as this, engrauen upon the alter or tombe that was set vp in the place of the battell.

When the victorious Greekes, had driven out of their lande, the Persians by force of armes, which long had them vnrithstande, they built to mighty Ioue, this holy altier here, and made it common for all Greece, as plainly may appeare. in Guerdon of the good, which he did them restore, in Guerdon of their liberty, which liked them euermore.

This battell was fought the fourth day of the moneth which the ATHENIANS call Boedromion, that is, about the moneth of Iuly, or after the BOEOTIANS accompt, the six & twenty of the moneth, they call Panemus, on which day there is yet kept a common assembly of the estates of GREECE, in the cities of PLATÆES, where the PLATÆIANS make a solemne sacrifice vnto Iupiter, protector of their libertie, to geue him thanks alwayes for this victorie. It is no maruail that there was such difference then betwixt the monethes and dayes, considering that euen now when astronomie is more perfectly vnderstanded, then it was then: some do yet beginne and ende their monethes at one day, and some at another. After this great battell and ouerthrow of the barbarous people, there rose great strife betwixt the ATHENIANS, and the LACEDÆMONIANS, touching the reward and honor of the victorie. For the ATHENIANS would not geue place vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor suffer them to set vp any tokens or signes of triumphe. Whereupon the GREECIANS running to armes in mutinie together, by this occasion they had almost spoyled one another: had not Aristides through his wisdom and wise perswasions, stayed, and quieted the other Captaines his companions, and specially one Leocrates and Myronides, whom he wanne with such discrete and gentle words, that they were contented to referre it wholly vnto the arbitrement and iudgement of the other people of GREECE. So the GREECIANS met in the same place together, purposely to decide their controuersie. In this counsell holden there, Theopiton a Capitaine of the MEGARIANS, sayd for his opinion, that to auoide the ciuill warre might growe betwene the GREECIANS upon this quarrell: he thought it very requisite, to appoint ouer the reward and honor of this victorie, vnto some other city, then to any of the two that fell out about it. After him rose vp Cleocritus CORINTHIAN, seeming to euery man there that he woulde haue requested this honor for the citie of CORINTH, beinge in dede the thirde citie in estimation of all GREECE, next vnto SPARTA and ATHENS: howbeit he made an oration in commendation of the PLATÆIANS, which was maruelously liked, & well thought of of euery man. For his opinion went flatly with the PLATÆIANS, that to ende this strife, they should geue the honor of this victorie vnto the citie of PLATÆES, and so woulde neither of both parties be angrie that they should be honored. Upon his wordes, Aristides first agreed on the ATHENIANS behalfe,

and

And then Paulani as for the LACEDÆMONIANS, that the PLATÆIANS should haue the reward. Now they both beinge agreed, before the spoyle was deuided betwene them, they sette aside foure score talentes that were geuen to the PLATÆIANS, with the which they built a temple vnto Minerua, and gaue her an image, and sett out all her temple with pictures that remaine whole vntill this day: and the LACEDÆMONIANS notwithstanding, did set vp their tokens of victorie by them selues, and the ATHENIANS theirs also by them selues. So, they sending vnto the oracle of Apollo in the city of DELPHES, to know vnto what gods, and how they should do sacrifice: Apollo answered them that they should build vp an altier vnto Iupiter, protector of their libertie, howbeit that they should put no sacrifice vpon it, vntill they had first put out all the fier through the whole contrie, bicause it had bene polluted and defiled by the barbarous people: and then, that they should sethe pure and cleane fyre at the common altier, whereon they doe sacrifice vnto Apollo Pythias, in the city of DELPHES. This answer beinge deliuered, the great Lords and officers of GREECE went through all the contrie, to put out the fyre euery where. And there was a man of the same city of PLATÆES at that time called Euchidas, that came and offered him selfe, and promised he woulde bringe them fyre from the temple of Apollo Pythias, with all possible speede that might be. So when he came to the city of DELPHES, after he hadde sprinkled and purified his body with cleane water, he put a crowne of lawrell upon his heade, and went in that manner to take fyre from the altier of Apollo. When he had done, he hyed him againe as fast as he coule runne for life, vnto the citie of PLATÆES, and came thither before the sunne was set, hauing commen and gone that day a thousand furlonges. But after he hadd saluted his citizens, and deliuered them the fyre he brought: he fell downe dead at their feete, and gaue vp the ghost. The PLATÆIANS lift him vp starke deade, and buried him in the temple of Diana Euclia, to say, of good renomme: and caused afterwards this Epitaph following to be grauen vpon his tombe.

*Engraued here doth lye, Euchidas speedy man, who in one day both to and fro, to Delphes lightly ranne.
Euen from this selfe same place, vvhich thou dost here behold, such hast, post hast, he swiftly made, thereof thou mayest be bolde.*

Many thinke that this goddesse Euclia is Diana, and so they call her. But other holde opinion that she was the daughter of Hercules, and of Myrto the Nympe Menestius daughter, and Pandrocus sister, that dyed a virgine, and was honored afterwarde as a goddesse, of the BOEOTIANS, & of the LOCRIANS. For in all their cities and townes in open places, they finde an altier and image dedicated vnto her: and all that are married, doe sacrifice to her upon that altier. Afterwards there was a generall counsell holden by all the GREECIANS, in the which Aristides made a motion, that all the cities of GREECE should yearly sende their deputies at a certeine day appointed, vnto the city of PLATÆES, there to make their prayers & sacrifices vnto the goddes: and that from five yeares, to five yeares, they should celebrate common games, that should be called the games of liberty: and that they should also leauy through all the prouinces of GREECE, for maintenance of the warres against the PERSIANS and barbarous people, tenne thousand footemen, a thousand horsemen, and a flete of a hundred sayle. Item that the PLATÆIANS thenceforth should be taken also for deuoute and holy men, and that no man should so hardy hurt or offend them, and that they should onely tende the sacrifices vnto the goddes, for the health and prosperitie of GREECE. All which articles were enacted in forme and maner aforesayd, and the PLATÆIANS bounde them selues yearly to kepe solemne sacrifices and anniuersaries for the soules of the GREECIANS that were slaine in their territories, fightinge for defence of the libertie of the GREECIANS. And this they obserue yet vnto this daye in this sorte. The sixteenth day of the moneth of Marmacterion (which the BOEOTIANS call Alalcomenies, and is about the moneth of Ianuary) they goe a procession, and before the procession there goeth a trompetor that foundeth the alarom. Then there follow certeine charrettes loden with branches of fyre tree, and with nosegayes and garlandes of triumphe: then a blacke bul, & certeine young gentlemen noble men fonnies, that carry great cawdrons with two eares full of wine and milke, such as they vse to powre upon the graues of deade men for propitiatory oblations, and other young boyes free borne, that cary oyles, perfumes, and other sweete odours in vyoll glasses. For no seruauit or bonde A man may lawfully be admitted to haue any office about this mistery, for that they whose memory they honor, dyed all fighting for defence of the liberty of GREECE. After all this shew, followeth the prouoist of the PLATONIANS for that time being, last of all: who may not all the rest of the year besides so much as touch any iron, nor wear any other coloured gowne but white. Howebeit then he weareth on a purple coloured coate, and holdeth a funerall poine in one of his handes, which he taketh in the towne house, and a naked sworde in the other hande, and so goeth through the citie in this sorte after all the pompe aforesayed, vnto the church yarde where all their graues be that were laine at that battell. So when he cometh thither, he draweth water out of a well that is there, and with the same he washeth the fouresquare pillars and images that stand upon those tombes, and then annointeth them with oyles, and sweete sauors: afterwarde, he facificeth a bulle, and layeth him upon a heape of wodde hard by him, as they do when they burne the bodies of dead men, and making certaine praies and petitions vnto Iupiter, and Mercurie, goddesses of the earth, he doth solemnely inuite the soules of those valliant men that dyed, fightinge for the liberty of GREECE, vnto the feast of this funerall facifice. Then he taketh a cuppe full of wine in his hande, and spilling it all vpon their tombes, he speaketh these wordes aloud: I drinke to the worthy and valliant men, that dyed sometime in defence of the liberty of GREECE. This solemne ceremony and anniuersarie, the PLATONIANS doe duly obserue vnto this present day. Nowe when the ATHENIANS were returned to ATHENS, Aristides perceiuing the people were bent to stablish a popular state, where the people might beare the whole rule and authoritie, iudging them well worthy to be considered of, in respect of their noble seruice and valiant courage they had shewed in this warre: & considering also that they would hardly be brought to like of any other gouernment, being yet in armes, and very flowte, by reason of the famous victories they had obteyned: he caused a law to be made, that all authority of gouernment should runne in equality among the citizens, and that thenceforth all burgesies (as well poore as rich) should be chosen by voyces of the people, and promoted to offices within the city. And moreover, when Themistocles tolde in open assembly, that he had a thing in his heade woulde be greatly to the profit and commodity of the state, but yet it was not to be spoken openly for diuerse respects: the people willed him to tell it vnto Aristides onely, and to take his aduise in it, to knowe whether it was meete to be done or not. Then Themistocles tolde him secretly betwene them, that he thought to sette the arceanall afyre, where all the GREECIANS ships lay: alleaging, that by this means the ATHENIANS should be the greatest men of power in all GREECE. Aristides hearing that, without any more, came presently to the people againe, and tolde the whole counsell openly: that nothinge could be more profitable in deede for the whole common wealth, and withal more wicked and vniust, then that Themistocles thought good to do. When the people heard Aristides aunswere, they willed Themistocles to lette his deuise alone whatsoever it were: so great iustifiers were the ATHENIANS, and so much did they trust Aristides wisedom and equite besides. So they made Aristides afterwards generall of the army of the ATHENIANS together with Cimon, & sent them to make warre against the barbarous people. Aristides at his comming thither, seeing Pausanias, & the other Captaines that were generall ouer the whole army, dealing hardly, and churlishly with people their confederates: he on the contrary side, spake gently vnto them, and shewed him selfe as courteous and familiar to them as he could possible, making his companion also familiar to all, and iust to euery body, not oppressing some to ease other, in defraying the charges of the warres. Aristides takinge this course, it was not noted howe by litle and litle he cutte of the rule and authoritie of the LACEDÆMONIANS in GREECE, not by force of armes, nor by shippes, nor by numbers of hores, but onely by his graue and wise gouernment. For if the iustice and vertue of Aristides, and the myldenies and curtesy of Cimon made the gouernment of the ATHENIANS to be liked of, and accepted of all the other people of GREECE: the couetousnes, pride, and fiercenesse of Pausanias, made it much more to be desired. For Pausanias neuer spake vnto the other Captaynes of the people, allies, and confederates, but it was euer in choller, and he was to sharpe with them: and for the poore priuate souldiers, he woulde cause them to be cruelly whipped for

A for every small offence, or else to make them stande a whole day together on their feete, laying a heauy iron ancker upon their shoulders. No man durst goe forrage, neither for strawe nor reedes to make them couches of, nor durst water their horse before the SPARTANS: for he had sette skowtes for them to whippe them home, that went out before them. And one day when Aristides thought to haue spoken to him, and to haue tolde him some thinge: he frowned upon him, and sayed he hadde no leasure to speake with him now, and so would not heare him. Whereupon the Captaines of the other GREECIANS, & specially those of CHIO, of SAMOS, and of LESBOS, did afterwarde follow Aristides, and perswaded him to take upon him the charge and authority to commaunde the other people of GREECE, and to take into his protection the allies and confederates of the same, who long sithence wished to reuolt from the gouernment of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and onely to submitte them selues vnto the ATHENIANS. Aristides aunswered them thus: that they had not only reason to doe that they sayd, but that they were also constrained to do it. Notwithstanding, because the ATHENIANS might haue good grounde and assurance of their vndoubted fidelitie and good seruice, they shoulde deliuer them manifest testimony and assurance thereof, by some famous act attempted against the LACEDÆMONIANS, whereby their people hereafter durst neuer fall from the league of the ATHENIANS. Phidias SAMIAN, and Antagoras of CHIO hearing him say so, both Captaines of galleys confedered together: they went one day to set upon the admirall galley of Pausanias, hard by BIZANTIUM, the one of the one side of her, and the other on the other side, as she was rowing before all the fleet. Pausanias seeinge them, stood vpe straight in a marvelous rage against them, and threatened them that before it were longe he woulde make them knowe they had bene better to haue assaulted their owne naturall contrie, then to haue set vpon him as they had done. But they aunswered him, and bad him get him away quickly and he were wise, and let him thanke fortune hardly, that graunted the GREECIANS victory at the battell of PLATES vnder his leading: and that it was nothinge else but the onely reuerence and respect of the fame, that had made the GREECIANS hold their hands till now, from geuing him that iust punishment his pride and arrogancy had deserued. So the end was, they left the LACEDÆMONIANS, & sticke vnto the ATHENIANS: wherein was easily discerned the great corage, and wonderfull magnanimity of the LACEDÆMONIANS. For when they sawe their Captaines were marred and corrupted, through the ouergreat authority, & liberty they had, they willingly gaue vp their commaundement ouer the other GREECIANS, and did no more sende their Captaines to be generalls of the whole army of GREECE: thinking it better for their citizens, that they should be obedient, and in euery point obserue the discipline and law of their contrie, then if they had bene otherwise the only rulers and Lords ouer the whole contrie. Now at what time the LACEDÆMONIANS did commaunde all GREECE, as Lordes: the cities and people of GREECE did pay a certaine summe of money, towards defrayinge of the charges of the warres against the barbarous people. But after that their feignorie and rule was taken from them, the GREECIANS were contented a taxe should be leauied, and that euery city should be reasonably fessed, accordinge to their wealth and abilitie: because euery cite might know what they shoulde pay. And for this purpose, they prayed the ATHENIANS they would appoint Aristides to take order for it, vnto whom they gaue full power and authority to taxe and lesse euery cite indifferently, considering the greatnes of the territory, and the reuenues of the same, as euery one was reasonably able to beare it. But if Aristides were poore when he entred into that great charge and office of authoritie, wherein all GREECE in manner did refferre them selues vnto his discretion: he came out of that office more poore, and had made this assessement and taxacion not only iustly and truly, but also so indifferently accordinge vnto euery mans abilitie, that there was no man coulde finde fault with his doings. And like as the auncient men in olde time did celebrate, and sing out the blessednes of those that liued vnder the raigne of SATVRNE, which they called the golden age: euen so did the people and confederates of the ATHENIANS afterwarde honor the assessement made by Aristides, calling it the fortunate & blessed time of GREECE, and specially, when shortly after it did double, and treble on the sodaine. For the taxe Aristides made, came to about foure hundred & three score talents: and Pericles raised it almost vnto a third parte. For Thucydides wryeth, that at the beginnigne of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, the ATHENIANS leaued a fixe hundred talentes yearly vpon their confederates. And after the death of Pericles, the orators and counsellors for matters of state did raise it vp higher by litle and litle, vntill it mounted vnto the summe of thirteene hundred talentes. And this was not, bicause the warres did rise to so great a charge, by reason of the length of the same, and of the losses the ATHENIANS had receiued: but for that they did accustom the people to make distributions of money by hand vnto euery citizen, to make them let vp games, and make goodly images, and to build sumptuous temples. Thus was Aristides therefore iustly honored, praised, and esteemed above all other, for this iust imposition of taxes, sauing onely of Themistocles: who went vp and downe flatering at the matter, sayinge it was no mete praise for an honest man, but rather: for a cofer well barred with iron, where a man might safely lay vp his gold and siluer. This he spake to be euen with Aristides, which was nothing like the sharpe girde Aristides gaue him openly, when Themistocles talking with him, tolde him it was an excellent thing for a Capitaine to be able to know, and to prevent the counsellis and doings of the enemies: and so is it, sayd Aristides againe, not onely a needefull, but an honest thinge, and mete for a worthy general of an army, to be cleane fingered, without bribery or corruption. So Aristides made all the other people of GREECE to sweare, that they would truly keepe the articles of the allyance, and he him selfe as general of the ATHENIANS, did take their othes in the name of the ATHENIANS: and so pronouncing execrations & curses against them that should breake the league and othe taken, he threw iron wedges red horte into the sea, and prayed the gods to destroy them euen so, that did violate their vowed faith. Notwithstandinge, afterwards (in my opinion) when there fell out great alteration in the state, and that the ATHENIANS were forced to rule more straightly then before: Aristides then willed the ATHENIANS to let him beare the daunger and burden of periury and execration, and that they should not let feare thereof to do any thing whatsoeuer they thought mete or necessary. To conclude, Theraprostus wryeth, that Aristides was not only a perfect an honest, and iust man, in priuate matters betwixt party & party: but in matters of state, and concerning the common weale, he did many thinges oftentimes according to the necessitie of the time, and troubles of the cite, wherein violence and iniustice was to be voided. As when the question was asked in open counsell, to know whether they might take away the gold & siluer that was left in the Ile of DELOS safely layed vp in the temple of Apollo, to beare out the charges of the warres against the barbarous people, and to bring it from thence vnto ATHENS, upon the motion of the SAMIANS, although it was directly against the articles of the allyance, made and sworne amonge all the GREECIANS. Aristides opinion beinge asked in the same, he answered: it was not ill, but yet profitable. Now, notwithstanding Aristides had brought his cite, to rule and commaund many thousandes of people: yet was he still poore for all that, and vntill his dying day he gloried rather to be praised for his pouertie, then for all the famous victories and battells he had wonne: and that plainly appeareth thus. Callias Ceres torche beaerer, was his neere kinsman, who through enemies came to be accused, and stood in hazard of life: so when the day came that his matter was to be heard before the Iudges, his accusers very faintly, and to litle purpose, vttered the offences whereof they accused him, and running into other byematters, left the chiefeist matter, & spake thus to the Iudges. My Lords, you al know Aristides the sonne of Lysimachus, and you are not ignorant also that his vertue hath made him more esteemed, then any man else is, or can be, in all GREECE. Howe thinke ye doth he liue at home? when you see him abroad vpe and downe the city, in a threde bare gowne all to rattered? Is it not likely, trow ye, that he is ready to starue at home for lacke of meate and reliefe, who we al see quake for very colde, beinge so ill arrayed and clothed? And yet M. Callias here his cousin germaine the richest citizen in all ATHENS, is so miserable: that notwithstandinge Aristides hath done much for him, by reason of his great credit and authoritie among you, he suffereth him, and his poore wife and children readie to begge, to starue for any helpe he geueth him. Callias perceivinge the Iudges more angier with him for that, then for any matter else he was accused of: he prayed Aristides might be sent for, and willed him to tel truly whether he had not offered him good rounde summes of money, many a time and oft, and intreated him to take Themistocles bewrayeth Themistocles and Aristides.

Aristides professed necessity of time, before law & reason.

Aristides gloried in his poverty.

A take it, which he euer refused, and answered him alwayes, that he could better boast of his pouerty, then him selfe coulde of his riches: (which he sayd many did vile ill, and few coulde vte them wel) and that it was a hard thing to finde one man of a noble minde, that could away with pouertie, and that such onely might be ashamed of pouerty, as were poore against their willes. So Aristides confirmed all he spake to be true: and euery man that was at the hearinge of this matter, went wholly away with this opinion, that he had rather be poore as Aristides, then rich as Callias. This tale is written thus by Aeschines the Socratic Philosopher: and Plato reporteth of him also, that notwithstandinge there were many other famous and notable men of ATHENS, yet he gaue Aristides praise about them all. For others, sayd he, (as Themistocles, Cimon, and Pericles) haue beautified the cite with stately porches, and sumptuous buildinges of golde and siluer, and with stone of other fine superfluous deuises: but Aristides was only he, that vertuously disposed him selfe and all his doings, to the furtherance of the state and common weale. His iustice and good nature appeared plainly, in his doings and behauiour towardes Themistocles. For though Themistocles was euer against Aristides in all thinges, and a continuall enemy of his, and that by his meanes and practise he was banished from ATHENS: yet when Themistocles was accused of treason to the state, hauing diuerse sharpe enemies against him: as Cimon, Alcmaeon, with diuerse other: Aristides sought not reuenge, when he had him at his aduantage. For he neither spake nor did any thinge against him at that time to hurt him: neither did he reioyce to see his enemy in misery, no more then if he had neuer eniued him in his prosperity. And touching Aristides death, some write he dyed in the realme of PONTVS, being sent thither about matters of the state: & other thinke he dyed an old man in the cite of ATHENS, greatly honored and beloued of all the citizens. But Craterus the MACEDONIAN wryeth of his death in this sorte. After that Themistocles (sayeth he) was fled, the people of ATHENS became very stubborne and insolent: whereupon, many lewde men grew to be common appeachers and accusers of the noble men and chiefeist citizens, and to stirre vp the malice and ill will of the common people against them, who were waxen proude by reason of their prosperity, and dominion that was enlarged. Amonge the rest, Aristides was condemned for extortion and ill behauiour in the common wealth, upon one Diophantes accusation, of the village of AMPHITROPE: who burdened him, that he tooke money of the IONIANS, to make the annuell tribute cease which they payed vnto ATHENS: and so Craterus sayeth, that bicause Aristides was not able to pay the fine they set upon his heade (which was fise Minas) he was driuen to forsake ATHENS, and to gette him into IONIA where he dyed. Yet doth not Craterus bring forth any probable matter to proue this true he wryeth: as his pleading, his sentence and condemnation, or any decree passed against him, although he vied great diligence else in collectinge all such matters, and vowching his authors. Furthermore, all other wryters that haue specially noted the fautes and offences, committed by the people of ATHENS in former times against their Captaines and gouernors: they do declare Themistocles exile, Miltiades captiuitie that dyed in prison, Pericles fine wherein he was condemned, and Paches death that slue him selfe in the pulpit for orations, when he sawe he was condemned: and tell diuerse such stories, addinge to also Aristides banishment: but yet they make no manner of mention of the condemnation which Craterus speaketh of. Moreover, Aristides tombe is to be seene at this day apop the hauen of Phalerus, which was set vp for him at the charge of the common wealth, as it is reported, bicause he dyed so poore a manne, as they founde nothing in his house to bury him with. Other go further, and say that his daughters were maried by decree of the people, at the charge of the common wealth, and that the cite gaue euery one of them three thousande Drachmas: and his sonne Lysimachus, a hundred Minas of siluer, and a hundred Iugera, and at Alcibiades request, who was the author of the decree, they gaue him foure Drachmas a day besides, of ordinarie allowance. Furthermore, when this Lysimachus dyed, he left aloue one onely daughter called Polycrite, whom the people appointed, as Callisthenes wryeth, as much prouisio to liue withall, as they gaue to any that wanne the Olympian games. And fithence, Demetrius PHALERIAN, Hieronymus RHODIAN, Aristoxenus the musitian, and Aristotle the Philosopher, at the least if the booke intituled of Nobilitie be any of Aristotles workes: all these agree together, that one Aristotle, Aristo, Aristides daughters daughter, was married vnto Socrates.

Aristides daughters daughter, was married vnto Socrates, who tooke her to his wife (ha- uing a wife already) because she was a poore widdow, & could not be married for her pouerty, hauing much a do to liue. Yet Panetius doth wryte against them, in his booke of Socrates life. But Demetrius PHALERIAN wryteth in his booke he intituled Socrates, that he could remem- ber very well he had seene one Lysimachus, Aristides sonnes sonne, or his daughters sonne, that was very poore, and liued of that he could get to interpret dreames; by certaine tables, when in was wrytten the arte to interpret the signification of dreames: and that he kept commonly about the temple of Bacchus called Iacchion, vnto whom, together with his mother and his sister, he sayd he had caused the people to geue them a Triobolum a peece, euery day towards their liuinge. It is very true that the selfe same Demetrius PHALERIAN, when he reformed the state of ATHENS, ordained that his mother and sister should haue ech of them a Drachma by the day to finde them withall, out of the common chamber of the city. And it is no new, nor straunge thing, that the people of ATHENS were so carefull to helpe, and to relieue, the wo- men that dwelt in the citie: considering that in times past, Aristogiton hauing a litle daughter in the Ile of LEMNOS, in very hard and poore state, and that could not be bestowed in mari- age for her pouerty, they caused her to be brought to ATHENS, and married her in one of the noblest houses of the city, and made her a ioynter besides in the village of POTAMOS. Which great curtesy & humanity of theirs, hath euer deserued great fame and commendacion, & yet cōtinueth euen vntil this day, in that noble city of ATHENS, in the mouth of euery man there.

THE LIFE OF Marcus Cato the Censor.

*M*arcus Cato and his auncesters, were (as they say) of the city of TUSCULUM: but before he went vnto the warres, and delt in matters of the common wealth, he dwelt & liued in the contry of the SABYNES, vpon certeine land his father left him. And though to many, his aun- cesters were known to haue bene obscure: yet he him selfe did high- ly commende his father Marcus, by bearing his name, and saying he was a souldier, and had serued valliantly in the fieldes. And he telleth also of an other Cato that was his great grandfather, who for his val- liant seruice had bene oft rewarded of the generals, with such hono- rable

A table giftes, as the ROMAINES did vse to geue vnto them, that had done some famous act in any battell: and how that he hauing lost fine horses of seruice in the warres, the value of the same were restored to him againe in money of the common treasure, because he had shewed himselfe trusty and valliant for the common wealth. And where they had a common speeche at ROMA to call them vpslartes, that were no gentlemen borne, but did rise by vertue: it for- tuned Cato to be called one of them. And for his parte, he did confesse it, that he was of the first of the house that euer had honor, and office of state: but by reason of the noble actes and good seruice of his auncestors, he maintained he was very auncient. He was called at the be- ginning after his third name, Priscus: but afterwards by reason of his great wisdom and ex- perience, he was surnamed Cato, because the ROMAINES call a wise man, and him that hath seene much, Cato. He was somewhat geuen to be redde faced, and had a payer of staring eyes in his heade, as this man telleth vs, that for ill will wrote these verses of him after his death.

Cato called an vpslart.

The definition of this words Cato.

Pluto (the god) vvhich rules the furies infernall, will not receiue the damned ghost, of Porcius in his hall: his saucy coppered nose, and fiery staring eyes, his common laundrous tales, vvhich he did in this vvorlde denife, made Pluto stande in dread that he vvwould brauile in hell, although his bones vvere drie and dead, on earth he vvas so fell.

Furthermore, touchinge the disposition of his body, he was maruelous stronge and lusty, and all because he did vse to labor and toyle euen from his youth, and to liue sparingly, as one that was euer brought vp in the warres from his youth: so that he was of a very good consti- tution, both for strength of body, as for health also. As for vtterance, he esteemed it as a se- conde body, and most necessaric gift, not onely to make men honest, but also as a thinge very requisite for a man that should beare sway and authoritie in the common wealth. He practi- sed to speake well in litle villages neere home, whether he went many times to plead menes causes in courtes iudiciall, that would retaine him of counsell: so as in thortime he became a perfect pleader, and had tongue at will, and in processe of time became an excellent orator. After he was thus well knowne, they that were familiar with him, began to perceiue a graue manner and behaiour in his life, and a certaine noble minde in him, worthe to be employed in matters of state and great importance, and to be called into the common wealth. For he did not onely refuse to take fees for his pleading, and following the causes he maintained: but furthermore made no reckening of the estimation he wanne by that manner and practise, as though that was not the onely marke he shot at. But his desire reached further, rather to winne him selfe fame by seruice in the warres, and by valliant fightinge with his enemye: then with such a quiet and pleasing manner of life. Insomuch as when he was but a younge striplinge in manner, he had many cuttes upon his brest, which he had receiued in diuerse battells and en- counters against the enemies. For he him selfe wryteth, that he was but seuentene yeare old, when he went first vnto the warres, which was about the time of Hanniballs chiefe prosperi- tie, when he spoyled and destroyed all ITALIE. So when he came to fight, he would strike lus- tely, and neuer sturre foote nor geue backe, and would looke cruelly vpon his enemye, and threaten him with a fearefull and terrible voyce, which heuid him selfe, and wisely taught o- ther also to vse the like: for such countenances, sayd he, many times doe feare the enemies more, then the sworde ye offer them. When he went any iorney, he euer marched a foote, and caried his armour upon his backe, and had a man waytinge on him that caried his vittells with him, with whom he was neuer angry (as they say) for any thing he had prepared for his dinner or supper, but did helpe to dresse it him selfe for the most parte, if he had any leasure, when he had done the duty of a priuate souldier in fortifying the campe, or such other nede- full businesse. All the while he was abroad in seruice in the warres, he neuer dranke other then cleane water, vnlesse it were when he founde he was not well, and then he would rake a litle vineger: but if he saw he were weake, he would then drinke a litle wine. Now it fortun- ed, that Manius Curius the ROMAYNE, who had triumphed thrise, hadde a pretty house and lande hard by Cato, where he kept in times past, which Cato for a walke would visite oft. And he considering how litle lande he had to his house, and what a litle house he had withall, and how poorly it was built, wondered with him selfe what maner of man Curius had bene, that hauing bene the greatest man of ROME in his time, and hauing subdued the mightiest nations and people of all ITALIE, and driuen kinge Pyrrhus also out of the same: yet him selfe with his owne handes did manure that litle patche of grounde, and dwel in so poore and small a farme. Whether notwithstanding after his three triumphes, the SANNYTES sent their Ambassadors to visite him, who founde him by the fyers side seething of perleeneapes, and presented him a maruelous deale of golde from their state and communalty. But Curius returned them againe with their gold, and told them, that such as were contented with that supper, had no neede of gold nor siluer: and that for his parte, he thought it greater honor to commaunde them than had gold, then to haue it him selfe. Cato remembering these thinges to him selfe, went home againe, and beganne to thinke vpon his house, of his liuinge, of his family and seruantes, and also of his expences: and to cut of all superfluous charges, and fell him selfe to labor with his owne handes, more then euer he hadde done before. Furthermore, when Fabius Maximus tooke the city of TARENTVM againe, Cato serued vnder him being very younge, where he fell into familiar acquaintance with Nearchus the Pythagorian philosopher, in whom he tooke maruelous delight to heare him talke of Philosophy. Which Nearchus held the same opinion of pleasure, that Plato did, by callinge it the sweete poyson and chiefe bayte to allure men to ill: and saying that the body was the first plague vnto the soule, and that her onely health, remedy, and purgation stode apon rules of reason, good examples and contemplations, that drie sinful thoughts and carnall pleasures of the body, farre off from her. Cato moreouer gaue him selfe much to sobriety and temperance, and framed him selfe to be contented with litle. They say he fell in his very olde age to the study of the Greeke tongue, and to reade Greeke bookes, and that he profited somewhat by Thucydides, but much more by Demosthenes, to frame his matter, and also to be eloquent. Which plainly appeareth, in all his bookes and writings, full of authorities, examples, & stories taken out of Greeke authors: and many of his sentences and moralls, his adages & quicke answers, are translated out of the same word for word. Now there was a noble man of ROME at that time, one of great authoritie, and a deepe wise man besides, who coule easily discern buddes of vertue sprouting out of any towards youth, who was of a good and honorable disposition to helpe forward, and to aduance such. His name was Valerius Flaccus, a neere neighbour vnto Cato, who was informed by his seruants of Cato's strange life, how he would be doing in his ground with his owne hands: and how he would be gone euery day betimes in the morning to litle villages thereabout, to pleade mens causes that prayed his counsaill, & that when he had done, he would come home againe: and if it were in winter, that he would but cast a litle coate on his shoulders, and being sommer he would go out bare, naked to the waft, to worke in his ground among his seruants and other workemen: & would besides, sit and eate with them together at one borde, and drinke as they did. Moreover, they told him also a word of such maners & facions which he vsed, that he wed to be a maruelous plaine man, without pride and of a good nature. Then they tolde him what notable wise sayings and graue sentences they heard him speake. Valerius Flaccus hearing this reporte of him, willed his men one day to pray him to come to supper to him. Who falling in acquaintance with Cato, and perceiuing he was of a very good nature, and wel giuen, & that he was a good griffe to be set in a better ground: he perswaded him to come to ROME, and to practise there in the assembly of the people, in the common causes and affayres of the common weale. Cato followed his counsaill, who hauing bene no long practiser among them, did grow straight into great estimation, and wanne him many friends, by reason of the causes he tooke in hand to defend: and was the better preferred and taken also, by meanes of the speciall fauour and countenance Valerius Flaccus gaue him. For first of all, by voyce of the people he was chosen Tribune of the souldiers, (to say, colonell of a thousand footemen) & afterwards was made treasurer: and so went forwards, and grew to so great credit & authority, as he became Valerius Flaccus copanion in the chiefe offices of state, being chosen Consul with him, & then Censor. But to begin withal, Cato made choise of Quintus Fabius Maximus, about all the Senators of ROME, & gaue him selfe to follow him altogether: & not so much for the credit & estimation Fabius Maximus was of, (who therein exceeded all the ROMAINES of that time)

A time) as for the modesty and discrete government he sawe in him, whome he determined to followe, as a worthy myrror and example. At which time Cato passed not for the malice and euill will of Scipio the great, who did strue at that present being but a young man, with the authoritie and greatnesse of Fabius Maximus, as one that seemed to enuy his risinge and greatnesse. For Cato being sent treasurer with Scipio, when he vndertooke the iorney into AFRIKE, and perceiuing Scipio's bountifull nature and disposition to large giftes without meane to the souldiers: he tolde him plainly one day, that he did not so much hurte the common weale in walking their treasure, as he did great harme in chaunging the auncient maner of their ancestors: who vsed their souldiers to be contented with litle, but he taught them to spende their superfluous money (all necessaries provided for) in vaine toyes and trifles, to serue their pleasures. Scipio made him answer, he woulde haue no treasurer (shoulde controll him in that sorte, nor that should looke so narrowly to his expences: for his intent was to go to the wars, with full sayles as it were, and that he woulde (and did also determine to) make the state priue to all his doinges, but not to the money he spent. Cato hearing this answer, returned with speede out of SICILE vnto ROME, crying out with Fabius Maximus in open Senate, that Scipio spent infinitely, and that he tended playes, commedies, and wrellinges, as if he had not bene sent to make warres, inuasions, and attemptes apon their enemies. Apon this complaint the Senate appointed certeine Tribunes of the people, to goe and see if their informations were true: and finding them so, that they should bring him backe againe to ROME. But Scipio thewed farre otherwise to the commisioners that came thither, and made them see apparaunt victorye, through the necessary preparation and prouision he had made for the warres: and he confessed also, that when he had dispatched his great businesse, and was at any leasure, he would be priuately merry with his friends: and though he was liberal to his souldiers, yet that made him not negligent of his duty and charge in any matter of importance. So Scipio took that shippinge, and sayled towards AFRIKE, whether he was sent to make warre. Now to returne to Cato. He daily increased still in authority and credit by meanes of his eloquence, so that diuerse called him the Demosthenes of ROME: howbeit the maner of his life was in more estimation, then his eloquence. For all the youth of ROME did seeke to attaine to his eloquence and commendation of wordes, and one enuied an other which of them should come nearest: but few of them would fyle their handes with any labor as their forefathers did, and make a light supper and dinner, without fire or prouision, or would be content with a meane gowne, and a poore lodging, & finally woulde thinke it more honorable to desye fanfies & pleasures, then to haue and enioy them. Bicause the state was waxen now of such power & wealth, as it could no more retaine the auncient discipline, and former austeritie and straitnes of life it vsed: but by reason of the largenes of their dominion and feignorie, and the numbers of people and nations that were become their subiects, it was euen forced to receiue a medley of sundry contrary facions, examples, and maners. This was a cause, why in reason men did so greatly wonder at Cato's vertue, when they sawe other straight wearied with paines and labor, tenderly brought vp like pulers: and Cato on the other side neuer ouercommen, either with the one or with the other, nor not in his youth, when he most couered honor, nor in his age also when he was gray headed and balde, after his Consulship and triumphe, but like a conqueror that had gotten the maistry, he would neuer geue ouer labor euen vnto his dying day. For he writeth him selfe, that there neuer came gowne on his backe that cost him aboue a hundred pence, & that his hyndes and worke men alwayes dronke no worse wine, when he was Consul and general of the armie, then he did him selfe: and that his cater neuer bestowed in meate for his supper, aboue thirty Asses of ROMAINE money, and yet he sayed it was; bicause he might be the stronger, and apter to do seruice in the warres for his contrie and the common weale. He sayd furthermore, that being heire to one of his friends that dyed, he had a peece of tapestry by him with a deepe border, which they called then the babilonian border, and he caused it straight to be solde: and that of all his houses he had abroade in the contrie, he had not one wth plattered, nor rough cast. Moreover he would say, he neuer bought bondeman or slaue dearer, then a thowfande five hundred pence, as one that sought not for fine made men, and goodly personages, but strong fellowes that could away with paynes, as carters, horsekeepers, neatheardes, and such like : and againe he woulde sell them when they were olde , bicause he would not keepe them when they coulde do no seruice. To conclude, he was of opinion, that a manne bought any thing deere, that was for litle purpose: yea, though he gaue but a farthing for it, he thought it to much to bestow so litle, for that which needed not. He woulde haue men purchase houses, that hadde more store of erable lande and pasture, then of fine orteyardes or gardens. Some saye, he hidde thus, for very miserie and couetousnesse: other thinke, and tooke it that he liued so sparingly, to moue others by his example to cutte off all superfluitie and wast. Neuerthelesse, to sell slaues in that sorte, or to turne them out of doores when you haue hadde the seruice of all their youth, and that they are growen olde, as you vse brute beastes that haue serued whilist they may for age: me thinkes that must needs proceede of to seuaire and greedie nature, that hath no longer regard or consideration of humanitie, then whilist one is able to doe an other good. For we see, gentleness goeth further then iustice. For nature teacheth vs to vse iustice onely vnto menne, but gentleness sometimes is shewed vnto brute beastes: and that cometh from the very fountaine and springe of all curtesie and humanitie, which shoulde neuer drye vp in any manne liuinge. For to saye truely, to keepe cast horses spoyled in our seruice, and dogges also not onely when they are whelpes, but when they be olde: be euen tokens of loue and kindenesse. As the ATHENIANS made a lawe, when they builded their temple called Hecatompedon: that they shoulde suffer the moyles and mulettes that did seruice in their cariages about the buildinge of the same, to graze euerie where, without lette or trouble of any manne. And they say, there was one of those moyles thus turned at libertie, that came of her selfe to the place to labour, goinge before all the other draught beastes, that drewe vpp cartes loden towards the castell, and kept them companie, as though she seemed to encorage the rest to drawe: which the people liked so well in the poore beast, that they appointed she shoulde be kept whilist sheliued, at the charge of the towne. And yet at this present are the graues of Cimon mares to be seene, that wanne him thrife together the game of the horse race at the games Olympian, and they are harde by the graue of Cimon him selfe. We heare of diuerse also that hadde buried their dogges they brought vpp in their house, or that wayted on them: as amonge other olde Xanthippus buried his dogge on the toppe of a cliffe, which is called the dogges pit till this day. For when the people of ATHENS did forsake their cite at the comminge downe of Xerxes the kinge, this dogge followed his master, swimminge in the sea by his gallies side, D from the firme lande, vnto the Ile of SALAMINA. And there is no reason, to vse liuinge and sensible thinges, as we woulde vse an olde shoore or a ragge: to cast it out upon the dongehill when we haue worne it, and can serue vs no longer. For if it were for no respectels, but to vse vs alwayes to humanitie: we must euer shewe our felues kinde and gentle, euen in such small poyntes of pitie. And as for me, I coulde neuer finde in my hart to sell my draught Ox that hadde plowed my lande a long time, bicause he coulde plowe no longer for age: and much lesse my slaue to sell him for a litle money, out of the contrie where he had dwelt a long time, to plucke him from his olde trade of life wherewith he was best acquainted, and then specially, when he shalbe as vnprofitable for the buyer, as also for the seller. But Cato on the other side gloried, that he left his horse in SPAYNE he had serued on in the warres duringe his E Consulship, bicause he would not put the common wealth to the charge of bringing of him home by sea into ITALIE. Now a question might be made of this, and probable reason of either side, whether this was nobles, or a niggardlines in him: but otherwise to say truely, he was a man of a wonderful abstinence. For when he was general of the army, he neuer tooke allowance but after three bushells wheat a moneth of the common wealth, for him selfe and his whole family: and but a bushell and halfe of barley a day, to keepe his horse and other beastes for his cariage. On a time when he was Prætor, the government of the Ile of SARDINIA fell to his lot. And where the other Prætors before him hadde put the contry to exceeding great charge, to furnish them with tents, bedding, clothes, and such like stufte, and burdened them also with a maruelous traine of seruants and their friends that waited on them, putting them to great expence of feasting and banquetting of them: Cato in contrary maner brought downe all that excess and superfluitie, vnto a maruelousnece and vncredible sauinge. Cato, Prætor

A he went to visite the cities, he came a foote to them, & did not put them to a penny charge for him selfe: and had onely one officer or bailife of the state, that waited on him, and caried his gowne and a cuppe with him, to offer vp wine to the goddes in his sacrifices. But though he came thus simply to the subiects, and eased them of their former charges, yet he shewed him selfe seuer and bitter to them in matters concerning iustice: and spared no man, in any commaundment or seruice for the state and common wealth. For he was therein so precise, that he would not beare with any litle fault. So by this meanes, he brought the SARDINIANS vnder his government, both to loue and feare the Empire of ROME, more then euer they did before. For his grace both in speakinge and wrytinge did rightly shewe him selfe: bicause it was pleasant, and yet graue: sweete and fearfull: merry and seuaire: sententious, and yet familiar: such as is meeete to be spoken. And he was to be compared, as Plato sayed, vnto Socrates: who at the first sight seemed a plaine simple manne to them that knew him not outwardly, or else a pleasant tawnter or mocker: but when they did looke into him, and found him thoroughly, they sawe he was full of graue sentences, goodly examples, and wise perswasions, that he coulde make men water their plantes that hearde him, and leade them as he would by the eare. Therefore I can not see any reason that moues men to saye, Cato hadde Lysias grace and vterance. Notwithstandinge, lette vs referre it to their iudgements that make profession to discern orators graces and styles: for my parte I shall content my selfe to write at this present, onely certaine of his notable sayings and sentences, perswadinge my selfe that mennes manners are better discerned by their wordes, then by their lookes, and so doe many thinke.

C On a time he seeking to disswade the people of ROME, which woulde needes make a thankfull distribution of corne vnto euerie citizen, to no purpose: beganne to make an oration with this preface. It is a harde thinge (my Lordes of ROME) to bringe the bellie by perswasion to reason, that hath no eares. And another time, reprouinge the ill government of the cite of ROME, he sayed: it was a hard thinge to keepe vpp that state, where a litle fishe was folde dearer then an Ox. He sayed also that the ROMAINS were like a flocke of sheepe. For sayeth he, as euery weather when he is alone, doth not obey the sheepeheard, but when they are all together they one followe an other for loue of the foremost: euen so are you, for when you are together, you are all contented to be ledde by the noses by such, whose counsell not a man alone of you woulde vse in any priuate cause of your owne. And talkinge an other time D of the authoritie the women of ROME had ouer their husbandes. He sayed: other men commaunde their wiues, and we commaunde men, and our wiues commaund vs. But this last of all, he borrowed of Themistocles pleasant sayings. For his sonne making him do many things by meanes of his mother, he told his wife one day. The ATHENIANS commaund al GREECE, sayinge. I commaunde the ATHENIANS, you commaunde me, and your sonne ruleth you. I pray you therefore bid him vse the libertie he hath with some better discretion, foole and asse as he is, sithence he can doe more by that power and authority, then all the GREECIANS besides. He sayed also that the people of ROME did not onely delight in diuerse sortes of purple, but likewise in diuerse sortes of exercises. For sayd he, as diuerse commonly dye that cullour they see best esteemed, and is most pleasant to the eye: euen for the lusty youthe of ROME doe frame them selues to such exercise, as they see your felues most like, and best esteeme. He continually aduised the ROMAINS, that if their power & greatnes came by their vertue and temperance, they shoulde take hede they became no chaungelings, nor waxe worse: & if they came to that greatnes by vice and violence, that then they shoulde change to better, for by that meanes he knew very wel they had attained to great honor & dignity. Again he told the, that such as sued ambitiously to beare office in the common wealth, & were common suters for them: did seme to be afraid to lose their way, & therefore would be sure to haue vthers & sergeants before the, to shew them the way. Least they shoulde lose themselves in the city. He did reprove them also; that often chose one man, to continue one office fill: for it seemeth, saith he, either that you passe not much for your officers, or that you haue not many choicemē you thinke worthy for the office. There was an enemy of his that ledde a maruelous wicked and an abominable life, F of whome he was wont to say, that when his mother prayed vnto the goddes that she might leaue her sonne behinde her, she did not thinke to pray, but to curse: meaninge to haue him.

liue for a plague to the world. And to another also that had vntrifely folde his lands which his father had left him, lying vpon the sea side: he pointed vnto them with his finger, & made as though he wondered how he came to be so great a man, that he was stronger then the sea. For that which the sea hardly consumeth, and eateth into, by litle and litle a long time: he had consumed it all at a clappe. An other time when king Eumenes was come to Rome, the Senate entertained him maruelous honorably, and the noblest citizens did strue, enuying one another, who should welcome him best. But Cato in contrary manner shewed plainly, that he did suspect all this feasting and entertainment, and would not come at it. When one of his familiar frendes tolde him, I maruell why you flee from king Eumenes companie, that is so good a Prince, and loues the ROMAINES so well. Yea, sayd he, let it be so, but for all that, a king is no better then a raueing beast that liues of the pray: neither was there euer any king so happie, that defereed to be compared to Eparinondas, to Pericles, to Themistocles, nor to Manius Curius, or to Hamylcar, furnished Barca. They say his enemies did malice him, because he vsed commonly to rise before day, & did forget his owne busines to folow matters of state. And he affirmed, that he had rather loofe the rewarde of his well doing, then not to be punished for doing of euill: and that he would beare with all other offending ignorantly, but not with him selfe. The ROMAINES hauing chofen on a time three Ambassadors to send into the realme of Bithynia, one of them hauing the gowte in his feete, the other his heade full of cuttes and great gashes, and the third being but a foole: Cato laughing, sayd the ROMAINES sent an Ambassade that had neither feete, heade, nor hart. Scipio liued once to Cato at Polybius request, about those that were banished from Achaia. The matter was argued afterwards in the Senate, and there fell out diuers opinions about it. Some would haue had them restored to their contrie and goodes againe: other were wholly against it. So Cato rising vp at the last, sayd vnto them. It seemes we haue lide else to do, when we stand beating of our braines all day, disputing about these olde GREECIANS, whether the ROMAINES, or the ACHAIANS, shall bury them. In the end, the Senate tooke order, they should be restored vnto their contrie againe. Wherevpon Polybius thought to make petition againe vnto the Senate, that the banished men whom they hadde restored by their order, might enioy their former estates and honors in Achaia, they had at the time of their banishment: but before he would moue the sute vnto the Senate, he would feece Catoes opinion first, what he thought of it. Who answered him, smyling: me thinkes Polybius thou art like Vlyses, that when he had escaped out of D Cyclops caue the gyant, he would nedes go thither againe, to fetch his hatte and girdell he had left behinde him there. He sayd also, that wife men did learne and profit more by fooles, then fooles did by wife men. For wife men sayd he, do see the faults fooles commit, and can wisely auoide them: but fooles neuer study to follow the example of wife mens doings. He sayd also that he euer liked young men better that blushed, then those that looked euer whitely: and that he would not haue him for a souldier, that waggis his hande as he goeth, remoues his feete when he sighteth, and rowteth and snorteth lowder in his sleepe, then when he crieth out to his enemy. An other time when he would taunt a maruelous fatte man: see, sayd he, what good can such a body do to the common wealth, that from his chinne to his codpeece is nothing but belly? And to an other man that was geuen to pleasure, and desired to be great with him: my frende, sayd Cato, as refusinge his acquaintance: I can not liue with him that hath better iudgement in the pallate of his mouth, then in his hart. This was also his sayings, that the soule of a louer, liued in an others body: and that in all his life time he repented him of three things. The first was, if that he euer tolde secret to any woman: the seconde, that euer he went by water, when he might haue gone by lande: the thirde, that he had bene idle a whole day, and had done nothing. Also when he saw a vicious olde man, he would say, to reprove him: O gray bearde, age bringeth many deformities with it, helpe it not besides with your vice. And to a seditious Tribune of the people that was suspected to be a paysoner, and would nedes passe some wicked law by voyce of the people, he would say: o young man, I know not which of these two be worfe, to drinke the drugges thou geuest, or to receiue the lawes thou offerest. An other time, being reuiled by one that ledde a lewde, and naughty life go thy way, sayd he, I am no man to scold with thee. For thou art so vsed to reuile, and to be reuiled, Cato would punish him selfe for offending.

That is to say undisciplined. For they judged that the seat of reason was placed in the hart: following Aristotle's opinion.

Blushing in young men is a better token then paleness.

A lover liueth in an other body.

A reuiled, that it is not daynty to thee: But for my selfe, I neuer vse to heare scolding, and much lesse delite to scold. These be his wife sayings we finde written of him, whereby we may the easilier coniecture his maners and nature. Now, when he was chofen Consul with his frend Valerius Flaccus, the gouernment of SPAYNE fell to his lot, that is on this side of the riuer of BETIS. So, Cato hauing subdued many people by force of armes, and wonne others also by friendly meanes: sodainly there came a maruelous great army of the barbarous people against him, & had enuironed him so, as he was in maruelous daunger, either shamefully to be taken prisoner, or to be slaine in the fildes. Wherefore, he sent presently vnto the CELTIBERIANES, to pray aide of them, who were next neighbours vnto the marches where he was. These CELTIBERIANES did aske him two hundred talentes to come & help him: but the ROMAINES that were about him, coule not abide to hyer the barbarous people to defende them. Then Cato tolde them straight, there was no hurt in it, nor any dishonor vnto them. For sayd he, if the fildes be ours, then we shall pay their wages we promised, with the spoyle and money of our enemies: and if we loofe it, then our selues and they lye by it, beinge left neither man to pay, nor yet any to aske it. In the ende he wanne the battel, after a fore conflict, and after that time he hadde maruelous good fortune. For Polybius wryteth, that all the walles of the cities that were on this side the riuer of BETIS, were by his commaundement rased all in one day, which were many, and full of good souldiers. Him selfe wryteth, that he tooke moe cities in SPAYNE, then he remained there dayes: and it is no vaine boast, if it be true that is written, that there were foure hundred cities of the. Now, though the souldiers vnder him had gotten well in this iorney, and were riche, yet he caused a pounce weight of siluer to be geuen to e- uery souldier besides: sayinge, he liked it better that many should retume home with siluer in their purses, then a few of them with golde only. But for him selfe, he affirmed: that of all the spoyle gotten of the enemies, he neuer had any thing, sauinge that which he tooke in meate and drinke. And yet, sayth he, I speake it not to reprove them that grow riche by such spoiles: but because I would contende in vertue rather with the best, then in money with the richest, or in couetousnes with the most vertuous. For, not only he him selfe was cleare from bribes and extortion, but his officers also vnder him kept the same course. In this Spanish iorney, he had siue of his seruantes with him, whereof one of them called Paullus, bought three younge boyes that were taken in the warres, when the spoile was sold to them that would geue most. So Cato knew it. But Paullus being afrayed to come neere his maister, hong him selfe: and then Cato solde the boyes againe, and put the money made of them into the treasury chestes of fau- ing at Rome. Now while Cato was in SPAYNE, Scipio the great that was his enemy, & fought to hinder the course of his prosperitie, and to haue the honor of conqueringe all the rest of SPAYNE: he made all the frendes he coule to the people, to be chofen in Catoes place. He was no sooner entred into his charge, but he made all the possible speede he coule to be gone, that he might make Catoes authority cease the sooner. Cato hearing of his hasty comming, tooke only iue enignes of footemen, and siue hundred horsemen to attende vpon him home: with the which, in his iorney homeward, he ouercame a people in SPAYNE called the LACETANIANES, and tooke siue hundred traitors also that were fled from the ROMAINES campe to their enemies, and did put to death euery mothers childe of them. Scipio storming at that, sayd Cato did him wrong. But Cato to mocke him finely, sayd: it was the right way to bringe Rome to flourish, when noble borne citizens would not suffer in meane borne men, and vplift as him selfe was, to go before them in honor: and on the other side when meane borne men would contende in vertue, with those that were of noblest race, and farre about them in calling. For all that, when Cato came to Rome, the Senate commaunded that nothing shoulde be chaunged nor altered otherwise, then Cato had appointed it, whilst he was in his office. So that the gouernment for which Scipio made such earnest sute in SPAYNE, was a greater disgrace vnto him, then it was vnto Cato: because he passed all his time & office in peace, trauing no occasion offered him to doe any notable seruice worthy memory. Furthermore, Cato after he had bene Consul, and hadde graunted to him the honor to triumphe: did not as many others doe, that seeke not after vertue, but onely for worldly honor and dignity. Who, when they haue bene called to the highest offices of state, as to be Consuls, and haue also graunted them the honor to triumphe: do then leaue to deale any more in matters of state, & dispose them selues to liue a merely and quietly at home, and not to trouble them selues any more. Now Cato, farre otherwife behaued him selfe. For he would neuer leaue to exercise vertue, but beganne a frethe, as if he had bene but a young nouelle in the world, and as one greedy of honor and reputation, and to take as much paines and more then he did before. For, to pleasure his friends or any other citizen, he would come to the market place, and pleade their causes for them that required his counsell, and go with his frendes also into the warres. As he went with Tiberius Sem-pronius the Consul, and was one of his Lieutenants at the conquest of the contry of Thrace, and vnto the prouinces adioyning to the riuier of Danvye upon those marches. After that, he was in Greece also, Collonell of a thousande footemen, vnder Manius Aquilius, against king Antiochus the great, who made the Romaines as much afrayed of him, as quier they were of enemy but Hannibal. For, when he had conquered all the regions and prouinces of Asia, which Seleucus Nicanor enjoyed before, & had subdued many barbarous and warlike nations: he was so proude harted, as he would nedes haue wars with the Romaines, whom he knew to be the only worthy men, and best able to fight with him. So he made some honest shew and pretence of warres, saying: it was to set the Greeks at liberty, who had no cause thereof, considering they liued after their owne lawes, and were but lately deliuered from the bondage of king Philip, and of the Macedonians, through the goodnesse of the Romaines. Notwithstanding, he came out of Asia into Greece with a maruelous great army, and all Greece was straight in armes and in wonderfull daunger, bicause of the great promises and large hopes the gouernours of diuerse cities (whome the kinge had wonne and corrupted with money) did make vnto them. Whereupon Manius dispatched Ambassadors vnto the cities, and sent Titus Quintus Flaminius amongst others, who kept the greatest parte of the people from rebelling (that were easily drawn to geue eare to this innouation) as we haue expresse more amply in his life: and Cato beinge sent Ambassador also, perswaded the Corinthians, those of Patras, and the Argians, and made them stickle still to the Ro-maines, and continued a long time at Athens. Some say they finde an oration of his wy-ten in the Greeke tongue, which he made before the Athenians, in commendacion of their ancestors: wherein he sayd, he tooke great pleasure to see Athens, for the beauty and stateliness of the city. But this is false. For he spake vnto the Athenians by an interpreter, though he could haue vttered his oration in the Greeke tongue if he had bene disposed: but he did like the lawes and customes of his owne contrie, and the Romaine tongue so well, that he laughed at them that would praise and commend the Greeke tongue. As he did once mocke Posthumus Albinus, who wrote an history in the Greeke tongue, praying the readers in his preface to beare with him, if they founde any imperfection in the tongue: may, sayd Cato, he had deserued pardon in deede, if he hadde bene forced to haue written his story in the Greeke tongue, by order of the states of Greece, called the counsell of the Amphictyons. They say the Athenians wondered to heare his redy tongue. For what he had vttered quickly in few words vnto the interpreter: the interpreter was driuen to deliuer them againe with great circumstances, & many words. So that he left them of this opinion, that the Greeks words lay all in their lippes, and the Romaines wordes in their heades. Now kinge Antiochus kept all the straights and narrow passages of the mountaines called Thermopyles, (beinge the ordinary way and entry into Greece) and had fortified them as well with his army that camped at the foote of the mountaine, as also with walles and trenches he had made by hande, besides the naturall strength & fortification of the mount it selfe in sundry places: and so he determined to remaine there, trusting to his owne strength and fortifications aforesayd, and to turne the force of the warres some other way. The Romaines also, they dispatched vnto they should be able any way to charge him before. But Cato remembreing with him selfe the compasse the Persians hadde fetched about before time likewise to enter into Greece: he departed one night from the campe with parte of the army: to proue if he could finde the very compasse about, the barbarous people had made before. But as they climed vp the moun-taine, their guide that was one of the prisoners taken in the contrie, lost his way, and made them wander vp and downe in maruelous steepe rockes and crooked wayes, that the poore souldiers

A souldiers were in maruelous ill taking. Cato seeing the daunger they were brought into by this lewde guide, commanded all his souldiers not to sturre a foote from thence, and to tary him there: and in the meane time he went him selfe alone, and Lucius Manlius with him (a lustie man, and nimble to chuse upon the rockes) and so went forwarde at aduenture, takinge extreme and vncredible paine, & in as much daunger of his life: grubbing all night in the darke without moone light, through wilde Olyue trees, and high rockes (that let them they could not see before them, neither could tell whether they went) vntill they stumbled at the length vpon a litle pathe way, which went as they thought directly to the foote of the mountaine, where the campe of the enemies lay. So they set vpon certaine markes and tokens, vpon the highest toppes of the rockes they coulde chooſe, by view of eye to be discerned furthest of vpon the mountaine called Callidromus. And when they had done that, they returned backe again to fetch the souldiers, whom they led towards their markes they had set vp: vntill at the length they founde their pathe waye againe, where they putte their souldiers in order to marche. Now they went not farre in this pathe they founde, but the way failed them straight, and brought them to a bogge: but then they were in worle case then before, and in greater feare, not knowinge they were so neere their enemies, as in deede they were. The day began to breake a litle, and one of them that marched foremost, thought he hearde a noyse, and that he saw the Greeks campe at the foote of the rockes, and certaine souldiers that kept watch there. Whereupon Cato made them stay, & willed only the Firmanians to come vnto him, and none but them, bicause he had founde them faithfull before, and very ready to obey his commandement. They were with him at a trife to know his pleasure: so Cato said vnto them.
My fellows, I must haue some of our enemies taken prisoners, that I may know of them who they be that keepe that passage, what number they be, what order they keepe, howe they are camped and armed, and after what sorte they determine to fight with vs. The way to worke this feate, standeth upon swiftnesse, and hardines to runne upon them sodainly, as Lyons doe, which beinge naked feare not to runne into the midst of any hearde of fearful beastes. He had no sooner spoken these wordes, but the Firmanian souldiers beganne to runne downe the mountaine, as they were, upon those that kept the watch: and so settinge upon them, they beinge out of order, made them flie, and tooke an armed man prisoner. When they had him, they straight brought him vnto Cato, who by othe of the prisoner was aduertised, howe that the strength of their enemies armie was lodged about the persone of the kinge, within the straight and valley of the said mountaine: and that the souldiers they saw, were fixe hundred Etolians, all braue souldiers, whome they had chosen and appointed to keepe the toppe of the rockes ouer king Antiochus campe. When Cato had heard him, makinge small accompt of the matter, as well for their final number, as also for the ill order they kept: he made the trompets founde straight, and his souldiers to marche in battell with great cries, him selfe being the foremost man of all his troupe, with a sword drawn in his hand. But when the Etolians saw them comming downe the rockes towards them, they beganne to flie for life vnto their great campe, which they filled full of feare, trouble, and all disorder. Now Manlius at the same present also, gaue an assault vnto the walles and fortifications the king had made, E ouerthrow the vallies and straightes of the mountaines: at which assault, king Antiochus selfe had a blow on the face with a stone, that strake some of his teeth out of his mouth, so that for very paine & anguish he felt, he turned his horse backe, and got him behinde the prease. And then there were none of his armie that made any more resistance, or that coulde abide the fiercenesse of the Romaines. But notwithstanding that the places were very ill for flying, bi-cause it was vnpossible for them to scatter and straggle, beinge holden in with high rockes on the one side of them, and with bogges and deepe marishes on the other side, which they must needes fall into if their feete slipped, or were thrust forwarde by any: yet they fell one upon another in the straights, and ranne so in heapes together, that they cast them selues away, for feare of the Romaines swordes that lighted vpon them in euery corner. And there Marcus Cato, that neuer made ceremony or nifenes to praise him selfe openly, nor reckened it any shame to do it: did take a present occasion for it, as fallerth out upon all victory and famous ex-ploites. And so did set it out with all the ostentacion and braue wordes he could geue. For he wrote with his owne handes, that such as saw him chafe and lay vpon his flying enemies that day, were driuen to say, that Cato was not bound to the ROMAINES, but the ROMAINES bound vnto Cato. And then Manius the Consull selfe, being in a great heate with the furie of the battell, embraced Cato a great while, that was alio horre with chafing of the enemy: and spake alowde with great ioy before them all, that neither he, nor the people of Rome could recompence Cato for his valliant seruice that day. After this battell, the Consull Manius sent Cato to Rome, to be the messenger him selfe to reporte the newes of the victory. So he imbarked incontinently, and had such a fayer winde, that he passed ouer the sea to BRINDES without any daunger, and went from thence vnto TARENTVM in one day, and from TARENTVM in foure dayes more to Rome. And so he came to Rome in fise dayes after his landing in ITALIE, and made such speede, that him selfe was in deede the first messenger that brought newes of the victorie. Whereupon he filled all Rome with ioy and sacrifices, and made the ROMAINES so proude, that euer after they thought them selues able men to conquer the worlde both by sea and lande. And these be all the martiall deedes and noble actes Cato did. But for his doings in ciuill policie and state, he firmed to be of this opinion. That to accuse and pursue the wicked, he thought it was the best thinge an honest man and good gouernour of the common wealth coulde employ him selfe vnto: for he accused many, and subscribed many other accusations which they preferred. And to be shorthe, he did alwayes stirre vp some accuser, as he did Petilius against Scipio. But Scipio, by reason of his nobility, the greatnes of his house, and the magnanimity of his minde, passed not for any accusation they could lay against him: being out of all feare, they shoulde be able to condemne him. And so he let fall the accusation he had against him. Notwithstanding, he ioynd with other that accused Lucius Scipio, his owne brother, and followed the matter foore against him, that he caused him to be condemned in a great summe of money to the comon wealth: who being vnable to pay the fine, had gone to prison, and hardly scaped it, had not the Tribunes of the people reuoked his condemnation. It is sayd that Cato comming through the market place one day, and meeting with a younge manne by the way that had ouerthrowen his aduersary in sute, and put one of his late fathers greatest enemies to open shame and foyle before the people: he embraced him with a good countenance, and sayd vnto him. Oh my sonne, sacrifices that good children shoulde offer to their fathers soule, be not lammes nor kiddes, but the teares and condemnations of their enemies. But as he vexed other, so he scaped not free him selfe from daunger in administration of the comon wealth. For if they could katch the least vantage in the world of him, his enemies straight accused him: so as they say he was accused almost a fifty times, and at the last time of his accusation, he was about the age of foure score yeares. And then he spake a thing openly that was noted: that it was a harder thinge to geue vp an accompt of his life before men in any other world, then in this among whom he liued. And yet was not this the last sute he followed: for foure yeares after, when he was foure score and tenne yeares of age, he accused Seruius Galba. And thus he liued as Nesfor, in maner three ages of man, alwayes in continual sute and action. For when he wrestled with the first Scipio the AFRICAN about matters of state and common wealth: he went on vnto the time of the seconde, that was adopted by the first Scipios sonne, the naturall sonne of Paulus Aemilius, who ouercame Perseus, king of MACEDON. Furthennore, Marcus Cato, tenne yeares after his Consullship, sued to be Censor, which was in Rome the greatest office of dignity that any citizen of Rome could attaine vnto: and as a man may say, the roome of all glory and honor of their common wealth. For among other authorities the Censor had power to examine mens liues & maners, and to punish euery of fendor. For the ROMAINES were of that minde, that they woulde not haue men marry, geue children, liue priuately by them selues, and make feastes and banquettes at their pleasure, but that they shoulde stande in feare to be reprovnd and inquired of by the magistrate: and that it was not good to geue euery body liberty, to doe what they would, following his owne lust and fanisie. And they iudging that mens naturall dispositions doe appeare more in such things, then in all other things: that are openly done at none dayes, and in the sight of the worlde: vied to chooe two Censors, that were two Surueyors of maners, to see that euery man behaued him selfe vertuouly, and gaue not them selues to pleasure, nor to breake the lawes and customes of

A of the common wealth. These officers were called in their tongue, Censores, and alwayes of custome one of them was a PATRICIAN, and the other a commoner. These two had power and authority to disgrace a knight by taking away his horse, & to put any of the Senate, whom they saw liue dissolutely and disorderly. It was their office also, to cease and rate euery citizen according to the estimation of their goodes, to note the age, genealogie, and degrees of euery man, and to keepe bookes of them, besides many other prerogatiues they had belonging to their office. Therefore when Cato came to sue for this office among other, the chiefeest Senators were all bent against him. Some of them for very enuy, thinkinge it shame and dishonor to the nobility, to suffer menne that were meanly borne, and vpsitares (the first of their house and name, that euer came to beare office in the state) to be called & preferred vnto the highest offices of state in all their common wealth. Other also that were ill liuers, & knowing that they had offended the lawes of their contry: they feared his cruelty to much, imagining he would spare no man, nor pardon any offence, hauing the law in his owne hands. So when they had consulted together about it, they did set vp seuen competitors against him, who flattered the people with many fayer wordes and promises, as though they had neede of magistrates to vse them gently, and to doe things for to please them. But Cato contrariwise, shewing no countenance that he would vse them gently in the office, but openly in the pulpit fororations, threatening those that had liued naughtily and wickedly, he cried out: that they must reforme their citie, and perwaded the people not to chooe the gentlest, but the sharpest phisitions: and that him selfe was such a one as they needed, & among the PATRICIANS C. Valerius Flaccus an other, in whose company he hoped (they two beinge chosen Censors) to do great good vnto the common wealth, by burninge and cutting of (like Hydras heades) all vanity and voluptuous pleasures, that were crept in amongest them: and that he sawe well enough, how all the other suters sought the office by dishonest meanes, fearing such officers as they knew would deale iustly & vprightly. Then did the people of Rome shew them selues nobly minded, and worthy of noble gouernours. For they refused not the lower nesse or feuerity of Cato, but reiected these meale mouthed men, that seemed ready to please the people in all things: and thereupon chose Marcus Cato Censor, and Valerius Flaccus to be his fellow, and they did obey him, as if he hadde bene present officer, and no suter for the office, being in themselves to giue it to whom they thought good. The first thing he did after he was stalled in his Censorship, was that he named Lucius Valerius Flaccus, his friend and fellow Censor with him, prince of the Senate: & among many other also whom he thrust out of the Senate, he put Lucius Quintus Flaminius of the Senate, that had bene Consull seuen yeares before, and was brother also vnto Titus Quintus Flaminius that ouercame Philip king of MACEDON in battell, which was greater glory to him, then that he had bene Consull. But the cause why he put him of the Senate, was this. This Lucius Quintus caried euer with him a younge boy to the warres, whom he gaue as good countenance and credit vnto, as to any of his best familiar frendes he had about him. It fortuned on a time whilest Lucius Quintus was Consull and gouernour of a prouince, that he made a feast, and this boy being set at his table hard by him, as his maner was, he beganne to flatter him, knowing how to handle him when he was prettily mery: & soothing him, told him he loued him so dearly, that vpon his departing from Rome, when the Swordeplaiers were ready to fight for life and death with vnrebaten swordes to shew the people pastime, he came his way, and left the sight of that he neuer saw, that was very desirous to haue seene a man killed. Then this Lucius Quintus, to make him see the like, sayd: care not for the sight thou hast lost, boy, for I will let thee see as much. And when he had spoken these wordes, he commaunded a prisoner condemned to dye, to be fetched and brought into his hall before him, and the hangman with his axe. Which was forthwith done according to his commaundement. Then asked he the boy, if he would straight fee the man killed: yea, sir, sayd the boy: and with that he had the hangman strike of his head. Most wryters reporte this matter thus. And Cicero to confirme it also, wrote in his booke de Senectute that the same was written in an oration Cato made before the people of Rome. Now Lucius Quintus beinge thus shamefully put of the Senate by Cato, his brother Titus beinge offended withall, coulde not tell what to doe, but besought the people they woulde commaunde Cato

to declare the cause, why he brought such shame vnto his house. Whereupon Cato openly before the people, made recital of all this feat. And when Lucius denied it, affirming it was not so: Cato would haue had him sworne before them all, that it was not true they had burdened him withall. But Lucius prayed them to pardon him, who sayed he would not sweare. Whereupon the people iudged it straight that he deserued well that shame. So not longe after, certaine games beinge shewed in the Theater, Lucius came thither, and passinge beyonde the ordinary place that was appointed for those that had bene Consuls, he went to sit aloofe of amongest the multitude. The people tooke pity on him, and made such a do about him, as they forced him to rise, and to go sit among the other Senators that had bene Consuls: falsing the best they could, the shame and dishonor happened vnto so noble a house. Cato put out of the Senate also, one Manilius, who was in great towardnes to haue bene made Consul the next yere following, only because he kissed his wife to louingly in the day time, & before his daughter: and reprouing him for it, he tolde him, his wife neuer kissed him, but when it thundered. So when he was disposed to be merry, he would say it was happy with him when Iupiter thundered. He tooke away Lucius Scipios horse from him, that had triumphed for the victories he had won against the great king Antiochus: which wan him much ill wil, because it appeared to the world he did it of purpose, for the malice he did beare Scipio the AFRICAN, that was dead. But the most thing that greued the people of all other extremities he vsed, was his putting downe of all feastes and vaine expences. For a man to take it cleane away, and to be openly seene in it, it was vnpossible, because it was so common a thinge, and euery man was giuen to it. Therefore Cato to fetch it about indirectly, did praise euery citizens goodes, and rated their apparell, their coches, their litters, their wiues chaines and iuels, and all other mouables and household stuffe, that had cost about a thousand five hundred Drachmes a peece: at tenne times as much as they were worth: to the end that such as had bestowed their money in those curious trifles, should pay so much more subsidie to the maintenance of the common wealth, as their goods were ouer valued at. Moreouer he ordained for euery thousand Ales that those trifling things were praised at, the owners of them should pay three thousand Ales to the common treasury: to the ende that they who were greued with this taxe, and sawe rather pay lesse subsidy (that were as much worth as them selues, by liuing without such toys) might call home them selues againe, and lay a side such foolish brauery and fineneffe. Notwithstandinge, Cato was enuied euery way. First, of them that were contented to pay the taxe imposed, rather then they would leaue their vanity: and next, of them also, that would rather reforme them selues, then pay the taxe. And some thinke that this law was deuised rather to take away their goodes, then to let them to make shew of them: and they haue a sonde opinion besides, that their riches is better scene in superfluous things, then in necessary. Wherein they say Aristotle the Philosopher did wonder more, then at any other thing: how men could thinke them more rich and happy, that had many curious and superfluous things, then those that had necessary and profitable things. And Scopas the THESSALIAN, when one of his familiar frends asked him, I know not what trifling thing, & to make him graunt it the sooner, tolde him it was a thinge he might well spare, and did him no good: many sayeth he, all the goodes I haue, are in such toys as do me no good. So this couetous desire we haue to be rich, consisteth of no necessary desire in nature, but is bred in vs by a false opinion from the common sorte. Now, Cato caringe least of all for the exclamations they made against him, grew to be more straight and seuer. For he cut of the pipes and quilles priuate men had made to conuey water into their houses & gardens, robbing the city of the water that came from their common conduite heades, and did plucke downe also mens porches that were made before their doores into the strete, & brought downe the prizes of common workes in the city, and moreouer raised the common farmes and customes of the city, as high as he could: all which things together made him greatly hated and enuied of most men. Wherefore, Titus Flaminius, and certaine other beinge bent against him in open Senate, caused all Catoes couenauntes and bargaines made, with the master worke man for repaying & mending of the common buildings & holy places, to be made void, as things greatly preiudiciall to the common wealth. And they did also stirre vp the boldest and rashest of the Tribunes of the people against him, because they should accuse him vnto the people, and make request he might be condemned in the summe of two talentes. They did maruelously hinder also the buildinge of the pallace he built at the charge of the common wealth, looking into the market place vnder the Senate house: which pallace was finished notwithstanding, & called after his name, Basilica Porcia: as who would say, the pallace Porcius the Censor built. Howebeit it seemed the people of Rome did greatly like and commend his gouernment in the Censorshippe. For they set vp a statue of him in the temple of the goddesse of health, whereunder they wrote not his victories nor triumphe, but only ingraued this inscription word for worde, to this effect by translation: For the honor of Marcus Cato the Censor: because he reformed the discipline of the common wealth of Rome (that was farre out of order, and giuen to licentious life) by his wife preceptes, good maners, and holy institutions. In deede, before this image was set vp for him, he was wont to mocke at them that delighted, and were desirous of such things: saying, they did not consider how they bragged in founders, painters, and image makers, but nothing of their vertues: and that for him selfe, the people did alwayes carfully images of him in their hartes, meaninge the memory of his life & doings. When some wondered why diuerse meane men and vnknown perones had images set vp of them, and there were none of him: he gaue them this answer. I had rather men should aske why Cato had no Image set vp for him, then why he had any. In the ende, he would haue no honest man abide to be praised, onles his praise turned to the benefit of the common wealth: and yet was he one of them that would most praise him selfe. So that if any had done a fault, or stept awry, and that men had gone about to reprove them: he would say they were not to be blamed, for they were no Catoes that did offend. And such as counterfeited to follow any of his doings, and came thorte of his maner, he called them leu-banded Catoes. He would say, that in most dangerous times the Senate vsed to cast their eyes vpon him, as passengers on the sea do looke vpon the master of the shippe in a storme: & that many times when he was absent, the Senate would put ouer matters of importance, until he might come amonge them. And this is confirmed to be true, as well by other, as by him selfe. His authority was great in matters of state, for his wisdom, his eloquence, and great experience. Besides this commendacion, they praised him for a good father to his children, a good husband to his wife, & a good fauer for his profit: for he was neuer careless of them, as things to be lightly passed on. And therefore me thinke I must nedes tell you by the way, some parte D of his well doinge, to followe our declaration of him. First of all, he married a gentlewoman more noble then rich, knowing that either of both should make her proude & stout enough: but yet he euer thought the nobler borne, would be the more ashamed of dishonesty, then the meaner borne: and therefore that they would be more obedient to their husbandes, in all honest manner and reasonable things. Furthermore, he sayd: that he that bet his wife or his child, did commit as great a sacrilege, as if he polluted or spoiled the holiest things of the world: and he thought it a greater praise for a man to be a good husband, then a good Senator. And therefore he thought nothing more commendable in the life of olde Socrates, then his patience, in vifing his wife well, that was such a shrew, and his children that were so harebrained. After Catoes wife had brought him a sonne, he could not haue so earnest busines in hande, if it E had not touched the common wealth, but he would let all alone, to go home to his house, about the time his wife did vnswadell the younge boy to washe and shift him: for the gaue it sucke with her owne brestes, and many times would let the slaues children sucke of her also, because they might haue a naturall loue towards her sonne, hauinge sucked one milke, and bene brought vp together. When his sonne was come to age of discretion, and that he was able to learne any thinge, Cato him selfe did teache him, notwithstanding he had a slaue in his house called Chilo (a very honest man, & a good grammarian) who did also teach many others: but as he sayed him selfe, he did not like, a slaue should rebuke his sonne, nor pull him by the eares, when peraduenture he was not apt to take very sodainly that was taught him: neither would he haue his sonne bounde to a slaue for so great a matter as that, as to haue his learning, f of him. Wherefore he him selfe taught him his grammar, the law, and to exercise his body, not only to throw a dart, to play at the sword, to vawt, to ride a horse, and to handle all sortes of weapons, but also to fight with filtes, to abide colde and heate, and to swimme ouer a swift runninge riuer. He sayed moreover, that he wrote goodly histories in great letters with his owne hande, because his sonne might learne in his fathers house the vertues of good men in times past, that he taking example by their doings, should frame his life to excell them. He sayed also, that he tooke as great heede of speaking any fowle or vncomely wordes before his sonne, as he would haue done if he had bene before the Vestall Nunnes. He neuer was in the whotte house with his sonne: for it was a common vse with the ROMAINES at that time, that the sonnes in law did not bathe them selues with their fathers in law, but were ashamed to see one an other naked. But afterwarde they hauinge learned of the GREEKES to wash them selues naked with men, it taught them also to be naked in the bathe euen with their wives. There lacked no towardlines, nor good disposition in Catoes sonne, to frame him selfe vertuous: for he was of so good a nature, that he shewed him selfe willing to followe whatsoeuer his father had taught him. Howebeit he was such a weake pulinge, that he could not away with much hardnesse, and therefore his father was contented not to binde him to that straight and painful full life, which him selfe had kept. Yet he became valliant in the warres. For he fought maruelously stowtly in the battell, in which Perseus the kinge of MACEDON was ouerthrowen by Paulus Aemilius: where his sword being striken out of his hand with a great blow that lighted on it, and by reason his hand was somewhat sweaty besides, he fell into a great fury, and prayed of his frendes about him to recouer it. So they all together ranne vpon the enemies in that place where his sword fell out of his hande, and came in so fiercely on them, that they made a lane through them, and clearing the place, found it in the end, but with much a do, being vnder such a heape of dead bodies and other weapons, as well ROMAINES as MACEDONIANS, C one lying on an other. Paulus Aemilius the Generall hearing of this act of his, did highly comende the younge man. And at this day there is a letter extant from Cato to his sonne, in the which he praisth this worthy fact and toyle of his, for the recouering of his sword againe. Afterwarde, this Cato the yonger married Tertia, one of Paulus Aemilius daughters, and sister vnto Scipio the seconde, and so was matched in this noble house, not onely for his owne vertues sake, but for respect of his fathers dignity & authority: whereby the great care, paines, and study that Cato the father tooke in bringing vp his sonne in vertue and learninge, was honorably rewarded in the happy bestowing of his sonne. He euer had a great number of yong lide slaues which he bought, when any would sell their prisoners in the warres. He did chooe them thus yonge, because they were apt yet to learne any thinge he would traine them vnto, and that a man might breake them, like yonge coltes, or lide whelpes. But none of them all, how many soeuer he had, did euer goe to any mans house, but when him selfe or his wife did sende them. If any man asked them what Cato did: they answered, they could not tell. And when they were within, either they must needes be occupied about somewhat, or else they must sleepe: for he loued them well that were sleepey, holdinge opinion that slaues that loued sleepe were more tractable, and willing to do any thing a man would set them to, then those that were waking. And because he thought that nothing more did prouoke slaues to mischief and naughtines, then lust and desire of women: he was contented his slaues might company with his bondewomen in his house, for a peece of money he appointed them to pay, but with straight commaundement besides, that none of them should deale with any other woman a broode. At the first when he gaue him selfe to follow the warres, and was not greatly rich, he neuer was angry for any fault his seruantes did about his persone: saying it was a fowle thing for a gentleman or noble man, to fall out with his seruantes for his belly. Afterwarde, as he rose to better state, and grew to be wealthier, if he had made a dinner or supper for any of his frendes and familiars, they were no sooner gone, but he would scourge them with whippes and leather thonges, that had not waited as they should haue done at the borde, or had forgotten any thing he would haue had done. He would euer craftily make one of them fall out with an other: for he could not abide they should be frendes, beinge euer iecalous of that. If any of them had done a fault that deserued death, he would declare his offence before them all: and then if they condemned him to dye, he would put him to death before them all. Howebeit in his latter time he grew greedy, and gaue vp his tillage, sayinge it was rather pleasaunt, then profitable. Therefore because he would lay out his money surely, and bring a certaine reuenue

Catoes good husbandry for increasing his wealth.

A to his purpose, he bestowed it vpon ponds, naturall hotte bathes, places fit for fullers craft, vpon meadowes and pastures, vpon copises and yonge wodde: and of all these he made a great and a more quiet reuenue yearly, which he would say, Iupiter him selfe could not diminish. Furthermore, he was a great vsurer, both by land and by sea: and the vsury he tooke by sea was most extreme of all other, for he vsed it in this sorte. He would haue them to whome he lent his money vnto, that trafficked by sea, to haue many parteners, and to the number of fifty: and that they should haue so many shippes. Then he would venter among them for a parte onely, whereof Quintius his slaue whom he had manumised, was made his factor, and vsed to sayle, and trafficked with the marchaunts, to whom he had lent his money out to vsury. And thus he did not venter all the money he lent, but alide peece only for his parte, and gotte maruelous riches by his vsury. Moreover he lent money to any of his slaues, that would therewith buy other yonge slaues, whom they taught and brought vp to do seruice, at Catoes charge and cost: and then they sold them againe at the yeares ende, and some of them Cato kept for his owne seruice, and gaue his slaues as much for them, as any other offered. Therefore to allure his sonne in like manner to make profite of his money: he tolde him it was no wife mans parte to diminish his substance, but rather the parte of a widowe. Yet this was a token of a most greedy couetous minde, that he durst affirme him to be diuine, and worthy immortal praife, that increased his wealth and patrimony more, then his father left him. Furthermore, when Cato was grown very olde, Carneades the ACADEMICKE, and Diogenes the STOICKE, were sent from ATHENS as Ambassadors to ROME, to sue for a release of fyue hundred talentes C which they had imposed on the ATHENIANS apon a condemnation passed against them, for a contempt of appearaunce, by the sentence of the SICYONIANS, at the sute of the OROPIANS. Immediately when these two Philosophers were arriued in the cite of ROME, the younge gentlemen that were geuen to their bookes, did visite and welcome them, and gaue great reuerence to them after they had heard them speake, and specially to Carneades: whose grace in speaking, and force of perswading was no lesse, then the same ranne vpon him, and specially when he was to speake in so great an audience, and before such a state, as would not suppress his praife. ROME straight was full, as if a winde had blown this rumor into euery mans eare: that there was a GREEKIAN arriued, a famous learned man, who with his eloquence would leade a man as he lust. There was no other talke a while through the whole city, he had so inflamed the younge gentlemen mindes with loue and desire to be learned: that all other pleasures and delightes were set a side, and they disposed them selues to no other exercise, but to the study of Philosophy, as if some secrete and diuine inspiration from aboue had procured them to it. Whereof the Lordes and Senators of ROME were glad, and reioyced much to see their youth so well geuen to knowledge, and to the study of the Greeke tongue, and to delite in the company of these two great and excellent learned men. But Marcus Cato, euen from the beginning that yonge men beganne to study the Greeke tongue, and that it grew in estimation in ROME, did dislike of it: fearing least the youth of ROME that were desirous of learninge and eloquence, would vtterly giue ouer the honor and glory of armes. Furthermore, when he sawe the estimation and fame of these two personages did increase more and more, E and in such sorte that Caius Aquilius, one of the chiefe of the Senate, made sute to be their interpreter: he determined then to conuey them out of the cite by some honest meane and coulour. So he openly found fault one day in the Senate, that the Ambassadors were long there, and had no dispatche: considering also they were cunninge men, and coulde easily perswade what they would. And if there were no other respect, this onely might perswade them to determine some answer for them, and so to send them home againe to their schooles, to teach their children of GREECE, and to let alone the children of ROME, that they might learne to obey the lawes and the Senate, as they had done before. Now he spake this to the Senate, not of any priuate ill will or malice he bare to Carneades, as some men thought: but because he generally hated Philosophy, and of an ambition despised the muses, & knowledge of the Greeke tongue. Which was the more suspected, because he had sayd, the auncient Socrates was but a busie man, and a flutrer vp of sedition, and fought by all meanes possible to vsurpe tyranny, and rule in his contrie: by peruertering and chaunging the manners and customes of the same, and:

Cato a great vsurer. Heooke extreme vsury by sea.

Carneades, & Diogenes Philosophers sent Ambassadors to Rome.

Cato disliked the Greeke tongue.

alluringe the subiectes thereof to a disliking of their lawes and auncient customes. And he laughed at Socrates schoole, that taught the arte of eloquence: saying, his schollers waxed old, and were still so long a learning, that they ment to vfe their eloquence and pleade causes in an other worlde, before Minos, when they were dead. Therefore, to plucke his sonne from the study of the Greeke tongue, he sayd to him with a strayned voyce, and in a bigger found then he was wont to doe: (as if he had spoken to him by way of prophecy or inspiration) that so longe as the ROMAINES disposed them selues to study the Greeke tongue, so longe would they marre and bring all to nought. And yet time hath proued his vaine wordes false and vnturc. For the cite of ROME did neuer florish so much, nor the ROMAINE Empire was euer so great, as at that time, when learninge and the Greeke tongue most flourished. Howbeit Cato did not only hate the Philosophers of GREECE, but did dislike them also, that professed phisicke in ROME. For he had either hearde or red the aunswere Hippocrates made, when the king of PERSIA sent for him, and offered him a great summe of golde and siluer, if he would come and serue him: who sware he would neuer serue the barbarous people, that were naturall enemies to the GREECIANS. So Cato affirmed, it was an othe that al other phisitions sware euer after: wherefore he commaunded his sonne to fle from them all alike, and sayed he hadde wrytten a litle booke of phisicke, with the which he did heale those of his house when they were sicke, and did keepe them in health when they were whole. He neuer forbad them to eate, but did alwayes bringe them vppon with erbes, and certaine light meates, as mallard, ringedoues, and hares: for such meates, sayd he, are good for the sicke, and light of digestion, sauing that they make them dreame and snore that eate them. He boasted also how with this C manner of phisicke, he did alwayes keepe him selfe in health, and his family from sickenes. Yet for all that, I take it, he did not all that he bragged of: for he buried both his wife, and his sonne also. But he him selfe was of a stronge nature, and a lusty body, full of strength, and health, and liued long without sickenesse: so that when he was a very olde man and past marriage, he loued women well, and married a yonge maiden for that cause onely. After his first wife was dead, he married his sonne vnto Paulus Aemilius daughter, the sister of Scipio, the seconde AFRICAN. Cato him selfe beinge a widower, tooke paines with a prety yonge maide that waited in his house, and came by felth to his chamber: howbeit this haunt could not long continue secret in his house, and specially where there was a yonge gentlewoman married, but needes must be spied. So, one day when this yonge maide went somewhat boldly by the chamber of yonge Cato, to go into his father, the yonge man sayd neuer a word at it: yet his father perceiued that he was somewhat ashamed, and gaue the maide no good countenance. Wherefore findinge that his sonne and daughter in lawe were angry with the matter, sayinge nothinge to them of it, nor shewinge them any ill countenance: he went one morninge to the market place (as his maner was) with a traine that followed him, amongst whome was one Salonius, that had bene his cleark, and wayted vpon him as the rest did. Cato calling him out alowde by his name, asked him if he hadde not yet bestowed his daughter. Salonius answered him, he had not yet bestowed her, nor would not, before he made him priue to it. Then Cato tolde him againe: I haue founde out a husbande for her, and a sonne in lawe for thee, and it will be no ill matche for her, vnlesse the milke the age of the man, be for in deede he is very olde, but otherwise there is no faulte in him. Salonius tolde him againe, that for that matter, he referred all to him, and his daughter also, prayinge him euen to make what matche he thought good for her: for he was his humble seruant, and relied wholly vpon him, standinge in neede of his fauor and furtheraunce. Then Cato beganne to discouer, and tolde him plainly he would willingly mary her him selfe. Salonius therewith was abashed, bicause he thought Cato was too olde to mary then, and him selfe was no fitt manne to matche in any honorable house, speciallie with a Confull and one that hadde triumphed: howbeit in the ende, when he sawe Cato ment good earnest, he was very glad of the matche, and so with this talke they went on together to the markette place, and agreed then vpon the marriage. Now while they went about this matter, Cato the sonne takinge some of his kinne and frendes with him, went vnto his father, to aske him if he had offended him in any thinge, that for spight he shoulde bringe him a steppe mother into his house.

Then

Cato's Phisicall booke.

Cato talketh with Salonius his cleark, about the marriage of his daughter.

A Then his father cried out, & sayd: O my sonne, I pray thee fay not so, I like well all thou doest, and I finde no cause to complaine of thee: but I do it, bicause I desire to haue many children, and to leaue many such like citizens as thou art, in the common wealth. Some say that Pisistratus the tyrant of ATHENS, made such alike aunswere vnto the children of his first wife, which were men growen, when he married his seconde wife Timonassa, of the towne of ARCOSS, of whom he had (as it is reported) Iophon, and Thesalus. But to retorne againe to Cato, he had a sonne by his second wife, whom he named after her name, Cato SALONIAN: and his eldest sonne died in his office beinge Prætor, of whome he often speaketh in diuerse of his bookes, commendinge him for a very honest man. And they say, he tooke the death of him very patiently, and like a graue wise man, not leauing therefore to do any seruice or businesse for the state, otherwise then he did before. And therein he did not, as Lucius Lucullus, & Metellus surnamed Pius, did afterwards: who gaue vp meddling any more with matters of government and state, after they were waxen olde. For he thought it a charge and duty, whereunto euer honest man whilest he liued, was bounde in all piety. Nor as Scipio AFRICAN hadde done before him, who perceiuing that the glory & fame of his doings did purchase him the ill will of the citizens, he chaunged the rest of his life into quietnes, and forooke the cite and al dealings in common wealth, and went & dwelt in the contry. But as there was one that told Dionysius, the tyrant of SYRACUSA, as it is wrytten, that he could not die more honorably, then to be buried in the tyranny: euen so did Cato thinke, that he could not waxe more honestlie, olde, then in seruing of the common wealth, vnto his dying day. So at vacant times, when Cato was desirous a litle to recreate and refresh him selfe, he passed his time away in makinge of bookes, and lookinge vpon his husbandry in the contry. This is the cause why he wrote so many kindes of bookes and stories. But his tillage and husbandry in the contry, he did tende and followe all in his youth, for his profit. For he sayed he had but two sortes of reuenue, tillage, and sparinge: but in age, whatsoever he did in the contry, it was all for pleasure, and to leame some thinge euer of nature. For he hath wrytten a booke of the contry life, and of tillage, in the which he sheweth howe to make tartes and cakes, and how to keepe frutes. He would needes shew such singularity and skill in all thinges: when he was in his house in the contry, he fared a litle better then he did in other places, and would oftentimes bid his neighbours, and such as had lande lying about him, to come and suppe with him, and he would be merry with them: so that his company was not onely pleasaunt, and likinge to olde folkes as him selfe, but also to the younger sorte. For he had seene much, and had experience in many thinges, and vsed much pleasaunt talke, profitable for the hearers. He thought the bord one of the chiefeest meanes to breede loue amongst men, and at his owne table would alwayes praise good men and vertuous citizens, but would suffer no talke of euill men, neither in their praise nor dispraise. Now it is thought the last notable acte and seruice he did in the common wealth, was the ouerthrow of CARTHAGE: for in deede he that wannet it, and rased it vnterly, was Scipio the seconde, but it was chiefly through Catoes counsell and aduise, that the last warre was taken in hand against the CARTHAGINIANS, and it chaunced upon this occasion. Cato was sent into AFRICA to vnderstande the cause and controuersie that was betwene the CARTHAGINIANS and Masiniissa, kinge of NUMIDIA, which were at great warres together. And he was sent thither, bicause king Masiniissa had euer bene a frend vnto the ROMAINES, and for that the CARTHAGINIANS were become their confederates since the last warres, in the which they were ouerthrowen by Scipio the first, who tooke for a syne of them; a great parte of their Empire, and imposed upon them besides, a great yearely tribute. Now when he was come into that contrie, he founde not the cite of CARTHAGE in miserie, beggerie, and out of harte, as the ROMAINES supposed: but full of lusty youtnes very riche and wealthie, and great store of armour and munition in it for the warres, so that by reason of the wealth thereof, CARTHAGE caried a high sayle, and stowped not for a litle. Wherefore he thought that it was more then time for the ROMAINES to leaue to vnderstande the controuersies betwene the CARTHAGINIANS and Masiniissa, and rather to provide betimes to destroye CARTHAGE, that hadde bene euer an auncient enimie to the ROMAINES, and euer fought to be reuenged of that they hadde suffered at their handes before, and that they were now grown to that greatnes and corage in so shorte time, as in manner it was incredible: so as it was likely they would fall into as great enmity with the ROMAINES, as they euer did before. Therefore so soone as he returned to ROME, he plainly tolde the Senate, that the losses and harmes the CARTHAGINIANS had receiued by the last warres they had with them, had not so much diminished their power & strength, as the same had shewed their owne folly & lacke of wisdom: for it was to be feared much, least their late troubles had made them more skilfull, then weakened them for the warres. And that they made warres nowe with the NUMIDIANS, to exercise them onely, meaning afterwards to warre with them selues: and that the peace they had made with them, was but an intermission & stay of warres, only expecting time and opportunity to breake with them againe. They say moreouer, that besides the persuasions he vied, he brought with him of purpose, AFRICKE figges in his long sleeues, which he shooke out amongst them in the Senate. When the Senators maruailed to see so goodly fayer greene figges, he sayed: the contry that beareth them, is not about three dayes sailing from ROME. But yet this is more straunge which they reporte of him besides: that he neuer declared his opinion in any matter in the Senate after that, but this was euer the one ende of his tale: me thinketh still CARTHAGE would be vtterly destroyed. Publius Scipio Nasica, vied euer in like manner the contrary speech: that he thought it meete CARTHAGE should stand. This

Publius Scipio saw, in my opinion, that the ROMAINES through their pride and insolency were full of absurdities, and carried them selues very high, by reason of their happy successe and victories, and were so lofty minded, that the Senate could hardly rule them: and that by reason of their great authoritie, they imagined they might bringe their citie to what height they would. Therefore he spake it, that the feare of CARTHAGE might alwayes continue as a bridle, to raigne in the insolency of the people of ROME, who knew well enough, that the CARTHAGINIANS were of no sufficient power to make warres with the ROMAINES, nor yet to overcome them: and euen so were they not wholly to be despised, and not to be feared at all. Cato still replied to the contrary, that therein consisted the greatest danger of all: that a citie which was euer of great force and power, and had bene punished by former warres and misery, would alwayes haue an eye of reuenge to their enemies, and be much like a horse that had broken his halter, that being vnbridled, would runne vpon his rider. And therefore he thought it not good, nor sounde aduise, so to suffer the CARTHAGINIANS to recouer their strength, but rather they ought altogether to take away all outward daunger, and the feare they stood in to loose their conquest: and specially, when they left meanes within the city selfe to fall still againe to their former rebellion. And this is the cause why they suppose Cato was the occasion, of the thirde and last warre the ROMAINES had against the CARTHAGINIANS. But now when the warre was begonne, Cato died, and before his death he prophesied, as a man would say, who it should be that should ende those warres. And it was Scipio the second, who being a young man at that time, had charge only as a Colonell ouer a thousand footemen: but in all battells, and wheresoeuer there was warres, he shewed him selfe euer valliant and wise. Inso-much as newes being brought thereof continually vnto ROME, and Cato hearinge them, spake as they say, these two verses of Homer:

This only man right wise, reputed is to be, all other seeme but shadowes yet, by such wise men as he.

Which prophecy, Scipio soone after confirmed true by his doings. Moreouer, the issue Cato left behinde him, was a sonne he had by his seconde wife: who was called (as we sayd before) Cato SALONIAN, by reason of his mother, and a little boy of his eldest sonne that died before him. This Cato SALONIAN died being Prætor, but he left a sonne behinde him that came to be Consul, and was grandfather vnto Cato the Philosopher, one of the most vertuous men of his time.

Aristides with Marcus Cato.

NOW that we haue sette downe in wrytinge, these notable and worthwhile things of memory: if we will conferre the life of the one, with the life of the other, perhappes the difference betwene the one and the other will not easily be discerned, seeinge there be so many similitudes and resemblances one of an other. But if we come to compare them in euery particularity, as we would doe Poets workes, or pictures drawn in tables: first, in this we shall finde them much alike, that hauing had nothing else to preferre and commend them, but their onely vertue & wisdom, they haue bene both gouernours in their common wealth, and haue thereby atchieued to great honor and estimation. But me thinkes when Aristides came to deale in matters of state, the common wealth and seigniory of ATHENS was then of no great power, and therefore it was easie for him to set him selfe in preafe. Besides, the other gouernours and captaines that were of his time, & competitors with him, were not very rich, nor of great authority. For the taxe of the richest persones then at ATHENS in reuenue, was but at five hundred bushells of corne, and vpwards, and therefore were such called Pentacomedimni. The second taxe was but at three hundred bushells, and they were called knights. The third and last was at two hundred bushells, and they called them Zeugitæ. Where Marcus Cato comminge out of a litle village, from a rude contry life, went at the first dash (as it were) to plunge him selfe into a bottomles sea of government in the comon wealth of ROME: which was not ruled then by such gouernours and captaines, as Curius, Fabricius, and Ostilius were in old time. For the people of ROME did no more bestow their offices vpon such meane laboring men, as came but lately from the plough and the marlocke: but they would looke now vpon the nobility of their houses, and vpon their riches, that gaue them most money, or sued earnestly to them for the offices. And by reason of their great power and authority, they would be waited vpon, and sued vnto, by those that fought to beare the honorable offices of the state and common wealth. And it was no like match nor comparison, to haue Themistocles an aduersary and competitor, being neither of noble houle, nor greatly rich (for they say, that all the goodes his father left him, were not worth aboute foure or fise hundred talentes, when he beganne to deale in state) in respect as to contende for the chiefe place of honor and authority against Scipio AFRICAN, Seruilus Galba, or Quintus Flaminius, hauing no other maintenance, nor helpe to trust vnto, but a tongue speaking boldly with reason and all vprightnes. Moreouer, Aristides at the battells of MARATHON, and of PLATÆES, was but one of the tenne captaines of the ATHENIANS: where Cato was chosen one of the two Consuls among many other noble and great competitors, and one of the two Censors, before seuen other that made fute for it, which were all men of great reputacion in the citie, and yet was Cato preferred before them all. Furthermore, Aristides was neuer the chiefeft in any victory. For at the battell A of MARATHON, Miltiades was the generally, and at the battell of SALAMINA, Themistocles and at the iorney of PLATES, king Paulaniades Herodotus sayeth, who wryteth that he had a maruelous victory there. And there were that stituted with Aristides for the second place, Sophanes, Amynias, Callimachus, and Cyngirius, euery one of the which did notable valliant feruice at those battells. Now Cato was generally him selfe, and chiefe of all his army in worthines and counsell, during the warre he made in SPAYNE, while he was Confull. Afterwards also in the iorney where king Antiochus was ouerthrowen in the contry of THERMOPILES, Cato being but a Colonell of a thousand footemen, and seruenge vnder an other that was Confull, wanne the honor of the victory, when he did foudainly set vpon Antiochus behinde, whereas he looked only to defend him selfe before. And that victory, without all doubt was one of the B chiefeft actes that euer Cato did, who draue ASIA out of GRECE, and opened the way vnto Lucius Scipio to passe afterwarde into ASIA. So then for the warres, neither the one nor the other of them was euer overcome in battell: but in peace and ciuill gouernment, Aristides was supplanted by Themistocles, who by practise got him to be banished ATHENS for a time. Whereas Cato had in manner all the greatest and noblest men of ROME that were in his time, sworn enemies vnto him: and hauing alwayes contended with them euen to his last hower, he euer kept him selfe on founde grounde, like a stout champion, and neuer tooke fall nor foyle. For he hauing accused many before the people, and many also accusing him: him selfe was neuer once condemned, but alwayes his tongue was the buckeler and defence of his life and innocency. Which was to him so necessary a weapon, and with it he could help himselfe C so in great matters, that (in my opinion) it was only cause why he neuer receiued dishonor, nor was vniustly condemned: rather then for any thing else he was beholding to fortune, or to any other that did protect him. And truly, eloquence is a singular gift, as Antipater witnesseth, in that he wrote of Aristotle the Philosopher after his death: saying, that amongst many other singular graces and perfections in him, he had this rare gift, that he coulde perswade what he listed. Now there is a rule confessed of all the world, that no man can attaine any greater vertue or knowledge, then to know how to gouerne a multitude of men, or a city: a parte whereof is Oeconomia, commonly called house-rule, considering that a city is no other, then an assembly of many householdes and houses together, & then is the city commonly strong & of power, when as the townes men and citizens are wise and wealthy. Therefore Lycurgus that banished golde and siluer from LACEDÆMON, and coyned them money of iron, that woulde be marred with fyre & vinegre when it was hot, did not forbid his citizens to be good husbands but like a good lawmaker, exceeding all other that euer went before him, he did not onely cut off all superfluous expences that commonly wayte vpon riches, but did also provide that his people should lacke nothing necessary to liue withall, fearing more to see a begger and nedy persone dwelling in his citie, and enioy the priuiledges of the same, then a proude man by reason of his riches. So methinks, Cato was as good a father to his householdes, as he was a good gouernor to the common wealth: for he did honestly increafe his goods, and did teach other also to do the same, by sauing, and knowledge of good husbandry, whereof, in his booke he wrote sundry good rules and precepts. Aristides contrariwise, made iustice odious & flanderous by his pouerty, and as a thing that made men poore, and was more profitable to other, then to a mans selfe that vsed iustice. And yet Hesiodus the Poet, that commendeth iustice so much, doth wishe vs withall to be good husbandes, reproouing sloth and idlenes, as the roote and originall of all iniustice. And therefore me thinks Homer spoke wisely when he sayed.

In times past, neither did I labor, carcke nor care for busines, for family, for foode, nor yet for fare: but rather did delight, with shippes the seas to saile, to drinke a boere, to sing a dart in warres, and to preuaile.

The nature of style.

As giuing vs to vnderstand, that iustice & husbandry are two relatives, & necessarily linked one to the other: and that a man who hath no care of his owne thinges, nor house, doth liue F vniustly, and taketh from other men. For iustice is not like oyle, which Phisitians say is very hollose for mannes body, if it be applied outwardly: and in contrary maner very ill, if a man drinke

A drinke it: neither ought a iust man to profite strangers, and in the ende not to care for him selfe nor his. Therefore, me thinks this gouerning vertue of Aristides had a fault in this respect, if it be true that most authors wryte of him: that he had no care nor forecast with him to leaue so much, as to marry his daughters withall, nor therewith to bury him selfe. Where those of the house of Cato, continued Prætors and Confills of ROME, euen vnto the fourth dissent. For his sonnes sonnes, and yet lower, his sonnes sonnes sonnes came to the greatest offices of dignity in all ROME. And Aristides, who was in his time the chiefeft mā of GRECE, left his posterity in so great pouerty, that some were compelled to become Soothsayers (that interpret dreames, and tell mens fortune) to get their liuing, and other to aske almes: and left no meane to any of them, to do any great thing worthy of him. But to contrary this, it might B be sayd, pouerty of it selfe is neither ill nor dishonest: but where it groweth by idlenes, carelesse life, vanity, and folly, it is to be reprobued. For when it lighteth upon any man that is honest, and liueth well, that taketh paines, is very diligent, iust, valliant, wife, and gouerneth a common wealth well: then it is a great signe of a noble minde. For it is vnpossible that man should doe any great thinges, that had such a base minde, as to thinke alwayes vpon thriftless and that he should relieue the poore greatly, that lacketh him selfe reliefe in many thinges. And sure, riches is not necessary for an honest man that will deale truly in the common wealth, and gouernment, as is sufficiency: which beinge a contentacion in it selfe, and desirous of no superfluous thing, it neuer withdraweth a man from following his businesse in the common wealth, that enioyeth the same. For God is he alone, who simply and absolutely C hath no neede of any thinge at all: wherefore the chiefeft vertue that can be in man, and that cometh nearest vnto God, ought to be esteemed that, which maketh man to haue neede of little thinges. For like as a lusty body, and well complexioned, hath no neede of superfluous fare and curious apparell: euen so a cleane life, and founde house, is kept with a litle charge, and so shoulde the goodes also be proportioned, according to vse and necessity. For he that gathereth much, and spendeth litle, hath neuer enough. But admit he hath no desire to spend much, then he is a foole to trauell to get more then he needeth: and if he do desire it, and dare not for niggardlines spende parte of that he laboreth for, then is he miserable. Now woulde I aske Cato with a goodwill, if riches be made but to vse them, why do you boast then you haue gotten much together, when a litle doth suffice you? and if it be a commendable thing (as in D troth it is) to be contented with the breade you finde, to drinke of the same tappe workemen and laborers do, not to care for purple dyed gownes, nor for houses with plattered walles: it followeth then that neither Aristides, nor Epaminondas, nor Manius Curius, nor Caius Fabricius, haue forgotten any parte of their duties, when they cared not for getting of that which they would not vse nor occupy. For it was to no purpose for a man that esteemed rootes and parsnippes to be one of the best dishes in the worlde, and that did seeth them him selfe in his chimney, whilest his wife did bake his bread, to talke so much of an Assie, and to take paines to wryte by what arte and industry a man might quickly enrich him selfe. For it is true, that sufficiency, and to be contented with a litle, is a good and commendable thing: but it is be- cause it taketh from vs all desire of vnnecessary thinges, and maketh vs not to passe for them. E And therefore we finde that Aristides sayd, when riche Callias case was pleaded, that such as were poore against their willes, might wel be ashamed of their pouerty: but such as were willingly poore, had good cause, and might iustly reioyce at it. For it were a mad parte to thinke that Aristides pouerty proceeded of a base minde & slothfulness, since he might quickly haue made him selfe rich without any dishonesty at all, by taking only the spoyle of some one of the barbarous people whome he had overcome, or any one of their tentes. But enough for this matter. Furthermore, touching the victories and battells Cato had wonne, they did in manner lide helpe to increafe the Empire of ROME: for it was already so great, as it could almost be no greater. But Aristides victories are the greatest conquestes and noblest actes that the GRECIANS euer did in any warres: as the iorney of MARATHON, the battell of SALAMINA, and the F battell of PLATES. And yet there is no reason to compare king Antiochus with king Xerxes, nor the walles of the citie of SPAYNE which Cato ouerthrewe and rased, vnto so many thousands of barbarous people, which were then ouerthrowen and put to the sword by the GRE-

CIA NS, as well by lande, as by sea. In all which seruices, Aristides was the chiefeft before all other, as touching his valliantnes in fighting: notwithstanding, he gaue other the glory of it, that desired it more then him selfe, as he did easily also leaue the gold & siluer vnto those, that had more neede of it then him selfe. Wherein he shewed him selfe of a nobler minde, then all they did. Furthermore, for my parte, I will not reprove Catoes manner, to commend and extoll him selfe so highly aboue all other, since he him selfe sayth in an oration he made, that to praise himself is as much folly, as also to dispraise himselfe: but this I thinke, his vertue is more perfect, that desireth other should not praise him, then he that commonly doth vse to praise him selfe. For, not to be ambitious, is a great shew of humanity, & necessary for him that will liue amongst men of gouernment: and euen so, ambition is hatefull, and procureth great enuie vnto him, that is infected withall. Of the which Aristides was cleare, and Cato farre gone in it. For Aristides did help Themistocles his chiefeft enemy, in all his noblest actes, and did serue him (as a man would say) like a priuate souldier that garded his persone, when Themistocles was generally, beinge the onely instrument and meane of his glory: which was in deede the onely cause that the city of ATHENS was saued, and restored againe to her former good state. Cato contrariwise, crossing Scipio in all his enterprises, thought to hinder his voyage and iorney vnto CARTHAGE, in the which he ouercame Hanniball, who vntill that time was euer inuincible: and so in the ende, continuing him still in iecalouzy with the state, and euer accusinge of him, he neuer left him, till he had driuen him out of the city, and caused his brother Lucius Scipio to be shamefully condemned for theft, and ill behaiour in his charge. Furthermore, for temperaunce and modesty, which Cato did euer commend so highly: Aristides truly kept C them most sincerely. But Catoes seconde wife, who married a maide, (that was neither fit for his dignity and calling, nor agreeable for his age) made him to be thought a lecherous man, and not without manifest cause. For he can not be excused with honesty, that beinge a man past marriage, brought his sonne that was married, and his fayer daughter in lawe, a steppe mother into his house, and but a clearkes daughter, whose father did wryte for money, for any man that woulde hyer him. Take it Cato married her to satisfie his lust, or else for spite to be reuenged of his sonne, because his sonne could not abide his younge filth he had before: either of these turneth still to his shame, as wel the effect, as also the cause. Againe, the excuse he made to his sonne why he married, was also a lye. For if he had grounded his desire in deede, to haue gotten other children, as he sayd, that might be as honest men as his eldest sonne: then surely he had done well after the death of his first wife, if he had sought him an other wife soone after, that had bene of an honest house, and not to haue lien with a young harlotry filth, till his sonne had spied him, and then when he saw it was knownen, to goe and marry her, and to make alliance with him, not because it was honorable for him to do it, but was easiest to be obtained.

The ende of Marcus Catoes life the Censor.

THE LIFE OF Philopamen.

IN the city of MANTINEA, there was a citizen in old time called Cassander, one that was as nobly borne and of as great authoritie in gouernment there, as any man of his time whatsoeuer. Notwithstanding, fortune frowned on him in the ende, inso much as he was driuen out of his contry, and went to lye in the city of MEGALOPOLIS, only for the loue he bare vnto Crausis, Philopamenes father, a rare man, and nobly geuen in all thinges, and one that loued him also very well. Now so longe as Crausis liued, Cassander was so well vsed at his handes, that he could lacke nothing: and when he was departed this worlde, Cassander, to requite the loue Crausis bare him in his life time, tooke his sonne into his charge, being an orphan, and taught him, as Homer sayd Achilles was brought vp by the olde Phoenix. So this childe Philopamen grew to haue noble conditions, and increased alwayes from good to better. Afterwardes, when he came to grow to mans state, Ecdemus and Demophanes, both MEGALIPOLITANS, tooke him into their gouernment. They were two Philosophers that had bene hearers of Arcefilas, in the schoole of Academia, and afterwardes employed all the Philosophy they had learned, upon the gouerning of the common wealth, and dealing in matters of state, as much or more, then any other men of their time. For they deliuered their city from the tyranny of Aristodemus, who kept it in subiection, by corrupting those that killed him. And they did helpe Aratus also to driue the tyran Nicicles, out of SEXTONIA. At the request of the CYRENIANS, that were troubled with ciuil dissention & factions among them, they went vnto CYRENA, where they did reforme the state of the common wealth, and established good lawes for them. But for them selues, they reckened the education and bringing vp of Philopamen, the chiefeft acte that euer they did: ludging that they had procured an vnuerfall good vnto all GREECE, to bring vp a man of so noble a nature in the rules and precepts of Philosophy. And to say truly, GREECE did loue him passingly well, as the last valliant man she brought forth in her age, after so many great and famous aunient Captiues: and did alwayes increafe his power and authority, as his glory did also rise. Whereupon there was a ROMAINE, who to praise him the more, called him the last of the GREECIANS: meaning, that after him, GREECE neuer brought forth any worthy persone, deseruing the name of a GREECIAN. And now concerning his persone, he had no ill face, as many suppose he had
